384. The Trial of Sir JOHN FREIND,* knt. at the Old-Bailey, for High Treason: 8 WILLIAM. III. A. D. 1696.

Monday, March 23, 1696.

AT the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey, this day, came on the trial of sir John Freind, knight, for high-treason, upon an Indictment found by the grand jury for the city of London, upon the sessions of oyer and terminer and gaol-delivery of Newgate, on Saturday the 21st instant.

Clerk of Arraignments. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyez, oyez, oyez. All manner of persons that have any thing more to do at this general sessions of the peace, sessions of oyer and terminer, holden for the city of London, and gaol-delivery of Newgate, holden for the city of London and county of Middlesex, adjourned over to this day; draw near, and give your attendance, for now they will proceed to the pleas of the crown for the said city and county; and God save king William.

Cl. of Ar. Make proclamation again.

Cryer. Oyez, You good men of the city of London, summoned to appear here this day, to try between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner that is to be at the bar; answer to your names as you shall be called, every man at the first call, upon pain and penalty that will fall thereon.

Then the petty jury were all called over, and the appearances of those that answered to the call were recorded.

About ten o'clock the lord chief justice Holt, the lord chief justice Treby, Mr. justice Nevill, and Mr. justice Rokby, came into the court; and there being a great confluence of the nobility and gentry there present, the prisoner was ordered to be brought to the bar; which was done accordingly.

Cl. of Ar. Sir John Freind, hold up thy hand.

Freind. My lord, I humbly move that I may have one William Courtney (who is to be a principal witness for me at my trial, and is now a prisoner in the Gatehouse) sent for.

L. C. J. (Sir John Holt.) Is he your witness, sir John?

Freind. Yes, my lord, William Courtney is his name.

L. C. J. Sir John, why did not you send, and desire this before?

Freind. My lord, I did not hear of him white last night; and I humbly beseech your lordship, that you will please to let him be sent for.

The Judges consulted among themselves.

L. C. J. Look you, sir John Freind, I'll tell you, if you'll appoint your agent to come hither, you shall have an Habeas Corpus ad testificandum; but indeed you might have sent this morning, and then the writ might have been got ready.

Freind. My lord, I did not know so much; for it was last night before I understood that he was to be a witness.

L. C. J. You might have sent last night, or this morning, and you should have had a warrant for the writ.

Freind. I assure your lordship, I did not know so much.

L. C. J. Well, send your agent, or your solicitor, and you shall have a warrant for the writ.

Freind. I beseech your lordship that he may be sent for, and that the messenger may make haste.

L. C. J. Let your solicitor come to my clerk, and he shall have it.

Freind. My lord, if you please to give a rule of court for it, I suppose it may be done presently.

L. C. J. No, no, sir John, it must be by writ; the keeper of the Gatehouse else cannot bring him.

Freind. My lord, that will be a long time before it can be done; I desire nothing but that I may have him here to give his evidence for me.

L. C. J. It will be got ready presently; I believe he will be here time enough for you to make use of his testimony.

Freind. But, my lord, suppose he should not be here; it would be a great hindrance to me, and a great injury to my trial.

L. C. J. No, no, sir John, you need not fear any thing of that nature, we are not in such haste; we will not spur you on: but the warrant shall be made; and do you make what haste you can to get the writ, and your witness brought.

[The Lord Chief Justice gave order to Mr. Mason his clerk, to prepare a warrant for an Habeas Corpus, directed for the keeper of the Gatehouse, to bring William Courtney immediately hither to give evidence.]

Cl. of Ar. Sir John Freind, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.]

You stand indicted in London by the name of sir John Freind, late of London, kn't, for that, whereas there had been for a long time, and yet is, an open, and notoriously public, and most sharp and cruel war by land, and by sea, had, carried on, and prosecuted by Lewis the French king, against the most serene, most illustrious, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William the Third, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. All which time the said Lewis the French king, and his subjects were, and yet are enemies of our said lord the king that now is, and his subjects. You the said sir John Freind, a subject of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, of this kingdom of England, well knowing the promises, not having the fear of God in your heart, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as a false traitor against the said most serene, most clement, and most excellent prince, our said sovereign lord William the Third, now king of England, &c. your supreme, true, natural, rightful, lawful, and undoubted sovereign lord; the cordial love, and the true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance, which every subject of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, towards him our said sovereign lord the king should and of right ought to bear withdrawing, and intending utterly to extinguish, and contriving, and with all your strength purposing, designing, and encouraging the government of this kingdom of England, under our said sovereign lord the king that now is of right, duty, happily, and very well established, altogether to subvert, change, and alter, and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England, into miserable and most miserable slavery to the aforesaid French king to subdue and bring;

the first day of July, in the seventh year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at London, in the parish of St. Peter Cornhill, in the ward of Linne street, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did compass, imagine, contrive, purpose, and intend our said sovereign lord the king that now is, then your supreme, true, natural, rightful, and lawful sovereign lord, of and from the regal state, title, honour, power, crown, command, and government of this kingdom of England to depose, cast down, and utterly to deprive; and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to put and bring; and the aforesaid Lewis the French king, by his armies, soldiers, legions, and subjects, this kingdom of England to invade, fight with, overcome, and subdue, to move, incite, procure, and help, and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of him our said sovereign lord the king, throughout his whole kingdom of England, to make and cause; and that you the said sir John Freind to the aforesaid enemies of our said lord the king that now is, then and there during the war aforesaid, traitorously were adhering and assisting: and the same your most impious, wicked and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, intentions, and purposes aforesaid to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect; and in prosecution, performance, and execution of that traitorous adhesion, you the said sir John Freind, as such a false traitor, during the war aforesaid, to wit, the same first day of July, in the year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in London aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, and traitorously, and with force and arms, &c. with one Robert Charnock (late of high treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, duly convicted and attainted), and with divers other false traitors to the jurors unknown, did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent, and agree to procure from the aforesaid Lewis the French king, of his subjects, forces, and soldiers, then and yet enemies of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, great numbers of soldiers and armed men this kingdom of England to invade and fight with, and to levy, procure, and prepare great numbers of armed men, and troops and legions against our said lord the king that now is, to rise up and be formed, and with those enemies, at and upon such their invasion and entry into this kingdom of England, to join and unite, rebellion and war against him our said lord the king, within this kingdom of England, to make, levy, and wage, him our said lord the king so as aforesaid to depose, and him to kill and murder; and moreover with the said false traitors, the same first day of July, in the year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, traitorously you did consult, consent, and agree to send the aforesaid Robert Charnock as a mes-messenger from you the said sir John Freind, and the same other traitors unknown, unto and into the kingdom of France, in parts beyond the seas, unto James the second, late king of England, to propose to him, and desire of him to obtain of the aforesaid French king the soldiers and armed men aforesaid, for the invasion aforesaid to be made; and intelligence and notice of such their traitorous intentions, and adhesions, and all the premises unto the said late king James the second, and the said other enemies and their adherents, to give and exhibit, and them to inform of other particular things and circumstances thereunto relating; as also intelligence from them of the said intended invasion, and other things and circumstances concerning the premises to receive, and the same to you the said sir John Freind, and the said other traitors in this kingdom of England, to signify, report and declare, in assistance, animation, and aid of the said enemies of our said lord the king that now is, in the war aforesaid, and to incite and procure those enemies the more readily and boldly to invade this kingdom of England; and the treasons and traitorous contrivances, compassings, imaginations, and purposes of you the said sir John Freind aforesaid, to perfect and fulfil; and all the premises the sooner to execute, manage and perform, you the said sir John Freind, during the war aforesaid, so as aforesaid continued, to wit, the same first day of July, in the abovesaid seventh year of the reign of our said lord the king that now is, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, falsely and traitorously did procure and obtain to yourself, and did receive and accept of a certain commission or writing purporting itself to be a commission under and from the aforesaid James the second, late king of England, to constitute you, the said sir John Freind, to be a colonel of horse in the army by you and the other false traitors against our said lord the king that now is, within this kingdom of England to be levied and formed; and in pursuance of the said pretended commission by you the said sir John Freind so obtained and accepted of, and your treasons and all your traitorous intentions aforesaid the sooner to execute, perform, fulfil, and perfect, you the said sir John Freind afterwards, to wit, the same first day of July, in the seventh year abovesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, and traitorously, divers soldiers, and armed men, and ready to be armed, with force and arms, &c. to raise, and list, and war and rebellion against our said lord the king, within this kingdom of England to make and wage; and to and with the said enemies of our said lord the king, foreigners and strangers, subjects and soldiers of the said Lewis the French king, being about to invade this kingdom of England, at and upon their invasion and entry into this same kingdom, then shortly expected to be made, themselves together with you the said sir John Freind to join and unite, and in troops and legions to form, did raise, list, and retain, and did procure to be raised, listed, and retained; and divers sums of money, in and about the raising, listing, and retaining of the aforesaid soldiers, and men armed, and ready to be armed upon the account aforesaid, upon the aforesaid first day of July, in the seventh year abovesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, and traitorously, did give and pay, and cause to be paid; and those soldiers and men, for the treasons, intentions, and purposes aforesaid, then and there, and long after you had in readiness. As also the same first day of July, in the seventh year abovesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, divers horses, and very many arms, guns, carbines, pistols, swords, and other weapons, ammunition, and warlike things, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously, secretly, and traitorously you did obtain, buy, gather and procure, and cause to be bought, gathered, obtained and procured, and in your custody had and detained, to that intent to use the same in the said invasion, war and rebellion, against our said sovereign lord the king that now is, him our said lord the king of and from the regal state, crown and command of this kingdom of England to depose, cast down and deprive, and him to kill and murder, and all the treasons, intentions, contrivances and purposes of you the said sir John Freind, as aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and fully to bring to effect; against the duty of your allegiance, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity; as also against the form of the statute in this case made and provided.

What sayest thou, sir John Freind, art thou guilty of this high treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Freind. Not guilty, my lord.

Cl. of Arr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Freind. By God and my country.

Cl. of Arr. God send thee a good deliverance.

Freind. I don't know any thing of it, I am as innocent as the child unborn.

The Warrant for the Habeas Corpus was signed by the Lord Chief Justice Holt, and delivered to the prisoner, who sent it away to the Crown Office by his solicitor, to get the writ sealed.

Freind. My lord, I have something to move, if your lordship please to hear me, and the rest of my lords the judges: That if any matter of law doth arise upon my trial, I may be heard by my counsel, that you may not destroy me without law.

L. C. J. Look you, sir John Freind, if any matter of law do arise at your trial, and you will tell us what that matter of law is, and the court see that it is a matter of doubt, we can, and ought, and no question shall assign you counsel; but that is time enough when such matter does arise.

Freind. My lord, it is well known to you lordship; and all the court, that I am not a lawyer; but I hope, as you are of counsel for the king as judges of law, so you will be of counsel for me; for I am not a lawyer, and cannot know whether any matter that arises be law or no; and therefore I humbly beseech your lordship to be so just and kind, as to tell me whether it be law or not law, and I submit myself to your lordship's direction.

L. C. J. Sir John Freind, we are bound to tell you when any thing of that nature appears before us, and to let you have all the benefit of the law that possibly you can have; for we are obliged to be indifferent between the king and you.

Freind. My lord, I don't question it. I desire also I may have pen, ink, and paper.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, by all means. [And he had them.]

Cl. of Arr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. Oyez: You good men of the city of London, summoned to appear here this day, to try between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner that is at the bar, who have been called, and made default, answer to your names, and save your issues.

[Then the Defaulters were called over.]

Cl. of Ar. You the prisoner at the bar, these men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

Crier. Call Thomas Clark.

Freind. Pray, Sir, how many may I challenge?

L. C. J. Look you, Sir John, you may challenge, that is, except against 35, without shewing any cause: if you don't like them to be of the jury, you may refuse them; and as many others as you have cause to except against.

Freind. My lord, I humbly beseech you, that because perhaps I may mistake in numbering, that I may have timely notice before the 35 be excepted against, or else it may occasion me a great deal of prejudice.

L. C. J. Sir, the clerk shall take care of that, he shall inform you how many you challenge, and you shall receive no prejudice of that kind, or by any slip in point of form.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, call Thomas Clark. (Who appeared.)

Freind. Pray, Sir, must I not see the gentleman?

L. C. J. Yes, yes, by all means. (He was shewn to him.)

Freind. You may swear Mr. Clark; I do not except against him. I desire but honest gentlemen, and I shall come off, I warrant you: I am as innocent as the child unborn.

L. C. J. Swear Mr. Clark.

Cl. of Ar. Hold him the book; (which was done) upon the prisoner: You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner at the bar, whom you shall have in charge, according to your evidence. So help you God.

Cl. of Ar. Nathan Green.

Freind. I except against him.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Emms.

Freind. I accept of him for a juryman, I have nothing to object against him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. Francis Byer.

Freind. Pray let me see him (He was shewn to him). I do except against him, I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Benjamin Dry.

Freind. I except against him.

Cl. of Ar. James Demew.

Freind. I accept him, I have nothing to say against him, I would have him to be a juryman.

Demew. My lord, I am not a freeholder.

L. C. J. Sir John, do you challenge him peremptorily, or do you challenge him for cause?

Freind. My lord, I do not challenge him at all, I accept of him.

Att. Gen. (Sir Thomas Trevor.) If he have no freehold, we that are for the king will except against him, for I would not have any body that is not a freeholder serve upon the jury.

Cl. of Ar. Henry Hunter.

Freind. Pray, my lord, is this gentleman that was called before laid aside? He is not one that I challenge.

L. C. J. No, no, he is challenged by the king's counsel, as no freeholder.

Freind. Then he is only set aside, I suppose; I speak it for this reason, I would not be mistaken in my number.

L. C. J. Care shall be taken of all that; he is not to be reckoned as one that you challenged, he is challenged for want of freehold by the king's counsel.

Cl. of Ar. What say you to Mr. Hunter?

Freind. I accept of Mr. Hunter, let him be sworn. (Which was done.)

Cl. of Ar. John Cox.

Cox. My lord, I have no freehold in London.

Att. Gen. Then let him be set aside.

Cl. of Ar. George Bodington.

Freind. I except against him.

Cl. of Ar. John Hedges.

Freind. I except against him.

Cl. of Ar. You challenge him, Sir, do you?

Freind. Yes, yes, I do.

Cl. of Ar. John James.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Poole.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. Peter Parker.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. George Grove.

Freind. I except against him, for I have him not in my pannel.

L. C. J. How comes that?

Freind. I can't tell, my lord; I have been kept alone while Saturday last, only that worthy gentleman (bowing to Mr. Baker, the prosecutor for the king) was with me to give me notice of my trial before.

Cl. of Ar. Nathaniel Wyersdale.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Samuel Blewitt.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. James Bodington.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. John Wolfe.

Freind. Sir, I do assure you I have him not in my pannel, upon my word. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Samuel Jackson.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. Nathaniel Long.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. Richard Chiswell.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. George Child.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. William Walker.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. John Wills.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. John Hibbert.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. John Pettit.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. James Robinson.

Freind. Sir, he is not in my pannel, upon my word.

Cl. of Ar. He is in the original pannel.

Sheriff Buckingham. My lord, here is the Original Pannel, and here's his name here; and there is not a person in this pannel, but what was originally put in, except it be about five or six at the end, and this is none of them.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Hollis. (He did not appear.)

L. C. J. Pray, Sir John, who had you that copy from? Who gave it you?

Freind. Mr. Solicitor.

Mr. Trotman. My lord, he had none from me, I am sure: I received the pannel from the sheriff, but nobody, from sir John, was ever with me for a copy.

Freind. My lord, my solicitor brought it to me on Saturday night.

L. C. J. Who is your solicitor that gave you that copy?

Freind. His name is Mr. Burleigh, my lord.

L. C. J. Where is he? Let's see this Mr. Burleigh.

Freind. My lord, he is gone to the Crown-office, it seems, for the Habeas Corpus.

Just. Rokeby. It is your own solicitor that has put the abuse on you, if it be so.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Hollis. (He did not appear.)

L. C. J. Pray, sir John Freind, how many have you in all?

Freind. In number, my lord? Would you have me tell you how many I have in number?

L. C. J. Aye, in number in your copy of the pannel.

Sheriff Buckingham. In the pannel there are above fourscore.

Freind. I have seventy-one, my lord. [Then Thomas Hollis appeared.]

Cl. of Ar. Do you challenge him, Sir?

Sh. Buckingham. Pray let the Secondary produce his pannel that he had from my brother and me, and I am sure the court will find they were all named in that pannel.

Mr. Trotman. My lord, I have the pannel, but they never came to me for a copy, as I expected: I had got one ready; if sir John Freind, or any person for him, had sent to me, they might have had it.

Sh. Buckingham. And these people that are not in sir John Freind's pannel, are none of the half-dozen that were added, when we came to the knowledge of them that they were freeholders.

L. C. J. When were they added, Sir?

Sh. Buck. They were added on Friday in the afternoon, and it seems he never came for the pannel to the proper officer; and those that he objects against were not added, but are in the original pannel.

L. C. J. Truly, I cannot see any body is to blame in this matter but your own solicitor.

Mr. Trotman. My lord, I assure you I had made a copy, and wondered I did not hear of them: I do not know where he got this copy.

L. C. J. Treby. In truth, if you would not send to the proper officer for a copy, when you might have had it, you must be content with what you have; for nobody is bound to give you a copy, unless you ask for it.

L. C. J. Well, what say you to Thomas Hollis?

Freind. I challenge him, my lord, for he is not in my pannel.

Cl. of Ar. John Sherbrook.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. James Blackwell.

Freind. He is not in my pannel, upon my word, my lord.

L. C. J. I cannot help it, he is in the sheriff's pannel that is returned here.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Gardner.

Freind. I accept of him.

Gardner. My lord, I am no freeholder in the city.

Just. Rokeby. Mr. Gardner, have you not lately conveyed away your freehold?

Gardner. No, indeed, my lord, I never had any.

Cl. of Ar. William Prince.

Freind. I accept of him. (He was sworn.)

Cl. of Ar. John Simons.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Robert White.

Freind. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Joseph Morewood.

Freind. I accept him; his name is John, I suppose, for so it is in my pannel.

Cl. of Ar. No, it is Joseph.

Morewood. My name is Joseph.

Freind. Well, Sir, I accept of you, I don't question but you are an honest man. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, countez. Thomas Clark.
Cryer. One, &c. [So of the rest to the last.]—Cl. of Ar. Joseph Morewood.

Cryer. Twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your evidence.

The names of the Jury were these: Thomas Clark, Thomas Enns, Henry Hunter, Thomas Poole, Peter Parker, Samuel Jackson, Nathaniel Long, George Child, William Walker, John Sherbrook, William Prince, and Joseph Morewood.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyez. If any one can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeant, the king's attorney-general, or this inquest now to be taken, of the high-treason whereof the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance; and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance; and all jurymen of London that have been called, and have appeared, and are not sworn, may depart the court.

Cl. of Ar. Sir John Freind, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his charge: he stands indicted by the name of sir John Freind, late of London, knight (prouit in the Indictment, mutatis mutandis), and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereupon hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the country, which country you are; your charge is to enquire, Whether he be guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty? If you find him guilty, you are to enquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements, he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since: if you find him not guilty, you are to enquire if he fled for it: if you find that he fled for it, you are to enquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty: if you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Mr. Montague. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: this is an indictment of high-treason, that is brought against sir John Freind, the prisoner at the bar, for associating with, and aiding the king's enemies, with a design to procure an invasion from France, and to raise a rebellion within this kingdom; and this was to depose the king, and to restore the late king James; and in order to the effecting these his wicked purposes, the indictment sets forth, That the 1st of July last, he did meet, and consult, and agree with one Mr. Charnock (a gentleman since tried, convicted and attainted of high-treason), how they should procure an army from France, to come and invade this kingdom; and should raise a sufficient number of men to facilitate the landing of the French: and the indictment particularly charges the prisoner at the bar with sending Mr. Charnock into France, to the late king James, to acquaint him with the design, and to desire him to procure a great number of forces from the French king, to come here, and land within this Kingdom: and the indictment does likewise charge him with procuring and receiving a commission from the late king James, to constitute him, the prisoner at the bar, a colonel of horse; and likewise with laying out, and expending, and paying several sums of money in listing and keeping soldiers and men in pay under him, which were to be in his regiment; and with laying out several sums of money in buying arms and horses for this invasion and rebellion that was thus designed to be made, and raised within this kingdom. To this, gentlemen, he has pleaded not guilty: we shall call our witnesses and prove the fact, and we do not doubt but you will find him so.

Freind. Prove this if you can; it cannot be.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: the prisoner at the bar, sir John Freind, stands indicted of high-treason, in compassing and imagining the death of the king, and likewise in adhering to the king's enemies.

Gentlemen, the overt-acts laid in the indictment to prove this treason, are these:

That the prisoner at the bar did accept a commission from the late king James, to raise a regiment of horse in this kingdom, in order to join with the French when they invaded it; and there were several meetings and consultations between him and several others whom you will hear named by the witnesses; upon which it was resolved to send a messenger, one Charnock, into France, to desire the late king James to prevail with the French king to get a number of men, in all 10,000, with an assurance that they would assist him with a number of horse when he came: and in pursuance of this design, the prisoner at the bar did raise men, and pay some sums of money for their subsistence, and listed, and had them in readiness; and provided horses and arms. These are the overt-acts laid in the indictment; the evidence that will be produced to you, to prove this treason, and these overt-acts, will be in this manner.

Gentlemen, you will see by the evidence that there has been a design and conspiracy on foot for several years to assassinate the king's person, and to have an invasion from France at that time, by armed force here to subdue this kingdom. The prisoner at the bar, sir John Freind, I think about two years ago had a commission sent him from the late king James, to raise a regiment of horse: there was several other commissions sent likewise, but one was sent to the prisoner, which he accepted of; and in pursuance of it, he appointed several officers, and listed several men for that purpose; and expended several sums of money for the raising and subsisting of them.

Gentlemen, you will hear that his lieutenant colonel was to be one Blaire, and his major was to be one Slater; and this Slater's father was a clergyman, and he undertook to bring in a troop of clergymen that had refused to take the oaths. One of his captains was one Evans; one Richardson was another; and there were several other officers, whom you will hear named by the witnesses, that were appointed, and engaged to make up the regiment.

Gentlemen, you will hear further by the witnesses, that about May or June last, they have raised a considerable number of men, there were several meetings had between the prisoner at the bar and several other persons, in order to send some person over to get forces from France, to invade this kingdom. The first meeting that you will hear of, was at the Old King's-head-tavern in Leadenhall-street, and there were present the prisoner at the bar, my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Fenwick, sir William Perkins, Mr. Charnock (who was lately condemned and executed for the design of murdering the king,) Mr. Porter, and one Gook. At that meeting you will hear that their debates were, and what their resolutions: after several debates, who they should send, they resolved to send Mr. Charnock, to go into France, to desire the late king James to get 10,000 men of the French troops to land upon our coasts, about 8,000 foot, and the rest horse and dragoons; and they did empower him in their names to assure the late king James, that they would, whenever he landed with his French troops, be ready to assist him with near two thousand horse among them.

Upon this, gentlemen, Mr. Charnock undertook to go upon this message: about a week after they met again, for he was unwilling to go upon such an errand, without having a full resolution and assurance from these gentlemen that were thus engaged, that he might satisfy the late king what they would certainly do. So they met again about a week after, and that was at a tavern in St. James's-street, near sir John Fenwick's lodgings; one Mrs. Montjoy's; there was the prisoner at the bar, my lord of Aylesbury, and most of the same company that were at the meeting before: and Mr. Charnock desired to know, if they did agree to what had been proposed and resolved on before; for he was unwilling, and did not care to go without a full assurance of the performance. They did all agree, and desired that he would go with all speed, and that he should assure king James, they would be ready to meet him, if they had notice where he would land.

Pray, gentlemen, observe the time when these meetings were. It was in May or June last, soon after the king was gone to Flanders; and they thought this a fit opportunity, when the king's forces were drawn out of England into Flanders, for carrying on the campaign; when was the proper time, according as they discoursed the matter, the people being, as they said, generally dissatisfied, and but few forces in England to oppose them.

Mr. Charnock accordingly went over into France, and about a month after returned again, and acquainted them that he had told king James their resolution, and how they would assist him, and what they desired of him; and, in short, had delivered his message: but what king James told him, he thanked them very much for their kindness and readiness to assist him; but at that time the French king could not spare any forces, nor could it be all that summer, and so there was nothing to be done; and thereupon it rested till the last winter.

Then gentlemen, you will hear, that the last winter the design was renewed again; about January last; for sir George Barclay came over from the late king, being a lieutenant in his guards there, and then they entered into a conspiracy to assassinate the king; and that was to be done first to facilitate the invasion, which was to follow immediately upon the execution of the assassination: For they thought they could have no assurance of success in their invasion, as long as the king lived; and I hope every one will take notice, how precious that life is to us, when it is so apparent to all the world, that our enemies cannot hope for any success to their enterprizes and designs to destroy us, but by taking that life away.

Gentlemen, this very conspiracy, you will hear, the prisoner at the bar was acquainted with, and priory to, even this assassination; though indeed you will hear he did not much approve of it, because he thought it would be a disservice to the late king's affairs; but he was at several meetings with Mr. Porter, and Mr. Charnock, and sir William Perkins, and several others that were conspirators in that design, and was acquainted with it, as you will hear by the evidence.

Gentlemen, you will hear further, that about January last, the invasion being intended to be quickly made, the prisoner at the bar, sir John Freind, had frequent meetings with Blair, that was lieutenant-colonel, and other officers, to consider and prepare how to be in a readiness. About that time the prisoner at the bar, captain Blair, and one captain Ridley, met at a place in Exchange-alley, and there they discoursed among one another; and there Ridley said there was a considerable Roman Catholic that was sent to king James, and he would bring the last orders; and sir John Freind said he knew of it very well; it was so, and he hoped he should have them brought very quickly.

At another time, the prisoner at the bar, and Blair his lieutenant-colonel, met at Jonathan's coffee-house, and the prisoner took him up in his coach, and carried him along with him, and there they had a great discourse of the affairs of the regiment. The prisoner at the bar, sir John Freind, told Blair they must be very good husbands of their money: for if the invasion should miscarry, he should not have money enough to carry on his trade, but he would take care about some officers that had not money to mount themselves; but a great many were to prepare for themselves at their own charges, and for those that were to be under them. They had likewise their some discourse about the Toulon fleet coming about, and that he thought it not advisable till the Toulon fleet came round. He said he would not put a foot in the stirrup till that were done; and that he would keep out of the way till all was in a readiness, and advised captain Blair to do so too.

Gentlemen, you will find it further proved, that about May last, the prisoner at the bar paid 20*l.* to this captain Blair, who had laid out monies in the affairs of the regiment, and this was to reimburse him what he had so laid out; and it was in this manner: You have all heard, I suppose, of one colonel Parkery, who being taken upon his coming over from France, was a prisoner in the Tower, but made his escape from thence, to which escape the prisoner at the bar was privy. This escape cost 300*l.* as you will hear, and the prisoner laid down 100*l.* of it. But this was to be repaid him again: but how was it? There was one Johnson a priest, a conspirator likewise in the design of assassinating the king, and he undertook and promised, that the late king should pay this 100*l.* And accordingly one Piggott went over into France, and had this 100*l.* paid him by king James, to repay it to sir John Freind: but he thought fit to keep the money, and sir John Freind could not get it of him, and he durst not ask it, because he knew the consideration was not fit to be made public. But he told captain Blair, I cannot pay you the money out of my own pocket; but Piggott ought to pay me, who has received this money of mine. If you will prevail with Johnson, who got this money from the late king to be paid to Piggott, to persuade Piggott to pay this 20*l.* I will allow it in part of the money he is to pay me, and you shall have it. Captain Blair did prevail with Johnson to persuade Piggott to pay this 20*l.* and captain Blair did receive it, and sir John Freind did agree to allow it to Piggott out of the 100*l.* due to him.

Gentlemen, at another time, about Christmas last, there was another 20*l.* paid by sir John Freind's order and direction, by Piggott to Blair, upon the same account, by the mediation of Johnson the priest; and this was paid and allowed, as being laid out in the affairs of the regiment before, he being intrusted as lieutenant-colonel to look after the regiment.

Gentlemen, I have now opened the substance of the evidence; the particulars you will hear from the witnesses themselves. If I have opened it amiss, you will take care, when the witnesses are produced, to observe what they say, who will tell you what really was done, and will rectify any mistake of mine: for I would have no such mistake to do the prisoner at the bar any prejudice.

Sol. Gen. (sir John Hawley). Gentlemen, Mr. Attorney has opened the nature and course of our evidence so fully, that I shall make no repetition of any of the particulars; but call our witnesses, and prove it in order as it hath been opened. And first, we call captain George Porter. [Who came in.]

Freind. My lord, before Mr. Porter is sworn, I desire to know whether he is a Roman Catholic or a Protestant?

L. C. J. Why do you desire that? Is not a Roman Catholic a witness? Though he be a Roman Catholic, that is no objection to his being a witness.

Freind. My lord, I desire to ask him the question, whether he be a Roman Catholic, or no?

L. C. J. Sir John Freind, it is not a proper question.

Freind. My lord, a man ought to know what profession they are of, that are witnesses against him for his life.

L. C. J. Will you ask him whether he be a Christian or no?

Freind. My lord, I desire to know whether he be a Papist or a Protestant.

Att. Gen. If Mr. Porter be willing to tell you, he may; but it is not a proper question.

L. C. J. Especially before he is sworn; he is not intitled to ask any questions whatever, till he be sworn.

Freind. My lord, I beseech you let me have the question answered.

Sol. Gen. Sure you don't consider, that the answer to that question is to accuse himself; you don't consider the consequences of it.

Freind. Pray, my lord, let me have my right.

L. C. J. The question is, Whether it is your right or no?

Freind. My lord, I would not trouble the court if I could help it, but my life and all is at stake, and I must make the best defence I can.

L. C. J. Indeed your question is improper in itself; but if he have a mind to tell you, and answer voluntarily, he may.

Freind. I humbly beg your lordship that he may answer the question.

L. C. J. I cannot see you have a right to have this question answered you.

Freind. Mr. Porter, you are a gentleman, and I desire you will answer, Whether you be a Roman Catholic or not?

Sol. Gen. Before he does answer, I desire he may be acquainted with the danger: he was bred a Protestant, no doubt, and then turning Roman Catholic, he subjects himself to a very severe penalty.

L. C. J. Sir John Freind, I told you your question was not proper to be asked.

Freind. Pray, my lord, let him answer the question, it will be of great use to me in my trial; pray let me have my right.

L. C. J. You shall have all the right done you that can be; but in the first place, if a man be a Roman Catholic, notwithstanding his religion, he is a good witness: and besides that, it may be, his answering the question may subject him to several penalties; at least he is liable to prosecution upon several acts of parliament that are very penal; and therefore it is by no means to be asked.

Freind. My lord, I pray only that he may answer the question.

L. C. J. No man is bound to answer any question that tends to make him accuse himself, or subject him to any penalties.

Freind. My lord, I do with submission desire it, and it is no great matter for him to say whether he be a Papist or Protestant.

L. C. J. If it be no great matter, then why do you insist upon it? But perhaps it may be a great matter in the consequence of it to him; a man, therefore, is not obliged to answer any such questions.

Freind. I beseech your lordship, let him answer the question.

L. C. J. You have my opinion; if you will, you shall have the opinions of the rest of the judges: my opinion is, That the question ought not to be answered.

L. C. J. Treby. Since your lordship's pleasure is, that we should deliver our opinions upon this point, I must declare, I am of the same opinion, that no man is bound to answer any questions that will subject him to a penalty, or to infamy. If you should ask him, whether he were a deer-stealer, or whether he were a vagabond, or any other thing that will subject him to punishment, either by statute or by common-law, whether he be guilty of a petty larceny, or the like, the law does not oblige him to answer any such questions.*

Freind. Well, I hope the jury will consider it, that he will not answer the question; and therefore they are to take it for granted that he is so.

L. C. J. Treby. And now to this present purpose, to ask a man whether he be a Popish Recusant, is to subject him to danger: for when you ask him that question, if he were not bred up in that religion, then for him to own himself of that religion now, is to own as great a crime as that you are charged with. If it were not so, but he was always bred in that religion, yet there are very great penalties that he is subject to, as, the confiscation of two third parts of his estate, and several other things that he may be liable to, if he should disclose that upon his answer to the question, which without this discovery could not be proved, perhaps. We must keep the law steady and even between the prisoner and the witness.

Just. Nevil. I am of the same opinion, it does subject him to a penalty; and unless he will voluntarily answer it of himself, I think it cannot be demanded of him: for he may subject himself to a prosecution by it.

Just. Rokeby. I think, it is not a question that can of right be imposed upon him; he may answer it, if he will; but he is under no obligation to answer it, because it may tend to accuse himself of a crime for which he may be prosecuted, and likewise will subject him to other penalties, which the law cannot compel him to subject himself to.

(Then Captain Porter was sworn.)

Freind. I hope, gentlemen of the jury, you will consider this.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Porter, do you know sir John Friend, the prisoner at the bar?

Capt. Porter. Yes, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Pray then will you give my lords and the jury an account what meetings you have had with him, where those meetings were, and when; and what passed between you, about inviting the French over hither, or for a rising here?

Porter. My lord, about the latter end of May last, or the beginning of June, we had two meetings; one was at the King's-Head, in Lcadenball-street, and the other at Mrs. Mountjoy's in St. James's-street. At the first meeting there were present my lord of Ailesbury, my lord of Montgomery, sir John Freind, sir Wm. Perkins, sir John Fenwick, Mr. Cook, captain Charnock, and myself; after dinner Mr. Goodman came in: now at both those meetings it was consulted of, and agreed, to send captain Charnock into France to king James, to desire him to borrow of the French king 12,000 men to come over hither, 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons. Capt. Charnock said, he did not care to go upon a foolish message, and therefore desired to know what they would have him to acquaint king James with, and assure him of. They all agreed to meet the king whenever they had notice of his landing, with a body of 2,000 horse; of which every one in particular was to bring their quota wherever he would appoint.

Att. Gen. When was the second meeting?

Porter. That was at Mrs. Mountjoy's.

Att. Gen. But I ask you when it was? How long after the first?

Porter. I believe it was about a fortnight after, or so.

Att. Gen. What was that meeting for?

Porter. The second meeting was to confirm the first. Captain Charnock informed me, that he was to go within three or four days, and therefore desired to have a meeting before he went.

Att. Gen. What discourse was there at that second meeting? What occasion was there for it?

Porter. Capt. Charnock desired the meeting once more before he went, to see whether we all kept our resolution.

Sol. Gen. Pray, what do you know of sir John Freind's agreeing to raise a regiment of horse?

Porter. I know nothing of that matter, but what I have heard several people talk; but I have heard him say, he would be as ready as any man, whenever the king came; and I have heard from capt. Charnock, and from sir Wil-

* See much matter concerning this in Fisher's Law of Evidence, c. 3. s. 2.

lism Perkyns, that he had a commission to be a colonel of horse.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, upon that second meeting, who were present?

Porter. I told you, Sir, the prisoner at the bar was present at both meetings.

Sol. Gen. Who else were there?

Porter. My lord of Ailesbury, sir William Perkyns, capt. Charnock, and I cannot tell whether my lord Montgomery and Mr. Goodman were there; Mr. Cook and myself were there; but the prisoner at the bar I am sure was there.

Sol. Gen. Pray, capt. Porter, will you remember and recollect yourself, who were at the first meeting?

Porter. I have named them already, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Name them again then.

Porter. My lord of Ailesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Freind, sir William Perkyns, sir John Fenwick, capt. Charnock, Mr. Cook, and myself; we dined there, and after dinner Mr. Goodman came in.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, when did you see Mr. Charnock after this, and what discourse had you with him about his journey, and the success of it?

Porter. I never saw him till 3 or 4 days after our riot business in Drury-lane, upon the account of which I had been a prisoner in Newgate.

Att. Gen. Well, and what did he say to you?

Porter. He told me that he had been in France, but that king James told him, the French king could not spare so many men that year; and withal, that he had been with sir John Freind, and the several other persons, with messages from the king; but I do not know whether he had been there or no, only as he told me, that he had been, and brought that answer.

Att. Gen. Pray now tell us, what other meetings you have had about this matter this winter?

Porter. I was once with sir George Barclay and sir John Freind, at the Nag's-head in St. James's-street; I cannot tell what discourse they had; they whispered among themselves.

Att. Gen. Who else was there?

Porter. There was sir George Barclay, sir William Perkyns, myself, Mr. Ferguson, and one Humes.

L. C. J. Where was that, do you say?

Porter. At the Nag's-head in St. James's-street.

Att. Gen. Was there any body else there that you can remember?

Porter. Capt. Charnock came in after dinner, but I cannot say he dined there.

Att. Gen. And who else do you remember?

Porter. There came in one Harrison after dinner; he's a reputed Romish priest, and goes by the name of Johnson.

Mr. Mountague. Pray, capt. Porter, what was that meeting for?

Porter. They had several whisperings among themselves, but what they discoursed of I cannot tell.

Mr. Mountague. Pray, did sir John Freind say any thing that you heard at that meeting?

Porter. Sir George Barclay did say, that some people that were not so violent had written over into France to stop this business; upon which, said I, I hope you will have no letter to-night. Upon which sir John Freind said, is there any thing that is hid behind the curtain? If there be, I am not fairly dealt withal; I will proceed no further.

Att. Gen. If sir John Freind has a mind to ask him any questions, he may.

L. C. J. Pray, capt. Porter, let me ask you this question, Did all that were present at the first meeting, at the King's-head in Leadenhall-street, agree to send Mr. Charnock into France to the late king?

Porter. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. All of them?

Porter. Yes; we desired captain Charnock to answer to the king for us that we would meet him at the head of 2,000 horse.

L. C. J. Did sir John Freind agree to it?

Porter. Yes, I do positively affirm he did.

L. C. J. Then the second meeting, which, you say, was at Mrs. Mountjoy's, what was said then?

Porter. We did agree all, That capt. Charnock should go on with the message that was resolved upon at the first meeting, and we would go on with the business; and he said he would go away in two or three days.

Att. Gen. Will sir John Freind ask him any questions?

Freind. I will only ask him, if they have done, whether he has any thing more to say?

Porter. No, Sir.

L. C. J. The king's counsel have done with him.

Freind. Then, my lord, I will hear all they can say, and when I have heard the whole evidence, I shall know how to answer to it.

L. C. J. Before you go, captain Porter, I would ask you, what answer Mr. Charnock brought back from France?

Porter. I say, I did not meet with captain Charnock, until after I came out of Newgate for the riot business; and then he told me, he had been there, and he had acquainted the several gentlemen with the messages he had brought from king James, who thanked them for their kindnesses; but the French king could not spare so many men that year.

Sol. Gen. Then the next that we call is Brice Blair (Who was sworn.) Pray, Sir, do you know the prisoner at the bar, sir John Freind?

Capt. Blair. Yes, my lord; and I am very sorry to come on such an account as I do now against him. I am sorry for it with all my heart.

Att. Gen. Well, Sir, pray will you give an account what you know of sir John Freind, having a commission from the late king to be a colonel of horse, and when it was, and how?

Pray tell my lord and the jury the whole matter.

Blair. All that I can say to this business is written in my paper, and I refer to my paper.

Att. Gen. You must not refer to your paper, Sir, you must tell all what you know.

L. C. J. He may look upon any paper to refresh his memory.

Blair. I did see the commission, Sir, and I did read it.

Att. Gen. What commission was it, Sir?

Blair. It was a commission from king James to sir John Freind.

Att. Gen. Where did you see it, Sir?

Blair. I saw it in his lodgings at the Strand, when he lived near the Strand, in Surrey-street.

Att. Gen. Who shewed it you?

Blair. He shewed it me himself.

Att. Gen. What was it for?

Blair. It was for raising a regiment of horse.

Att. Gen. When was it that you did see it? How long ago was it?

Blair. It is well near two years ago, or thereabouts, as I remember.

Att. Gen. Who was to have been colonel of that regiment?

Blair. He was nominated to be colonel of it himself in the commission.

L. C. J. Who was the commission directed to?

Blair. It was directed to him, to sir John Freind.

L. C. J. Well, and what was done upon it? Who were to be the officers?

Blair. He promised me to be his lieutenant-colonel; and I had the same from Mr. Harrison, and there were several letters that I saw, that came from my lord Melford and secretary Carroll, who were with king James.

Att. Gen. What other officers were there appointed?

Blair. There was one Richardson was to be one of his captains, and there was one Mr. Fisher was to be another, and one Hall another; Fisher was to be his eldest captain, and one capt. Evans was to be his captain-lieutenant, and one captain Vernatti was to be another.

Att. Gen. Do you remember who was to be his major?

Blair. No, Sir, I think I cannot be positive as to that. I spoke to capt. Barnesley, that had been a lieutenant in king James's service, to be a lieutenant, and sometimes he accepted, and sometimes he refused it.

Att. Gen. Pray, what did you do as lieutenant-colonel upon this matter?

Blair. I endeavoured all I could to get officers for them, and to raise troops. I endeavoured to get what men I could myself.

Sol. Gen. Pray what did you do? What officers did you procure for him?

Blair. I told you Vernatti and Fisher, and one Mr. Hall that lives at Deal.

Att. Gen. What troops did you get under you? Did you engage any to serve under you?

Blair. What? I myself, Sir, do you mean?

Att. Gen. Yes, I do.

Blair. Yes, Sir, I did.

Att. Gen. Can you name any of them?

Blair. Yes, Sir, if I make use of my paper.

Sol. Gen. You may make use of your paper to refresh your memory.

Blair. There is a paper of names that I gave in before the council.

L. C. J. Mr. Baker, have you his paper there? Let him see it to refresh his memory.

Mr. Baker. I have none of the papers; my lord; they are all sent before the council.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, can you tell who was to have been your lieutenant in your troop?

Blair. One Mr. Bertham.

Mr. Mountague. You say, Sir, you were constituted lieutenant-colonel; pray, who constituted you, and made you so?

Blair. I had only a promise of it from sir John Freind.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you lay out any monies for sir John Freind? or did he ever pay you any money afterwards?

Blair. Yes, I have had several small sums of money from sir John Freind.

Att. Gen. Pray, what was it for?

Blair. It was to drink with the men that belonged to the regiment, and encourage them.

Att. Gen. Pray, did Mr. Piggott pay you any sums of money? and by whose order?

Blair. Yes, he paid me first 20*l.* and afterwards he paid me another 20*l.*

Att. Gen. By whose order was that, Sir?

Blair. It was by the order of sir John Freind.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, How do you know that sir John Freind ordered him to pay it you?

Blair. Because it was the money that Piggott had received to repay sir John Freind what he had advanced for the furthering of Parker's escape out of the Tower.

Att. Gen. How do you know that he advanced any money for procuring Parker's escape?

Blair. He told me so himself.

Att. Gen. How much did sir John Freind say he advanced for that purpose?

Blair. He told me 100*l.*

Att. Gen. How did he tell you he was to be paid it again?

Blair. He told me that king James ordered the payment of it at France, when Piggott went over, which was immediately afterwards; and I had of that, first 20*l.* and afterwards 20*l.* by the order of sir John Freind.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, did sir John Freind tell you what Piggott had received in France?

Blair. Yes, he said Piggott had received 100*l.* in France; and he did not pay him, but if I could get 20*l.* of him, he would allow it.

Att. Gen. Pray about what time was it that the first 20*l.* was received?

Blair. I have set it down in my paper; there it is.

Att. Gen. But cannot you tell about what time it was?

Blair. It was about last May or June, the first 20*l.* was paid.

Att. Gen. When was the last 20*l.* paid?

Blair. It was after I was sick, about Michaelmas.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Sir, Who was by when the last 20*l.* was paid?

Blair. Mr. Piggott paid me the last 5*l.* of it, (for I received it at several payments from Mr. Piggott) but the last 5*l.* was before sir John Freind, at Jonathan's coffee-house.

Sol. Gen. Pray, do you know any thing of sir John Freind's receiving any letter from king James?

Blair. Yes; he told me he had a letter from king James.

Sol. Gen. How long ago was that?

Blair. Truly, I cannot tell.

Sol. Gen. I don't ask you the precise day, but was it within a twelvemonth?

Blair. Yes, I believe it might be thereabouts.

Freind. My lord, I desire he may speak out; for I don't hear half he says.

L. C. J. Repeat it to him again.

Blair. Sir, you told me you had received a letter from king James.

Freind. My lord, I shall answer to all this afterwards.

Sol. Gen. Pray, had you at any time any discourse with sir John Freind about one Slater?

Blair. Yes, I had.

Sol. Gen. Pray tell what that was.

Blair. He told me he was to bring him in several officers; and that he had intended to make two lieutenant-colonels, whereof captain Slater was to be one; but when he saw I was not satisfied with that, he said he should command a troop of non-swearing parsons, and they should be an independent troop.

Sol. Gen. You say that Slater was to command that troop?

Blair. Yes, and it was to be an independent troop.

Att. Gen. I think you say, that he and you met at Jonathan's coffee-house?

Blair. Yes, we did so.

Att. Gen. Pray what discourse had you there?

Blair. I called him aside, and desired to speak to him; and it was when Mr. Fisher told me of this plot, and desired me to speak to him, a little before this horrible conspiracy broke out. And I told him what I heard from Fisher, and from Harrison the priest about it; and he told me that he had heard of it, and he was afraid it would ruin king James, and his affairs.

Att. Gen. What was it that you told him you had heard?

Blair. This last horrid thing, the conspiracy against the king's life.

Mr. Cowper. Was it before it broke out that he told you he knew of it?

Blair. Yes, it was shortly before it broke out.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you meet with him again? And did he carry you in his coach as at any time?—Blair. Yes, he did, Sir.

Att. Gen. What discourse had you then, when you was with him in the coach?

Blair. He took me in his coach to St. Martin's-le-Grand, and, says he, I will do nothing till the Toulon fleet meet with the Brest fleet; at that time, perhaps, we shall be all taken up; but, says he, you may sculk about the town better than I can; and therefore I'll keep myself private; and we must be as good husbands of our money as we can; for money will be very scarce. What do you think you shall need, says he? Truly, Sir, says I, I can't tell; that must be according as I am mounted. For I found I had a few indigent officers at that time.

Att. Gen. Pray, what were you to do?

Blair. We were to sculk up and down; and when he asked me what money I should need, I told him I could not tell; for there were several indigent officers, most of which begged at that time; and here is a letter that I had from sir John Freind, to confirm my receiving money from him.

Att. Gen. Is that sir John Freind's own hand?—Blair. Yes, Sir, it is.

Att. Gen. Then put it in. Give it hither.

[It was delivered in to the Attorney-General.]

Sol. Gen. Pray, what have you heard sir John Freind say of sir John Fenwick's being concerned in this matter?

Blair. I heard him say, that he believed that he should command the party that he was engaged in, and that sir John Fenwick had four troops of horse, that lay near Reading, to be employed.

Sol. Gen. For what purpose?

Blair. To be in readiness upon the descent.

Freind. Gentlemen of the jury, I can't hear a word; I hope you hear.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, look upon that letter; you say you had that letter from sir John Freind, pray, who is that II mentioned in it?

Blair. It means Harrison alias Johnson, the priest.

Att. Gen. Pray, what was that letter written for?

Blair. It was about the last 20*l.* that I was to receive from Piggott.

Att. Gen. Is that sir John Freind's hand?

Blair. Yes, I think so.

Att. Gen. Have you seen sir John Freind write?

Blair. Yes, I have seen him write, and I think it is the same hand.

Att. Gen. Then we desire it may be read.

Then a Jurymen desired he might be asked, Whether he saw sir John Freind write that letter?

L. C. J. What say you, did you see him write that letter?

Blair. No, my lord; it came to my lodging.

Att. Gen. Did he ever own to you he had writ you such a letter?—Blair. Yes, he did.

Att. Gen. Pray, let it be read; read it all, for it is but short.

Cl. of Ar. reads:

For Captain Blair, These.

"Sir;

Tuesday Morning.

"You may much wonder you have not received an answer of yours before now: I have been afflicted with the gout in my hand and foot, that I have not been able to put pen to paper; (I thank God) I am somewhat better, and do hope to be in London a Thursday next, about the hour of twelve, at Jonathan's coffee-house, if the weather do not prevent me; if it do, I shall not come before Monday following: I do desire you for to meet me about that hour; for it is not convenient for to write a note to Mr. H. for some reasons I shall give you when I see you. I wish you good health. I am, Sir, your affectionate friend and servant,

"JOHN FREIND."

Juryman. Pray, Sir, what date is it of?

Cl. of Ar. It has no date but Tuesday morning.

Att. Gen. Did sir John Freind meet you on the Thursday, according to this letter?

Juryman. My lord, I desire he may be asked, How this letter came to him, whether by the penny post, or how?

Blair. I don't know, I believe it was by a porter: it came first to me when I was in bed, and my wife brought it up to me.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, answer my question. Did sir John Freind afterwards meet you at Jonathan's coffee-house, according to this letter?—Blair. Yes, Sir, he did.

Att. Gen. And did you there speak about the business that's contained in that letter?

Blair. Yes, Sir; and accordingly I had the order.

Att. Gen. What order?

Blair. An order for the 20l.

Sol. Gen. Captain Blair, do you remember that you dined with sir John Freind near the Exchange, in January last?

Blair. Yes, I think I did, Sir.

Sol. Gen. What discourse was there between you then? Who was with you besides you two?

Blair. I must refer that to my paper.

Sol. Gen. Well then, what discourse was between you and sir John Freind there?

Blair. It is down in my paper.

Sol. Gen. Do you know one capt. Ridley?

Blair. Yes, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Was he at any time present when you and the prisoner at the bar were together?

Freind. My lord, I cannot hear a word he says.

L. C. J. Here is a great noise indeed, and he, it seems, is not well, and speaks but low; pray, order silence in the court. [Which was done by Proclamation.]

L. C. J. Look ye, sir John Freind, he speaks of a letter that you sent to him, that bears date some Tuesday morning, that you would be in town, and meet him at Jonathan's coffee-house upon Thursday following, at twelve o'clock; and that letter was read, and he says he met you accordingly, and there was order taken for the payment of the last 20l. This is that he says: did you hear it?

Freind. No, my lord, I did not.

L. C. J. That is what he said. Then go on: you say he met you at Jonathan's coffee-house according to that letter?

Blair. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What was done there, when you met?—Blair. Nothing but the order.

L. C. J. Who did he give the order to?

Blair. He gave the order to Harrison.

L. C. J. Why, was Harrison there?

Blair. Yes, he came there before I came away.

L. C. J. But you say he gave the order to Harrison?—Blair. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What was the order for?

Blair. It was to pay me that money.

L. C. J. What money was that?

Blair. It was the last 20l.

Att. Gen. Was the 20l. paid you afterwards?—Blair. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Who paid it?

Blair. Mr. Piggott; he paid me the last 5l. of it before sir John Freind's face.

L. C. J. Was this the first 20l. or the last, do you say?—Blair. It was the last.

L. C. J. What was this money paid for?

Blair. I believe it was to support me to go about the business of the regiment.

L. C. J. You believe; that's not enough: but are you sure it was so?

Blair. Yes, I am sure it was for that.

L. C. J. Had you ever demanded money of him before?—Blair. Yes, I had.

L. C. J. For what was that money that you demanded?

Blair. It was to drink with the men that were brought in; to cherish, and keep them together.

L. C. J. To what purpose were those men kept together?

Blair. They were for his regiment.

Sol. Gen. Pray, had sir John Freind any occasion to pay you any money upon any other account?

Blair. No, Sir, not out of that 100l.

Mr. Cowper. You do not understand the question. Had you any dealings with sir John Freind, but about this matter concerning the regiment?—Blair. No, never in all my life.

Att. Gen. Well, Sir, do you remember your meeting with sir John Freind when one Ridley was there?

Blair. Yes, it was at the chop-house.

Att. Gen. Give an account what passed there.

Blair. Mr. Ridley said, a gentleman was lately gone over to France, about ten days before; and Mr. Ridley said, he was a very sensible gentleman, a Roman Catholic, an ancient man, about threescore years of age, what he was, I can't tell: he said, he believed he should bring the last orders.

Att. Gen. What did sir John Freind say?

Blair. Sir John Freind said, He knew of it; but he named no more.

Sol. Gen. What was the effect of those orders, as you understood?

Blair. I cannot tell that, Sir, indeed.

Sol. Gen. Did you know Mr. Charuock?

Blair. Yes, I did.

Sol. Gen. What do you know of his going to France?

Blair. I met him upon the Exchange the last summer, and I told him, I expected not to have seen him here at that time, I thought he had been abroad; he told me he was come from France; but who sent him I cannot tell, I do not know, upon my life.

Sol. Gen. Pray what has sir John Freind said to you about Ferguson? Whether was not he to have been an officer in his regiment?

Blair. No; but sir John Freind said, he would join; and Mr. Ferguson himself has told me so.

Att. Gen. When did he tell you so?

Blair. A good while ago.

Att. Gen. How long ago?

Blair. Two years ago, and above.

Sol. Gen. Did sir John Freind tell you any thing about Ferguson, that he would bring in any men?

Blair. Yes, he said he would bring in a great many.

Att. Gen. Will the prisoner ask him any questions?

L. C. J. Sir John Freind, will you ask this witness any questions?

Freind. Yes, my lord, I shall by and bye, if they have done with him.

L. C. J. Yes, they have done with him.

(Then he paused, and perused his Papers.)

Freind. First, as to the commission you charge me with, that I should receive a commission from king James; I desire to know, whether it was signed, or sealed, and what date it was?

Blair. I cannot tell the date, indeed, sir John; for I never thought to come here upon such an account as this. but I think it was in paper, signed above 'James Rex,' and below, 'By his Majesty's Command, Melford;' and a little seal upon the margin.

Freind. This is the hardest thing in the world upon a man; here you have charged him with money to subsidise and encourage soldiers.—Blair. Yes, Sir.

Freind. I would only say this: you were recommended to me for a very honest man, and you have come to me several times, and told me, Sir, my necessities are very great, I am ready to starve, I have a great charge; for God's sake, will you be pleased to bestow something upon me, to relieve my necessities? It's true, I have given you money several times, but I never gave it for any other use but charity; God knows my heart. I desire you to consider with yourself, and answer it. There is a God above, where you must give an account as well as I, and I hope you will consider of it. Pray declare the truth, Whether you have not writ those lines to me several times, that you were ready to starve, and begged of me to relieve your necessities?

Blair. I have so, Sir, I acknowledge it.

Freind. Pray take me right, and was not that money I gave you, only upon pure charity?

Blair. Yes, you did give me charity, but I had expended so much money in your business, that reduced me to that, God knows my heart. I have laid out many a pound upon this affair.

Freind. It is the hardest thing in the world; this is a Roman Catholic too.

Blair. I am sure it cost me many a pound more than ever I had of you.

Freind. You say you listed a great many men, who were the men? What are their names? Who were they for?

Blair. I have given a list of them to the Council.

Freind. Who are they? for God knows, I know nothing of them.

L. C. J. You have a list there, let it be produced.

Blair. I gave it to the council; and, sir John, I brought in several officers to you.

Att. Gen. Remember, and name as many as you can.

Blair. I have named the officers already.

Att. Gen. Name them again.

Blair. Did not I bring captain Fisher to you? and did not you promise to make him your eldest captain?

Freind. No, you never did.

L. C. J. These are questions of your own asking, so you must hear him.

Blair. I brought captain Fisher to you, and accordingly we dined at captain Simons's; and there was captain Ridley, Mr. Richardson, and Mr. Fisher and you talked together, and you promised he should be eldest captain, upon condition that he would bring in a troop; and this is true, so help me God.

Freind. Pray, where are your men? and what are your men that you listed?

Blair. I never spoke of listing, I only spoke of encouraging.

Freind. Did not you say you had listed a great many men for to be of my regiment?

Blair. No, Sir, I did not.

Att. Gen. I think you do mistake, sir John; he did not say list.

Blair. I had money from you upon the account of encouraging, and treating, and drinking with a great many of the men; and you said it was impossible to keep them together, but that I must have money to treat them, and drink with them; but you desired me to be as good a husband as I could.

Freind. I never said so; these are very hard things upon me.

Blair. Did not I bring captain Cole and captain Neale to you, and his brother-in-law Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Gellibrand? and did not we dine together?

Freind. I know nothing of all this, I declare to you.

L. C. J. If you would ask him any more questions, do.

Blair. I brought those three gentlemen, and we dined together.

L. C. J. Where did you dine then?

Blair. At Hackney, when sir John lived there, at his own house.

Freind. When was it?

Blair. It is above a year ago. Pray, sir John, don't think to dash me out of countenance, though I am very ill; I speak nothing but the truth, and therefore I will not be dashed out of countenance. You know what I say to be true; you then drank a glass of wine to captain Cole; and did not you promise him, because he was one of your mother's name, that he should have a place in the Excise next one of the commissioners? Says I, sir John, what will you give me? O, says he, you shall have the regiment, man. This was before Robinson, his mother-in-law, and Mr. Gellibrand.

L. C. J. Who was to have the place in the Excise?—Blair. Captain Cole.

Freind. I know not a word of all this.

Just. Kelyby. Captain Blair, be not dash'd, but speak the truth, and you need fear nothing.

Blair. This, I say, was before Mr. Robinson and Mr. Gellibrand.

Freind. I don't know Gellibrand, nor none of them.

L. C. J. Was that Cole to be any thing in the regiment?

Blair. Yes, he was to have been a captain, and to bring in a troop.

Att. Gen. Sir John, will you ask him any more questions?

Freind. No, I must depend upon the jury, for I cannot remember half what he has said.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember any discourse between you and him, about some brisk men that were to follow him?

L. C. J. But before you ask him, Mr. Solicitor, we must know whether he will ask him any more questions, for he is now his witness. Do you ask him any more questions, sir John?

Freind. I can ask about no more than what I hear.

L. C. J. But ask him what you will.

Freind. My lord, I have not heard half what he has said, I hope the jury will take care in it.

L. C. J. Some part of it was twice repeated to you.

Freind. As to that, my lord, I would ask him a question or two. Was that my letter?

Blair. Yes, it was.

Freind. Did you see me write it?

Blair. No; it came to my hands by a porter, as I believe, when I was in bed; my wife brought it up to me.

Freind. What was that letter for?

Blair. In order to pay the last 20*l.* and I did see a return of a letter that you writ to king James.

Att. Gen. Who shewed you that letter to king James?

Blair. He shewed it me himself.

L. C. J. How long ago is that?

Blair. A year and a half ago, as near as I can remember.

L. C. J. Did he say any thing of an answer he had to it?

Blair. Yes; but I cannot remember what it was directly.

Juryman. He was pleased to say, he saw a letter from king James.

L. C. J. No, no, Sir, it was a letter to king James.

Juryman. My lord, I desire he may be asked, if he knows the contents of that letter?

L. C. J. Did you see him write the letter, or did he shew you the letter he had writ?

Blair. I did not see him write the letter, I see his hand to the letter, and he shewed me the letter, that he said he had written to king James; and there is this particular passage to confirm it, it was at Mr. Piggott's mother's house; I dined with him there that day, and when he shewed me the letter, I told him I was so well pleased with the penning it, that I believed Mr. Ferguson had a hand in it; and he was very angry, that I should think he was not able to write, and did not write the letter himself.

Juryman. My lord, since it seems he perused the letter, I desire he may be asked, whether he can remember the contents of that letter, or any of it?

Blair. Really, my lord, I cannot tell that particularly: but I am apt to think it was about the business of the king, and about the regiment.

L. C. J. Can you tell truly any of the contents of it?

Blair. That it was about the affairs of the regiment, I am positive.

Mr. Coeper. My lord, before he goes away (that the jury may not go away with a mistake), I desire it may be observed, he does not say, he saw sir John Freind write the letter.

L. C. J. No, no, but that he shewed it him himself.

Freind. When was that letter writ that I shewed to you?

Blair. It was about a year and a half ago.

Freind. I declare in the presence of God, I never writ one.

Juryman. He says you shewed him the letter, therefore it is very fit we should see it.

L. C. J. Nay, Sir, you must not talk to the prisoner; if you have any questions to ask, you must propose them to the court.

Freind. I declare in the presence of God, I never writ any such letter as this he now charges me with.

Blair. And I do declare in the presence of God, you shewed me such a letter.

Freind. Yes, you may; but I am a Protestant, you are a Papist; you may do any thing.

Att. Gen. You may ask any questions of him, sir John, but you must not rail at the witness.

Freind. But when you charge me with the writing of a letter to king James, I ought to speak to it. It seems, I am not to ask whether he is a Papist.

Att. Gen. He says, you shewed him a letter, that you said you had written to king James, which he read, and liked the penning of it so well, that he thought Ferguson had a hand in it; at which you were offended, that he should think you could not write such a letter yourself.

Freind. I declare in the presence of God, I never writ any such letter.

Att. Gen. I suppose you'll disprove him by and bye.

Freind. I can have no witnesses to this matter.

Att. Gen. And you can't expect your own denial should go for proof. If you will ask him no more questions, let him go down and ease himself.

Freind. He must not be asked whether he is a Papist; but I hope you will take notice, countrymen, that these witnesses are Papists, and they think they merit Heaven by swearing against Protestants, whom they call Heretics.

L. C. J. Indeed, sir John, I don't hear you: pray speak so loud that the court may hear what you say.

Freind. I will, my lord; I say he is a Roman Catholic, and I have witnesses to swear he is so; and desire I may prove that he is a Roman Catholic, and therefore he is not to be heard against a Protestant.

Att. Gen. Then the next witness we call is Mr. Bertham. [Who was sworn.]

Freind. But I have not done with Mr. Porter.

L. C. J. Well, you shall have him by and bye; let the king's counsel go on in their method.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Bertham, do you know captain Blair that was here just now?

Bertham. Yes.

Att. Gen. How long have you known him?

Bertham. About eight or nine years.

Att. Gen. What discourse have you had with him about any regiment that was to be raised for the late king James?

Bertham. Captain Blair had told me for two years last past, that sir John Freind was to have a regiment of horse, that were to be raised, and lie posted about the town; and captain Blair was to be lieutenant-colonel to the regiment, and I was to be lieutenant to captain Blair in his troop.

Att. Gen. My lord, we only call him to confirm what captain Blair has said, that he was to be his lieutenant, and that this was talked of two years before. Did he tell you sir John Freind was to have a regiment of horse?

Bertham. Yes, Sir, and he obliged me to bring as many men and horses as I could into this regiment, and he told me capt. Fisher, captain Vernatti, and captain Cole were to be captains in the regiment.

L. C. J. And what were you to be?

Bertham. A lieutenant.

L. C. J. To whom?

Bertham. To captain Blair; he has told me so several times, and talked to me about the affairs of the regiment a great deal, that I cannot now remember, relating to that purpose.

L. C. J. This is no evidence against sir John Freind: he is only called to confirm the testimony of captain Blair; that Blair spoke of it long before he gave his evidence, and so it is not a new thing now invented by him.

Sol. Gen. Sir John Freind did ask what men he had engaged, and among others, he named this Mr. Bertham to be his own lieutenant, and he now tells you Blair promised him so to be two years ago, and then told him sir John Freind was to have a regiment.

Freind. Do you know me, Sir?

Bertham. No, Sir, I never was in your company in my life; I only tell you what I have heard from captain Blair; I do not know that ever I saw your face.

L. C. J. His evidence, sir John Freind, hurts you not, as to any particular thing that he knows against you; he is only brought to confirm what captain Blair said, that he was to be his lieutenant in his troop.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we leave it here.

L. C. J. Look ye, sir John Freind, the king's counsel have done, and now you may speak, and say what you have a mind to say in your own defence.

Just. Rokeby. And call what witnesses you have a mind to call.

Freind. My lord, in the first place, I desire to know whether Mr. Courtney is come.

L. C. J. Your solicitor can best tell that.

Freind. I perceive he is not come.

L. C. J. Well, go on: I suppose he will not be long before he comes, we will stay for him.

Freind. My lord, I must wait for my witness: but in the mean time, as to Mr. Porter's evidence, I own I was at the meeting at the King's-Head in Leadenhall-street; I declare I was at that place, and there were some gentlemen there, but how many or whom I cannot say; but I declare there was not one word spoken there of any raising of men, nor any thing of that nature, that he speaks of, but only we were drinking a glass of wine, and eating a dish of meat together, and sir John Fenwick at that time coming in, said to us, I desire you to come to our end of the town, and take a dish of meat with us. And there was nothing spoke of any thing relating to the government. Gentlemen, these are Papists, and I am a Protestant, they don't care what they say, for they think they merit Heaven by destroying Protestants; and they are not to be believed: and that is the reason that I was not to ask them the question, for by law they are not witnesses, and for that I appeal to your lordship.

L. C. J. Holt. Why are they not witnesses?

Freind. Nay, I appeal to your lordship.

L. C. J. Holt. Truly I think they are witnesses, I know nothing to the contrary.

Freind. My lord, Papists are not good witnesses against Protestants for this reason that I shall tell you; I am advised, my lord, that a Papist is not a good witness to prove a Protestant a traitor within the stat. of 25 of Ed. 3.

L. C. J. Holt. Who says so?

Freind. My lord, I desire to know whether there is such a statute?

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, no doubt of it, there is such a statute as that of the 25 of Ed. 3, about Treasons.

Freind. Pray, my lord, does not that make it so?

L. C. J. Holt. No, indeed, I know no such thing.

Sol. Gen. That cannot be, my lord, that any such thing should be, for all were Papists then, there was no such a thing as a Protestant in the time of Ed. 3.

Freind. My lord, there is the statute of the 3rd of James the 1st, cap. 4th, and other statutes made in the time of king Charles the 2nd, particularly in the 30th year of his reign, cap. 2d, whereby it is plain they are not to be levied against Protestants, because they believe them guilty of damnable Heresy; and by those statutes they are reputed infamous.

L. C. J. Where is your statute?

Freind. My lord, I have no Statute-book, I desire it may be inquired into, this advice was given me by my lawyer; I am no lawyer myself: there is the statute of 3 James 1, cap. 4, and the next is 30 Car. 2, cap. 2.

L. C. J. Well, the Statute-book shall be looked into.

Freind. My lord, the person is not come, who is to give evidence against captain Blair; the principal witness, he is a prisoner at the Gatehouse, and your lordship was pleased to say you would have patience till he came.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, we will stay a while.

Freind. I pray, my lord, do, for it will be very material for me.

L. C. J. Treby. Have you any thing to fill up the time with in the mean time? [Then William Courtney appeared.]

L. C. J. Is your solicitor returned with this Habeas Corpus?

Freind. I believe he is in or about the court, but I cannot get him to me, the crowd is so great. [After much ado, Courtney came in.]

L. C. J. Is this the witness you would have?

Freind. Yes, my lord, it is.

L. C. J. Then what do you say to him?

Freind. My lord, must I ask him the questions?

L. C. J. Yes, you must propose your questions to the court, and they will ask them of the witnesses. If this be the person you speak of, you had best examine him.

Freind. Mr. Courtney, I desire you would speak what you know of captain Blair.

Courtney. Gentlemen, I have been a prisoner in the Gatehouse about a month, and while I was there captain Blair at the same time came in as a prisoner, as mentioned in the proclamation; being my old acquaintance, (I was in bed, being in upon some other accounts) and when they told me captain Blair was brought in, I desired him to come into my chamber. I told him I was sorry to see him there; I told him I hoped he was none of those concerned in this plot; he said he was in the Proclamation, but that he was innocent, and knew nothing of the plot, nor of the assassination, nor any thing like it; there were several other persons in that place at the same time, and he said he was as innocent as the child unborn.

Freind. Did he mention any thing of me then?

Courtney. At that time he said nothing of you.

Freind. Pray, Sir, do you believe he is a Roman Catholic?

Courtney. I do not know his religion indeed.

Freind. But don't you know him to be a Roman Catholic?

Courtney. He bore the character of one, but I never saw him at any church.

Just. Rokeby. Pray, Sir, how long have you known captain Blair?

Courtney. By sight, I have known him six or seven years.

Just. Rokeby. Pray, upon what account did you call him captain?

Courtney. It was a common name among all the company: he was called so.

L. C. J. What, all the time you knew him?

Courtney. Yes, all the time that I knew him, I knew no other name that he had.

Freind. But did you not hear that he was reputed to be a Roman Catholic?

Courtney. I have heard that character of him among those that I have known, but I have very little knowledge of his religion.

L. C. J. Is this what you can say?

Courtney. There are several others that were witnesses of this, as well as I; I never saw you, sir John Freind, before in my life, to my knowledge, nor ever spoke to you.

Freind. Sir, a note was sent to me, that you could do me some service, and that was the reason I sent for you. I desire Mr. Carpenter, Mr. King, and Mr. Payne may be called.

L. C. J. Have you done with this man then?

Freind. Do you know captain Porter, Sir?

Courtney. Yes, I do, Sir.

Freind. Sir, do you know him to be a Roman Catholic?

Courtney. Sir, I have heard that he has such a character.

L. C. J. What character has he?

Courtney. That he is a Roman Catholic.

L. C. J. That's only by hear-say.

Freind. My lord, I have done with this man.

L. C. J. If you have done with him, then the keeper may carry him back again.

Courtney. Sir, I have something else to say.

Freind. My lord, he says he has something else to say.

L. C. J. Then set him up again: (which was done.) Well, Sir, what is it you have more to say?

Courtney. Two or three days after that time, there was a prisoner then in the Gatehouse, who was an ensign in the army, was reading the Flying-Post in my chamber, and in that Flying-Post, there was news that capt. Blair was making a great discovery, and that he had accused sir John Freind, for having received a commission for a regiment in which he was to be a lieutenant-colonel, and said a great deal about that regiment, how he had received subsistence money for them from sir John Freind. A little after captain Blair came into the room, and asked me if I had got the news? I told him yes; and captain Blair then asked what was the import of it? I told him it was there, that he was making a great discovery, and particularly, that he was to be lieutenant-colonel to sir John Freind, and had received subsistence money from sir J. Freind for the men of the regiment. Captain Blair answered, that they might put what they would in the news, but he knew nothing of it, nor did he receive any money: and this was a great surprise upon me, and upon those others that heard him, when we were told he was to be the main evidence against sir John Freind.

Freind. Well, Sir, do you know any thing else?

Courtney. Captain Blair was bemoaning himself afterwards, that he went against his conscience in this thing; and his wife told me, that he was very much concerned, because he was going to do this against his conscience, and she was sure it would break his heart.

Freind. Do you know any thing more?

Courtney. And he told me in his chamber upon Friday night last, about nine o'clock I came to see him, he lay upon his bed very ill, and his wife was with him; I asked him how he did? and he clapped his hands, and said he was very ill. Pray, said I, what ails you? Sure you have gotten some very great cold. Oh! no, says he, life is sweet, I don't know what it is I ail, but were it not for life, I should never do what I do.

L. C. J. Did he tell you, he went against his conscience?

Courtney. His wife and he spoke at first, that he went against his conscience, and he believed his conscience was in a miserable state; and this I spoke innocently among some of the prisoners, and I did not know that it was taken notice of, but it seems somebody has acquainted sir John Freind, and so I am brought here; I know nothing of being a witness, I assure you.

Just. Rokeby. Pray, who were present when this discourse was between you and Blair? You say there were two other persons present when this discourse was between you and captain Blair, and his wife: who were those two persons?

Courtney. What discourse do you speak of, my lord?

L. C. J. You said there were two persons in your chamber.

Courtney. Does your lordship mean at the reading of the Flying-Post?

L. C. J. Yes.

Courtney. My lord, this gentleman that I was speaking of, was lying down upon the bed, and captain Blair came into my room, just after the news was read, and asked me if I had got the news? I told him, yes; he asked me what was the import of it? I told him, they said he was making a great discovery, and particularly against sir John Freind.

L. C. J. Well, and who were there then?

Courtney. This ensign that is now a prisoner in the Gatehouse, who, I suppose, can say the same thing.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, let Mr. Blair be called while he is here, and let him know what this witness says, that the Court and Jury may know what he has to say to it.

L. C. J. Yes, pray let Mr. Blair be brought in again. (Which was done.)

L. C. J. Treby. Now, let Mr. Courtney repeat what he said now before about captain Blair's declarations to him.

Courtney. My lord, I tell your lordship, there was one Tooley a prisoner in the Gatehouse, when he heard the Flying-Post cried, bought it, or it was ordered to be bought; and it being brought into my chamber, I desired him to read it, and I was walking about the room: in the mean time captain Blair came in, and asked if we had got the news? We said, yes; and he asked what news there was in it? I replied, it is said that you are making a great discovery, that you were to be lieutenant-colonel to sir John Freind, and had received a great deal of subsistence money for the regiment: says he, they may put what they will in their news, but I know of no regiment, nor of any subsistence, nor of any commission. The man that read the book will say the same that I do.

Att. Gen. When was this?

Courtney. This was one day when the Flying-Post came out, the last Saturday but one I think.

L. C. J. But you talked of something he should say to you of going against his conscience.

Courtney. That was upon Friday night last, I came to see captain Blair, and his wife was with him, and captain Blair was very ill, and clapping his hands, and groaning, and moving himself, and in a very miserable condition, truly, I thought he was giving up the ghost. I asked him upon what account he was so sad? and told him I thought he had got some great cold: he told me, No. Well, said I, captain Blair, I understand you are going to-morrow to Hicks's-Hall, and I pray God direct you. Says he several times, I pray God direct us all, life is sweet. Oh! says his wife, dear Sir, he would never do it, but to save his life; but it goes against his conscience: so said I to him, you have had the character of an honest gentleman; I hope you will shew yourself such, and I pray God direct you: I wish no man's blood may lie at your door. Says he, I am an unfortunate man; that is the thing that troubles me; or something to that purpose; which showed all the remorse of conscience which could be in the world. I spoke of this innocently among the prisoners, and it seems, it was communicated to sir John Freind, and so I am brought here to testify it.

Att. Gen. Pray, what say you to this, captain Blair? You hear what he says; do you give an account what you know of it.

L. C. J. You hear what discourse he says he had with you; what say you to it?

Blair. My lord, this gentleman crowded himself in upon me; my wife was with me, and he told me he had a cup of brandy, which would be good for me if I had a cold. God knows my heart, I desired no company might come to me. Says he, captain Blair, I have heard you have been an honest gentleman all along; and you are going to Hicks's Hall tomorrow; (and a great deal of such discourse as that), and I pray God Almighty direct you! That's all that I know passed. I was very ill, very sick, as I am far from being well now; but as for any thing of remorse of conscience, as I hope for mercy and salvation, I never expressed any such thing to him.

L. C. J. Did your wife say, that you were troubled, that you were going to do that which went against conscience, and you would not do it, but to save your life?

Blair. No, I am sure she did not.

L. C. J. Did that gentleman thrust himself into your company, or did you desire him for to come to you?

Blair. No, he thrust himself into the room.

Courtney. The sink was hard by, and I heard captain Blair groan, and so I went in to see him; every body had access to him.

Blair. Pray, where is the keeper?

Keeper. Here I am, Sir.

Blair. Did not I beg of you for God's sake, that no one should come to me but my wife?

Att. Gen. If the keeper of the Gatehouse be there, pray swear him.

(The Keeper of the Gatehouse was sworn.)

Sol. Gen. What do you say as to captain Blair's desiring that nobody should come to him, but his wife?

Keeper. Nobody was to come to him unless they forced themselves upon him.

Sol. Gen. Do you know of that man's coming to him?

Keeper. No, Sir, I know nothing of it.

Blair. I always desired to have the door locked with the key on the inside, that nobody might come to me, but whom I had a mind to.

Keeper. He did so, because he was ill, and nobody did come to him that I know of.

Blair. My wife being with me came to me to the bedside, while this man was with me, and I was lying upon my back; and she said, For Christ Jesus's sake, dear Blair, do not speak any thing.

L. C. J. When was this?

Blair. When this gentleman was with me, she desired me not to say any thing before him; because, said she, I do not know but he may be a trepan.

Courtney. Upon the word of an honest man, and my reputation is as dear to me, as yours is to you, she said nothing of that. She told me, you were going to do that which was against your conscience, and you would not do it but to save your life.

Att. Gen. Pray what is this man committed for, you keeper?—Keeper. He is committed for suspicion of treason.

Courtney. I have been taken up five times upon suspicion, and this last time I was committed to the Gatehouse.

Att. Gen. Where do you live, Sir?

Courtney. In Old Southampton Buildings.

Sol. Gen. How long have you lived there?

Courtney. I have lodged there about four years and an half; there are several persons can come and give a testimony of me.

Sol. Gen. How came you, Sir, to be brought as a witness here?

Courtney. I was surprized at it: for my part what I did was by way of pity, seeing him in such a condition; I pitied your soul, because you and your wife both shewed so much trouble and remorse of conscience: as for sir John Freind, I never saw him till to-day in all my life, that I know of.

Att. Gen. What countryman are you, Sir?

Courtney. I am an Irishman born.

Att. Gen. Have you any estate in Ireland?

Courtney. No, Sir, I have not.

Sol. Gen. Pray, how came you to go to Mr. Blair?

Courtney. I have known him a long time; I have been often in his company at the coffee-house; I cannot say I am intimately acquainted with captain Blair, but only as I have seen him in the coffee-house a great many times.

Sol. Gen. But I ask you how you came to go to him; because it seems he desired nobody should come to him but his wife?

Courtney. He may say what he pleases; for he lay first in one room, and then in another and he could never go to the necessary house but he must go through my room; but if you please to send for Mr. Tooley and capt. Courtney, they will say and swear that these things passed in their presence, or to the same purpose, except what passed between him and me in his own chamber. Eusebius Tooley did read the paper of the Flying-Post; and as for what he said of his knowing nothing of the plot, it was talked of up and down the prison and so it came to me; and I invited him into my chamber as my old acquaintance; though I was not very familiar with him; and as he declared, he knew nothing of the matter.

L. C. J. You hear what he says; captain Blair, did you tell him you knew nothing of the plot?

Blair. Yes, I believe I might at first; as we were talking when I first came in, and I told him the truth: for I was innocent as he assassination, for indeed I was so; and as to the invasion there was only some general discourse, and I was not willing to explain myself among such people as they were, when they asked me any questions about it: I had to do with the king and council.

L. C. J. Sir John Freind, have you any more witnesses to examine?

Freind. Yes, my lord, I desire Mr. King may be called. [Which was done, and he appeared.]

L. C. J. There he is, Sir, what would you ask him?

Freind. I desire to know of him, whether he does not know captain Blair and captain Porter to be Roman Catholics, and whether he does not know me to be a Protestant.

King. I am of opinion Mr. Porter is a Papist; he was always taken to be so at Epsom, where I used to go, and where he used to go, and he was never looked upon as a Protestant.

L. C. J. And what do you take sir John Freind to be?

King. I take sir John Freind to be a Protestant; so he is, and so he ever was.

Freind. But when you have been in my company, and they have been speaking of the government, what have I said or done?

King. Whenever they started any reflecting words upon the government, he was used to say, Forbear, I do not admit of any such discourse.

Att. Gen. How long have you known him?

King. He has been my acquaintance this fifteen years, and married a relation of my wife's husband. (At which there was very great laughing.)

King. I mean her former husband.

L. C. J. He has reconciled the matter very well for this point; for he tells you he meant her first husband.

Freind. Ay, my lord, no doubt of it, he will recover it; it was her former husband. Mr. King, don't you mean it was her former husband?

King. Yes, Sir, I have told you it was so; her former husband's name was Thomas Case.

L. C. J. Mr. Tanner, you are to look upon two statutes, the one is 3 Jac. 1, cap. 4, and the 30th Car. 2, cap. 2.

King. My lord, I have heard him say, if I had not taken the oaths to king James, which oaths are binding to my conscience, I could as freely take the oaths to the present government, as any man in England; but I will live peaceably and quietly under the government: but because I do not take the oaths, I am double taxed, and I will pay it.

Freind. My lord, I desire captain Kaines may be called. [Who appeared.]

L. C. J. What do you ask him, Sir?

Freind. Captain Kaines, I desire to know of you whether Mr. Porter and Mr. Blair are Roman Catholics; and I desire you to speak as to myself, what I am.

Kaines. They are so reputed to be at Epsom; it was also so reported there; and I have been acquainted with sir John Freind several years, being concerned together in the Trained Bands of the Tower-Hamlets, and I have been in his company several times since the king came in, and never heard him give any reflecting language against the government in my life.

L. C. J. Have you done with him, Sir?

Freind. My lord, I did not hear him; but I suppose he has declared, as to captain Porter and captain Blair, that they are Catholics.

L. C. J. He says, Porter and Blair are reputed Papists; and he has known you a long time, and been concerned with you in the Trained-hands, and never heard you reflect upon the government since the king came in.

Freind. My lord, I desire to know, whether he believes me to be a Protestant?

Kaines. I did always take sir John Freind to be a Protestant.

Freind. Then, next, I desire Mr. Carpenter may be called. [Who appeared.]

L. C. J. What do you ask him, Sir?

Freind. I desire, Mr. Carpenter, that you will acquaint the court, whether you know captain Porter to be a Roman Catholic, and what you know of me?

Carpenter. I have been at Epsom several summers, and usually am there in summer time, and he was so reputed there: but as to sir John Freind, I have known him above these 20 years; I keep a brew-house, as he does, and we have been concerned together, and have had several occasions, upon the account of trade, to meet him upon particulars of appraisement, when any partners came in, and I never knew him but very orderly and civil; I never heard him reflect any thing upon the government, but was always peaceable and quiet: he was always looked upon as a Protestant, and went to church. That's all that I can say.

Freind. My lord, as to the Statute-Book, will your lordship please that the Statute-Book be sent for?

L. C. J. Yes, yes, we do not forget it. Have you any more witnesses? Call all your witnesses, and we will consider of that afterwards.

Freind. I desire Mr. Hawkins may be called. [Who appeared.]

L. C. J. What say you to this gentleman?

Freind. I desire you, Mr. Hawkins, to give an account what I am; whether you know me to be a Roman Catholic or a Protestant?

Hawkins. I have known sir John Freind these twenty odd years, and have had dealings with him many times before the change of government, and since, I never heard him reflect upon the government; nor never heard him to speak slightly of it: and as to his being of the Protestant religion, I do know as much as any man, as much as another; I always believed him to be a Protestant of the Church of England, as good as any man alive; he always went to church.

L. C. J. What, since the Revolution?

Hawkins. I have not been so conversant with him since that, because I went out of town, and lived out of town; but I believe there are these at Hackney, that can give an account of that matter.

Freind. I desire major Mould may be called.

L. C. J. Then I suppose you have done with Mr. Hawkins?

Freind. Yes. [Then major Mould stood up.]

L. C. J. Well, what say you, Sir?

Mould. My lord, I have known sir John Freind many years, above these twenty years, and I always looked upon him as a sincere Protestant; and I have often been in his company since the Revolution, and I never heard him speak diminishingly of the government. I believe him to be as good a Protestant as any in England.

L. C. J. How! as any in England? That's a great character.

Freind. Then, I desire Dr. Hollingsworth may be called. [But he did not appear.]

Freind. Then, my lord, I desire Mr. Lupton may be called.

L. C. J. There is Mr. Lupton, what would you have with him?

Freind. I desire he will give an account what he knows of me, what religion I am of?

Lupton. My lord, as to sir John Freind, I have known him this ten years; he was pleased to employ me as a chaplain in his house a considerable time, both before and after the Revolution; and after the Revolution we always used the prayers according to the Church of England, and we did always pray for the present king, and the late queen Mary, at which sir John was many times present.

Att. Gen. How long is it since you left him?

Lupton. About four or five years, as I remember: then sir John's family lessened; he was pleased to say to me, Mr. Lupton, I am going to Tunbridge, and my family lessens, (this is about five or six years ago), and I shall have no occasion for you at present; but if ever I make use of a chaplain again, I will make use of you: this he was pleased to say.

L. C. J. How long is it, do you say, that you have left him?

Lupton. About five years; and as to any objection of his being a Papist, I have often discoursed with sir John Freind about the Popish religion, and he has often spoken with detestation of the principles of the Papists.

Freind. What have you heard me speak of the French; and about any thing of an invasion, how I would venture my life for the Protestant religion, or any thing of that?

* See in this Collection, Mr. Erskine's Observations and the Arguments on the proposed examination of Daniel Stuart, when called for the third time in Hardy's Case, A.D. 1794. See, too, Lord Russell's Case, vol. 9, pp. 621, et seq.; Hampden's Case, vol. 9, p. 1099; Rowsewell's Case, vol. 10, pp. 206, et seq.; Cornish's Case, vol. 11, p. 382; Ashton's Case, vol. 12, p. 747; and the other Cases in this Work referred to by Mr. Erskine in Hardy's Case as above.

Lupton. I have often heard you say, as to the present government, that though you could not comply with it, yet you would live peaceably under it. When we have been talking of these things, you said you never would be in a plot; and though you could not comply with the present government, yet you would never concern yourself in any design against it. For my part, my lord, I know nothing by him, but that he is an honest and a worthy gentleman, though he be so unfortunate to be under this accusation.

Freind. I desire Mr. Hoadley may be called. [Who appeared.]

L. C. J. Well, what say you, Sir?

Freind. Pray, Mr. Hoadley, will you give an account to the court what you know of my being a Protestant, and of my life and conversation?

Hoadley. I believe sir John Freind is a very settled Protestant in the Church of England; and I have reason to believe so, because I have frequently discoursed with him, because I have had a couple of children that were his nephews, upon whose account I have been forced several times to wait upon him; and he has often said he never would be in any plot, and his words that he used to me were really very remarkable, 'Catch me in the corn, and put me in the pound.'

L. C. J. What were his words, Sir?

Hoadley. He used to say he would never be in any plot; for, says he, 'Catch me in the corn, and put me in the pound;' and I have heard him express himself with a great deal of detestation of king-killing, and those principles of the Papists, the assassinating of any crowned head.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, how came you to discourse with sir John Freind about king-killing and plots? You are a schoolmaster it seems; how happened this sort of discourse between you?

Hoadley. There will be discourses about these things sometimes.

Att. Gen. But, pray, how was the discourse introduced? What was the occasion of the discourse? Sure there was some occasion extraordinary for him to express himself to you.

Hoadley. I cannot remember the particular occasion, but such discourse there was.

Att. Gen. Pray, how long ago is this time that this discourse was?

Hoadley. I believe it was five or six times within these two years.

Att. Gen. What, have you had the same discourse five or six times one after another?

Hoadley. I cannot say that; but those used to be his words.

Att. Gen. What, in common discourse?

Hoadley. He said he would never be in any plot.

Freind. My lord, I can bring a great many more witnesses of this kind, and I believe I could have a thousand to prove me a Protestant.

L. C. J. Call whom you will, sir John, we will hear them.

Freind. My lord, I am very loth to trouble you.

Just. Roloby. No, it will not be reckoned any trouble, we will hear all your evidence.

Freind. There is one Mr. Willis and one Mr. Hemings; but I desire it may not be forgotten as to the acts of parliament, for they are very material for me, as I shall shew by and bye. [Mr. Willis appeared.]

L. C. J. Well, what say you to this gentleman?

Freind. Mr. Willis, I desire you'd give an account to their lordships, what you think of me, as to my being a Protestant, and how I have behaved myself in every respect all along?

Willis. My lord, I have always taken it for granted, that those that come to church are Protestants; and I did always take sir John Freind to be a Protestant. The acquaintance I had with him was since he lived in the parish of Hackney, and we have had some converse together; and there have past friendly visits between us; and I do not remember any discourse while I was there that tended to the government one way or another. I was never very often with him, but his discourse was always very obliging, discreet, and prudent, whenever I was there.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, when did you see him at church?

Willis. Truly, my lord, I cannot call to mind when it was.

L. C. J. Cannot you name any time?

Willis. He may be at church sometimes, and I not see him; our seats are at a distance from one another, and there are pillars between, that one can't see every body; and I cannot call to mind when I did see him last at church.

L. C. J. Has he been there within this year or two?

Willis. He has been gone from Hackney a year and above.

Mr. Mountague. Pray can you say you have seen him at church within these four years?

Willis. Truly I cannot call to mind whether I have or no.

Freind. I desire Mr. Hemings may be called. I could call a great many more, but they are much to the same effect as these are.

L. C. J. Call whom you will, sir John, if you think fit to call them, we will hear them.

Freind. Being they are not here, I will not trouble you farther; it is all to the same purpose.

L. C. J. Well, take your own course; if you'll call them, the court will be sure to hear them.

Freind. But, my lord, here is one thing that I must desire your lordship's direction in: if these gentlemen, my lord, captain Porter and captain Blair, who are the two witnesses, and none but those two against me, if they are Papists, they are not good witnesses against a Protestant, to prove him a traitor within the statute of the 15th of Edward the 3d. For the statute says, He that is indicted must be proveably attainted; which cannot be by the evidence of Papists, and those that refuse to take the oaths of obedience, which are required to be taken: and therefore I humbly beseech you, that you will please to tender them the oaths, for there is a statute in the 3 Jac. 1, cap. 4, which appoints the tendering of the oaths to them.

L. C. J. That is not our business at this time.

Freind. Then I must beg your pardon that they are not substantial witnesses; for this is the law, as I am informed. I humbly submit to your lordship, whether this be not the law. I only speak it to know whether it be convenient for me to rehearse it. I asked the question before they were sworn. I know not whether it be convenient for me to move it now.

L. C. J. Ay, ay, it is very convenient now is the proper time.

Freind. Before ever they were sworn I would have asked them the question whether they were Papists or not, but it was not allowed, it was over-ruled: now, my Lord, there is such a statute, and I humbly beseech you to tender them the oaths, and that would be a demonstration that they were Papists, and then they could be no good witnesses.

L. C. J. You say well, if we could find such a statute, that no Papist should be a witness; but there is no such.

Freind. My lord, I beg your pardon, and I hope you will not take it amiss; I offer what I am advised to offer.

L. C. J. No, no, by no means, there will be nothing taken amiss.

Freind. For the statute of the 25th of Edward the third, and that of the 30th of king Charles the second, and that of the 3d of king James the first, cap. 4, here it is plainly demonstrable, that Papists are not to be believed against any Protestant, who is with them esteemed a damnable heretic; and then they believe the pope and their priests can absolve them from all oaths, and they are declared to be given to evasions, and equivocations, and mental reservations, and can have dispensations for all their villainies; and therefore they are not to be credited: their evidence is of no value unless they will in this manner upon their oaths renounce these principles: therefore I humbly beg they may have the oaths tendered them.

L. C. J. That is not our business now.

Freind. And, my lord, your lordship was pleased to promise me that if any matter of law did arise, my counsel should be heard.

L. C. J. First let us know, whether there be any such law as you mention, or to any such purpose.

Freind. My lord, I desire my counsel may come in, and speak to it: for my life is in danger, and so is every honest gentleman's life every day. I am as clear as the child unborn, I have no witnesses to prove any thing, and therefore I desire my counsel may be heard.

L. C. J. If the court did think there were any colour in this objection that you make, we would let you have counsel; we would do it; nay, we are desirous to do it if it could.

Freind. What, my lord?

L. C. J. To allow you counsel, if there were any colour in this objection in relation to Papists not being witnesses. I would be glad to see the counsel that would own this objection: but indeed, I see no colour in it: the statute shall be produced that you quote, and then we shall see, whether there be any thing like it in that statute. Pray will you read those words that you say are in that statute to that purpose?

Freind. I am not so expert to know the words before and after; and therefore I think it is requisite I should have counsel.

L. C. J. It is supposed you have had counsel, and I suppose your counsel that have advised you to make this objection, have instructed you whereabouts in the statute it is.

Freind. My lord, I desire my counsel may be called in and heard to it.

L. C. J. I tell you, that by law we cannot hear counsel to any such matter that has no colour of objection in law in it? though for my part, I wish we could, because I would fain hear what any counsel can say to make out such an objection, that Papists are not good witnesses.

Freind. My lord, I wish you would hear my counsel to it.

L. C. J. Look ye, sir John Friend, you have desired that this statute may be turned to, and you desire to have them read, and they shall be all read from the beginning to the end.

Freind. I desire the statutes of the 25th of Edward the third, the 3d of king James the 1st c. 4. and the 30th of K. Charles the 2d, may be read.

L. C. J. What chapter is that of the 30th of K. Charles the second?

Freind. Really it is not put down in my paper.

L. C. J. Then look out the chapter, while he is reading the other. Look ye, gentlemen of the jury, sir John Freind does desire the statute of the 25th of Edward 3, may be read, which is the statute about treasons, and the statute upon which he is indicted, and it shall be read, therefore pray hearken to it.

Cl. of Arr. (Reads it.) This is made in the 25th year of K. Edward the third. "A declaration which offences shall be judged treason. Item, Whereas divers opinions have been before this time, in what cases treasons shall be laid, and what not."

Freind. My lord, I beg the favour I may speak one word before it go on to be read.

L. C. J. Yes, with all my heart.

Freind. I speak it, my lord, because it will be to the very thing now in question, I am advised that consultation to levy war is no treason, without rebellion and insurrection: and inviting men to come from beyond sea is no treason, unless a foreign prince be invited to come with his own subjects; for English, Scotch, and Irish are not enemies, but rebels, and to be dealt with otherwise; therefore I leave it to your lordships, for I am no lawyer, only I am advised to insist upon these things.

Then the Statute of the 25th of Edward 3 about treasons, was read throughout, only about the middle the prisoner made some interruption.

Freind. I believe this statute is not the statute I go upon; that which I mainly insist upon, is the statute of the third of king James the first, cap. 4.

Just. Rokeby. This is the same statute you are indicted upon, the great statute for treasons; and as to your objection last mentioned, what is treason and what is not, he is not yet come to that part.

Freind. Well then, let him go on with it. (It was read to the end.)

L. C. J. Now it has been read, is this the statute you would have?

Freind. There must needs be a mistake as to the chapter, it is set down the 25th of Edw. 3. but there is no chapter.

L. C. J. Yes, this must be the statute, it relates to treasons, and it has those words in it, that what you read out of your papers relates to. Well, that we may go on in order of time, what statute of king James is it that you mention?

Freind. It is the 3d of king James 1, cap. 5. it is upon account of tendering the oaths appointed to be taken by the statute, and (reading out of a paper) to tell the court that they ought to have the oaths tendered to them.

L. C. J. That is the business of another time; read the statute.

Cl. of Arr. "An Act for the discovering and repressing Popish Recusants." What part is it?

Freind. Truly, my lord, I cannot tell.

L. C. J. It is a long statute, but if he will have it read, it must be read all.

Freind. My lord, I would not give the court any trouble, but it is about having the oaths tendered to them.

Cl. of Arr. I believe this is the paragraph, "And for the better trial how his Majesty's subjects stand affected in point of their loyalty and due obedience," &c.

A great part of the Statute was read, relating to that matter.

L. C. J. What else would you have read, sir John Friend?

Freind. I only gather from thence, that no Roman Catholic is capable of swearing against a Protestant, because the pope and the priests can absolve them from their oaths.

L. C. J. Well, what have you more to say?

Freind. My lord, I only speak this as to Roman Catholics, they do not regard an oath against a Protestant, because they have their priests that can absolve them, and therefore how such a man's oath can weigh any thing, I cannot apprehend; therefore if I have omitted any thing, I hope your lordship will supply it, as you are my counsel; for you are a counsel for me, as well as the king.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, I would help you in any thing I could.

Freind. My lord, I thank you; I desire you to help me, for I am as innocent as the child unborn, whatsoever these men have sworn: These are hard things that are laid upon a gentleman, and no man is safe at this rate, they being sworn by two Papists, who will swear any thing against Protestants.

L. C. J. Look ye, sir John Friend, have you any witnesses to produce, that these two men have any displeasure or malice against you, that they should accuse you falsely?

Freind. My lord, I am sorry I have not my witnesses; I have been so kept up, that I had not time for people to come to me; I had not my counsel to come to me before Saturday.

L. C. J. How happened that?

Freind. My lord, there was a mistake in that, I think it was Friday, either Friday or Saturday: I had them not till Friday in the afternoon: I was kept so close that none were permitted to come at me: on Thursday I had an order, but there was a mistake in the order, and I desired to get another order, but I could not get any body to get another order for me, to have my friends to go and enquire into things, or else I should have found out enough of witnesses.

Att. Gen. I am sure he had an order for counsel, at the same time that notice was given him of his trial.

L. C. J. When was that?

Att. Gen. On Tuesday, my lord.

L. C. J. What say you to it, Mr. Baker?

Mr. Baker. My lord, I did attend sir John Freind on Tuesday last, to give him notice of his trial as this day; and I at the same time told him if he would name his counsel to me, I would procure an order for them to come to him. The next morning he was pleased to name to me sir Bartholomew Shower; I took the liberty to tell him, that he being so concerned at the House of Lords, and at the committee about parliamentary business, some other persons that had named him of their counsel, notwithstanding orders were procured for him to go to them as their counsel, yet by that means they were disappointed of him, and great delay was given to the prisoners; and therefore I desired him to consider of it, and to send to sir Bartholomew Shower, and any other counsel that he had a mind to, and know their pleasures, whether they would attend him; and if he would send me word, I would procure an order for him. But not hearing from him, I went on Wednesday to him again, and he said he sent to Mr. Northey, but he would not come to him till he had spoke with sir Bartholomew Shower, but he would send me word that night, yet he did not. But the next day sent Mr. Burleigh to me to the duke of Shrewsbury's office, and brought me the names of the persons that he would have assigned him of counsel, and immediately I procured an order for it, and away he went with it. This was upon the Thursday; Mr. Welden, and Mr. Cresset, or one of them, were named in the order, I am not positive which, and Mr. Underhill, and Mr. Burleigh were to be admitted to him. Mr. Burleigh had the order; if he did not carry it to him, I cannot help that.

L. C. J. When was that order for the counsel?

Mr. Baker. It was upon Thursday, my lord.

Freind. My lord, may I speak?

L. C. J. Yes, yes, what you will.

Freind. My lord, the reason why I had not my witnesses was this: there was a gentleman, one colonel Cash, lieutenant to my lord Lucas, he undertook to go, and put in his name, and three more, one John Neale, and one Phillips to have an order to go about to look after my witnesses; but they did not put in any one of their names, but they took up and secured my kinsman Cash, and put him into the messenger's hands, and would not suffer me to have any of his assistance; therefore I saw what a design there was upon me.

Att. Gen. As for Mr. Cash, there was very good reason for it, he was secured for suspicion of treason.

L. C. J. If you had wanted any witnesses, and had not been so fully prepared as you expected to be, you should have moved before the trial came on to put it off.

Just. Rokeby. But my lord put a question to you before, can you shew any reason why these persons should have any malice against you?

Freind. My lord, I was not so much a lawyer as to know these things; but it is a hard thing, that a man that's innocent must suffer at this rate: I have been disappointed in every thing, for these gentlemen have not been permitted to answer, whether they are Roman Catholics or no.

Rokeby. Nor have your witnesses proved that they are Roman Catholics, but only that they are reputed so.

L. C. J. Well, I cannot tell what avail that would have been of, if they had been proved so. Have you any more to say, sir John Freind?

Freind. No, my lord, I leave it to God, and you, and the jury to consider of it.

Sol. Gen. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this case for the king, against sir John Freind, the prisoner at the bar; and it comes to my turn to sum up the evidence that has been given. Sir John Freind, the prisoner at the bar, cannot but own, that he hath hitherto had a very fair trial, and he shall have no reason to complain, that I do him any injury in my part. I am sure both he, and you, and all of us, very well remember, when persons of as good quality as he is, or better, had not the same usage, or liberty of defence, in such cases, as this gentleman has had: and though all things are very well now; yet the time was, within all our memories; when innocency was no safety for a man's life, much less for his liberty; and when those two are taken away, and are invaded, property signifies nothing. The time was, when the Protestant religion, and the church of England; of which the prisoner boasts himself to be, (and for a very good reason, because it is the best of religions,) I say, the time was, when that was in danger; and when Popery (for which he now reflects upon the witnesses) was like to have over-run both us and it; and if his majesty, with the hazard of his life, and at a great expence, had not rescued us, there is nobody doubts, but that all that we feared at that time, would have been made good upon us ere now. And it is a melancholy thing to consider, that there should be a sort of people amongst us, so in love with what we then dreaded, as to be continually endeavouring to bring it about again. And it is an ungrateful thing, when his majesty ventured his life then and has done it several times since to defend us, and does all that he can to keep our enemies at a distance, there should be a party of men, that do what they can to invade their country; to destroy his majesty's subjects, and to fall upon himself, when he is present amongst us. I will not accuse the prisoner at the bar particularly, though it is plain he knew of it.

Freind. Know of it? I declare before God, and the world, I know nothing of it.

Sol. Gen. This, if it were among equals were certainly a most ungrateful thing; when another person is fighting in my defence, that I should design against his life; or when he does what he can to protect my estate, I should be invading and spoiling his.

Gentlemen, if the prisoner at the bar is not guilty of what he is accused of, and what you have heard the witness give evidence of, then nothing of this doth relate to him: but if what has been given in evidence against him is true, then the prisoner at the bar is one of those persons, that has done all he can to make this country, which has been the place of retreat for all Protestants to fly to, from persecution in their own countries; I say to make it as unsafe for them, as that from which they came.

Gentlemen, The evidence against him is, first, Mr. Porter, and he gives it in evidence, that at the Old King's Head in Leadenhall-street, there was a meeting of the prisoner, and Porter and several others, in order to consider the best means, how to bring back the late king James; and they concluded at last, that the best means would be to send somebody into France, to advise the late king James to borrow of the French king 10,000 men, 1,000 horse, 1,000 dragoons, and 5,000 foot, and that he should make what speed he could to land with them here; and to encourage and invite him to do so; they promised him their assistance, and they did not doubt but to be ready to meet him with 2,000 horse at his landing.

(Witnesses), the prisoner that was pitched upon to go upon this errand, was Mr. Charnock, a person lately executed for the treasons of which he was attainted. Mr. Charnock was diffident whether this was the effect of sober consideration, and therefore would not undertake to carry this message until there had been another meeting of the same persons; to see whether they continued in the same mind. Another meeting accordingly was appointed, and agreed upon, and that was at Mrs. Mountjoy's tavern at St. James's, and there, he says, there were almost all the persons that were in Leadenhall-street, and at that meeting the question being asked, whether they were of the same opinion, that Mr. Charnock should go to France to the late king upon that message, that I told you of before? they did all agree to abide by the old resolution; that he should go, and make as speedy a return as he could, and bring back the late king's answer.

Captain Porter tells you, that Mr. Charnock did go to France, and comes and brings word back, that the French king could not at that time spare that force that was then desired; and so it was delayed at that time, because the French king was not at leisure then to employ his men in this service; but it was likely to have taken place, but very lately, if the providence of God had not prevented it.

Gentlemen, our next witness is Captain Blair, and he tells you, That about two years ago, sir John Freind, the prisoner at the bar, shewed him a commission that he had received from the late king James, to raise a regiment of horse, of which he was to be colonel; that this was signed James Rex at the top, and countersigned by my lord Melford, and it was in paper. And that there were a great many consultations between sir John Freind, himself, and others, about the raising of this regiment, and providing officers for it. He tells you he was to have been lieutenant colonel, and was to procure as many officers and troopers as he could; and he tells you, he did procure several officers; and he names them; one Fisher was to be eldest captain, one Vernati, and one Hall, and one Bertham, and that Bertham was to be lieutenant to Blair in his own troop.

Gentlemen, a great deal of the evidence which captain Blair has given, is indeed out of sir John Freind's own mouth, and that is as strong an evidence as possibly can be given; and he does for that purpose tell you, that he said one Evans was to be a captain of horse, and one colonel Slater was grown so much in sir John Freind's favour, that he raised captain Blair, in the opinion of sir John Freind; and sir John Freind for that reason would have two lieutenant colonels, whereof Slater was to be one. Captain Blair says, he took that notice; that say one besides himself should be in that post, and presented it to sir John Freind; and therefore sir John Freind found out another officer for Slater; and that was to be a captain of a troop of horse, that should consist of non-swearing persons, and which was to be an independent troop.

Gentlemen, He tells you that he did list several men, but the particular persons, though he has named the officers, he did not so distinctly remember, but they are in the paper that he delivered to the council, which he has not about him: He tells you, that sir John Freind told him, that one Richardson was another captain of horse, and the like of one Mr. Cole, that he was to be a captain likewise.

He also acquainted you, gentlemen, that he did receive from sir John Freind several sums of money, and he acquaints you in particular with the manner how; he says that sir John Freind had expended 100*l.* towards the 300*l.* that was paid for the escape of colonel Parker out of the Tower; and that sir John Freind was to be reimbursed by monies that were to be transmitted from king James at St. Germain. He tells you that Piggott had received the money, but did not deal with sir John Freind so fairly as to pay it to him; but when captain Blair was pressing on sir John Freind for some money, sir John Freind was contented that he should have 20*l.* provided he got it from Piggott out of this 100*l.* Captain Blair had not interest enough it seems to get it himself from Piggott, but he applies himself to one Harrison or Johnson, (for it seems he goes by both those names) a priest, who had an interest in Piggott, by which means he got 20*l.* of Piggott, and this he says was in June or July last.

Then, Gentlemen, he tells you afterwards, he was pressing upon sir John Freind to have another 20*l.* and sir John Freind was contented he should have it, provided he had it from Piggott, and he produces ye a letter that was from that very person, the prisoner at the bar, which is to that purpose; excusing himself that captain Blair had not heard from him, but that he would meet him at such a time, and at such a coffee-house. The matter indeed is not directly expressed in words, but at the time and place the prisoner did meet Blair, and there was Harrison and this Piggott, and there 5*l.* of the last 20*l.* was paid him; and the other 15*l.* was paid him afterwards; and he swears these two twenty pounds were paid to him by sir John Freind, upon account of the charges that Blair had been at in drinking with, and treating those men who were to be engaged with sir John Freind in his regiment.

Gentlemen, he tells you likewise, that sir John Freind told him he had written a letter to king James, and he shewed him this letter, and this was at that Piggott's mother's house; and when Blair read it, he tells you he thought it was so well penned, that he did apprehend Ferguson must have a hand in it, and that it was none of sir John Freind's own; and that upon this sir John Freind was angry, that he should suspect that sir John was not the writer of this letter; all this shews an intelligence with king James, and makes out all the rest of the intended invasion by king James, and a French force here.

Captain Blair likewise tells you, gentlemen, that sir John Fenwick had four troops of horse, as sir John Freind told him, by way of encouragement, which were all ready for the service; and that Ferguson undertook to bring a number of men, and was to be one himself in that party; and all this was to be put in practice when the Toulon fleet came about, and joined the Brest fleet. And lastly he tells you, when he went in the coach with sir John Freind, sir John told him they must act very warily, and be very good husbands, for in truth it had cost him so much, that if the fleet did not come soon, or the design should miscarry, he should want money to carry on his trade. All this positive evidence is of the witness's own knowledge from the prisoner's own mouth.

Against this evidence, gentlemen, he takes exception: that the two witnesses are Roman Catholics; but this is no exception to their evidence at all; for it was never yet allowed, or indeed objected, that I know of, before, that Roman Catholics were not good witnesses. A Roman Catholic may be an honest man, notwithstanding his religion: But, I think, that every body knows that men who have been ill in other things, though Roman Catholics, may, as to those particular things, be good witnesses. Nay, not long ago, but on Wednesday last we produced some witnesses, who were Roman Catholics, and yet allowed for good evidence, though engaged in that horrid conspiracy against the life of the king; and if any thing would have taken off their evidence, certainly the guilt of such a crime would do it, more than the pretence of any particular persuasion of religion. Nay, I must crave leave to say farther, that this argument is so far from making him no witness, that it makes it the more likely he does speak the truth, and therefore is a good witness. For though Roman Catholics may be honest men, yet they are more likely to engage in such a design than any other men. And I think I may very safely add, sir John Freind would not have found so many that he could engage in such a business as this, that were of any religion but the Roman Catholic, and therefore he applied himself to these persons, as most likely to embark with him on such a bottom.

Gentlemen, as to what Courtney, that was brought from the Gate-house, says about his discourse with captain Blair in the prison; captain Blair has upon his oath declared, that he did not go so far as to say, he did any thing against his conscience, but only Courtney bid him take care what he swore, and pressed him no farther. He pretends he came casually into Blair's chamber, but it is plain he intruded into his room; for it is sworn by the jailor, and Blair himself, that he had given directions none should come into his room but his wife, so that does not discountenance the evidence of Blair at all; and if you do believe what our witnesses have said, captain Porter and captain Blair, then sir John Freind is guilty of all the crimes that are charged upon him in this indictment, and I hope you will be so just to your prince, to your country, and to yourselves, as to find him guilty accordingly.

Mr. Cowper. If your lordship pleases, spare me a word on the same side. My lord, I do not trouble your lordship out of an apprehension that there is any thing necessary to be said to the court in this matter, or for the satisfaction of the jury, but, if possible, that we might convince the prisoner at the bar, that he has had no hard measure, in this prosecution, meted to him, but that he is proved guilty of the crime of which he stands accused, and that really there is no weight at all in the defence which he has made.

The first part of it goes to discredit one of our evidences, captain Blair, from some discourse that he would object to have passed between him and the person here produced, in the prison of the Gate-house. And the first part of that discourse was, upon Blair's first coming into the prison; and as to that time, the objection amounts to no more than this; that captain Blair would not confess, when he was pumped by a fellow-prisoner, that he was engaged in so horrid a design. What weight there is in such an objection, truly I cannot see, but will leave it to any man's judgment to consider, that a man, when he is freshly taken up on such an occasion, does not immediately confess his guilt to every body that meets him, nay, to persons that would not have liked him for making such a confession, but perhaps would have destroyed him in prison for so doing.

The other discourse was upon Friday, the next day, I think, before captain Blair went to Hicks's-hall, to his examination; and then he intrudes himself into Blair's chamber, when he lay very ill upon the bed; accosts him with a cup of brandy in his hand, and with good advice at the same time, that he should take great care in what he should say at Hicks's-hall, and the like: and then captain Blair, it seems, did express some reluctance in the thing he was going about, as if it were against his mind and inclination. If that were true, (though captain Blair denies it positively upon his oath) yet it was no more than, I am willing to observe for the prisoner, captain Blair did express here, when he first came into court; and it is no more than what is natural, since the prisoner had been his friend and intimate, and he was going to depose that against him, which was likely to prove fatal to him.

My lord, as to another part of his defence, it consists chiefly in this: the evidence brought to prove, that the king's witnesses are reputed Roman Catholics, and that the prisoner is a reputed Protestant of the church of England. If that be true too, all that can be rationally and fairly collected from thence is this, that they (the witnesses I mean) when they engaged in such a black and execrable design, might be very good Papists; but I am sure it will be agreed, that the prisoner in so doing was a very bad Protestant.

My lord, he objects to their evidence this likewise, that, if they be papists, they may be absolved by the pope, or their priests, though they should swear falsely. Possibly that may be so, for aught I know; I confess, I am not very well acquainted with the principles of that religion: but this I dare say, that every one, who has heard what has been sworn by them, will think it so great a disservice to the popish cause and interest, that it will be one of the last things their priests will ever absolve them of.

My lord, there is another matter the prisoner has thought fit to insist upon; he has brought two or three clergymen to depose, that whenever he discoursed with them (it seems at all times) he was talking about being in a plot, and very readily told his resolution not to be in any. It seems it still swam up-permost; his professions were made very causelessly: for they all say nothing introduced them; but of his own mere motion he was always declaring he was not then in a plot, nor ever would be. I have heard, that one way, weak men and children often discover their knowledge of a secret intrusted to them, is, by a repeated and unnecessary declaring, that they know nothing of the matter.

My lord, in the next place for his defence, he just offered a point of law; but the court as well satisfied him in that, that I think he waved it. He alledged, that a bare conspiracy to levy war is not treason; and the court did him right in declaring (as God forbid but they should) that it is not treason: but I desire the gentlemen of the jury would consider that the prisoner at the bar is not accused barely of a conspiracy to levy war, but you are told to what end that war was to be levied, to join the late king upon his descent into this kingdom with a French power, in order to drive his majesty out of the kingdom, and to depose him from the crown; which is a killing him in the eye of the law: and that is high-treason, by whatever means they intended to effect it; whether by war, or a stab, or any other manner, it is indifferent.

In the next place, my lord, I would not take notice of another part of his defence, which had been better let alone, wherein he admits that he was present at the two meetings he is accused to have been at by Porter; but he only differs in one point, that there was nothing talked then but general and indifferent discourse. The witnesses have sworn what the discourse was, and you will weigh the one against the other; his affirmation of a thing unlikely in defence of himself, and what is deposed upon oath by the king's witnesses to the contrary.

My lord, there is one thing more I would take notice of, and that is the evidence of Mr. Bertham, which we do not produce as a direct evidence against the prisoner at the bar, but as a confirmation of what was sworn by Blair. And it does shew that the matter sworn by Blair, was not of late devised out of malice, or otherwise, to destroy the prisoner; for that Blair acquainted Bertham with, and discoursed him about the principal matters of fact, that are now sworn, at least two years ago; and besides his evidence and the evidence of Blair concur in this particular, that he was to be lieutenant in Blair's troop.

My lord, such a concurrence of evidence and other circumstances in this matter, greatly increase the weight of the proof against the prisoner, especially when there is nothing material alledged by him in his defence, and therefore I shall trouble your lordship no further.

L. C. J. Holt. Look ye, gentlemen of the jury, sir John Freind, the prisoner at the bar, is indicted for high treason. The treason that is mentioned in the indictment is conspiring, compassing and imagining the death and destruction of the king. To prove the conspiracy and design of the king's death, there are two principal overt-acts that are mainly insisted upon. The one is the consulting and agreeing with divers others to send Mr. Charnock into France to king James, to desire him to persuade the French king to send over forces here to assist them; who were to furnish other forces for the raising of a war within this kingdom, in order to depose the king: and accordingly Mr. Charnock was sent upon that design. The other overt-act is the prisoner's having a commission from the late king, and preparing and directing men to be levied, and to be ready to be in a regiment, of which sir John Freind was by that commission to be colonel; and this was always to assist in the restitution of king James, and in order thereunto in the deposing and expulsion of king William.

These, gentlemen, I tell you, are the two overt-acts that are principally insisted upon: and to prove sir John Freind guilty of these there are two witnesses that have been produced; the one is captain Porter, who speaks to the first, the other is captain Blair, who speaks to the second.

Captain Porter tells you, That, the latter end of May, or the beginning of June last, he and sir John Freind, and others that he mentioned, were at the King's Head tavern in Leadenhall-street, and there they entered into a discourse about the returning of the late king James; and they did consider amongst themselves which was the most effectual way, and what were the most probable means to have him restored: and thereupon it was agreed amongst them, that they would send a messenger into France to him, to desire him that he would solicit the French king to furnish him with 10,000 men, to be sent into England, 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons; and they did agree, that when these forces were sent, consisting of this number of men, then they would be ready to meet and join them with 2,000 horse: every one of them was to furnish his quota: to which sir John Freind did expressly agree. The messenger that they agreed to send was with them in company; and heard the consult, which was Mr.

Charnock, who was lately tried and since executed.

This being at that time determined, Mr. Charnock intended to go upon the execution of that design, and made ready for his journey: but before he went, he had a desire to meet with the company again, and have a further discourse upon this matter, to see whether they did persevere in the resolution they had so taken. There was another meeting about a week or a fortnight after, which was at Mr. Mountjoy's, a tavern in St. James's-street, where met sir John Freind, captain Porter, and divers others of the company that were before at the King's-head. And there they entered into a debate of the matter again; the question there was, Whether Mr. Charnock should be sent into France, as it was formerly agreed? And there it was again determined he should go; to which he agreed; and captain Porter says, that he did go about two or three days after.

Mr. Porter tells you farther, That about the time that Mr. Charnock came back, Mr. Porter was in prison, and he did not see him upon his first return, but afterwards he met and spoke with him, and asked him what was the effect of his negotiation? And Mr. Charnock told him, that he had done as he was directed; that he had been with king James, and he had spoke to the French king; but the answer returned was this, That the French king had occasion for his forces that year to be otherways employed, and therefore he could not afford such a number of men that year; and Mr. Porter asked him whether he had been with the rest of the gentlemen, and acquainted them therewith? And he said he had. This is the substance of Mr. Porter's evidence; whereby you may perceive what the meetings were for, what resolutions were there taking, and what was the issue and effect of them.

The next witness is captain Blair; and his evidence goes to the other part, that is, to sir John Freind's having a commission from the late king James, and engaging him and others to be in his regiment, whereof sir John was to be colonel, and the providing of officers. And for that the evidence stands us:

Captain Blair tells ye, that about two or three years ago, he was with sir John Freind at his lodgings in Surrey-street, and there he did produce a commission that he had from king James to be colonel of a regiment of horse; he was to raise it himself, and was to appoint and provide what officers he thought fit. He says he read the commission, and it was signed at the top James Rex, and countersigned at the bottom Melfort; this he is positive in; and farther, that sir John Freind did promise that he should be lieutenant colonel of this regiment, and also that captain Blair would get as many men as he could; and that there were other officers that were appointed in that regiment, and particularly one Fisher was brought to sir John Freind by captain Blair, to be his first captain, and one colonel Slater, who was much in favour with sir John Freind, was, to have been another lieutenant-colonel; for, said sir John Freind, I have a mind to him to be my lieutenant-colonel, and though you are so too, yet it is no matter if we have two in this regiment; at which Blair took very great offence, and expressed as much to sir John Freind; whereupon sir John Freind told him, it should not be so, but said he would make another provision for Mr. Slater; that he should be a captain of an independent troop, that should be composed of non-swearing parsons, and that shall satisfy him.

And sir John Freind did intrust captain Blair with the providing of men, and managing of them. And captain Blair tells you, he was at a great deal of charge, and laid out diverse sums to caress them, and keep them together; and wanting money to proceed in that affair, he came to sir John Freind, and made great complaints, that he wanted money to carry on the design, by obliging the men to keep together, and therefore pressed sir John Freind to furnish him with some money; says sir John, There is 100*l.* due to me, because I laid down 100*l.* to further the escape of colonel Parker, and Piggott has received it, and had directions to pay it me, but I cannot yet get it. You shall have 20*l.* out of that 100*l.* if you can get it. Well, but how is that 20*l.* to be had? It seems there was one Harrison or Johnson a priest, who had some interest in this Piggott, and he was to help him to it; and thereupon the 20*l.* was actually paid the latter end of June or the beginning of July last. This 20*l.* he avears he did receive upon that account, by the direction of sir John Freind, to be so employed as you have been told.

Then captain Blair had occasion for more money, which was some time after Michaelmas last, which was to be employed as the former was: and he was very importunate to obtain it of sir John Freind: at length he did obtain it, as he tells you, and the manner how. He produces a letter under sir John Freind's own hand, which seems to be an answer to a letter that captain Blair had sent to him before, he thinks it to be his own hand, for he is acquainted with his hand-writing. But that is not all to prove it his hand, for the contents of the letter are remarkable, which are about the payment of money to Blair: The letter bears date on a Tuesday morning, and is directed to captain Blair; and a porter brought it, as he thinks, to his house; and thereby it was appointed that they should meet on Thursday next at Jonathan's coffee-house about the hour of twelve. And accordingly captain Blair came to Jonathan's coffee-house, where he accordingly met with sir John Freind, and there was Harrison the priest, and Piggott, and there he does receive a sum of money upon the same account: So that now the proof of this letter does not depend barely upon the knowledge of the hand, but the contents of it; and the subsequent meeting, at the time and place mentioned in the letter, is a great evidence that it was sir John Freind's hand writing, and more money is proved to be actually paid in the presence of sir John Freind, which is the most material part of the evidence. And you are told further, that as sir John Freind and captain Blair were going together in a coach, from Jonathan's coffee-house to St. Martin's-le-grand, there was a discourse between them: and sir John Freind said, For his part he would not stir till such time as the Toulon fleet was come about, and joined with the Brest fleet. That he did think he was in danger of being apprehended when it came about, and therefore captain Blair was to skulk till then, as he himself told him he would do, but yet he should get what men he could. And this is a great argument of his being concerned in the intended invasion, and that his making preparation for his regiment had relation to the French invasion which was expected.

It seems, two years ago, there being a great intimacy between Blair and sir John Freind as appears by all the evidence, Blair was acquainted with this design. For you are told of the letter that was writ by him to king James, which he shewed to captain Blair, and it was concerning his regiment; he says, that sir John Freind owned he writ that letter himself, that Blair did read the letter, and finding it so well penned, he said that he thought Ferguson had a hand in it, at which sir John Freind was angry; but Blair says, the letter was concerning the regiment of which sir John Freind was colonel.

Then, gentlemen, you have Bertham called to prove, that Blair did tell him, that he was to be his lieutenant colonel, which was long before there were any thoughts of any discovery of this intended invasion, and before the discovery of the plot of assassination, which sir John Freind did own he had some knowledge of, but he disliked it, and said it would ruin king James's affairs. So that, gentlemen, I think this is the sum and substance of the evidence that has been given upon this occasion against sir John Freind, to induce you to believe him to be guilty of this crime with which he now stands charged.

But now you are to consider what sir John Freind says on behalf of himself. In the first place, he makes an objection against the credit of all these witnesses, that they are not to be believed, because, says he, they are known or reputed to be Roman Catholics and Papists, and their consciences and their oaths are large, especially when they think they can do an injury to any Protestant; and therefore they are not to be allowed as witnesses, at least their credit is not sufficient to induce a jury to believe them. At first indeed, he urged there was a statute and a law that did disable them from being witnesses; but I must tell you there is no such statute, nor indeed is their being Papists any diminution at all to the credit of their testimony: For Papists are legal witnesses, and though there are severe laws to punish them for their non-conformity to the church of England, and for other their Popish practices; yet I know of no law that renders them infamous, or incapable of being witnesses. For you are to consider Papists are Christians, and swear by the same evangelists that Protestants do; and as for that supposition, that they look upon Protestants as Heretics, and can have a dispensation for any oaths that they take against them; you are to consider, as it has been very well observed by the king's counsel, that they are never like to obtain any dispensation or pardon, if they should forswear themselves to defeat the designs of the Popish party; and therefore it is a very inconsiderable objection, and in this case hath no weight.

But then he does insist upon it, that captain Blair is not to be believed; and there are two objections he makes against him. First, that he did deny that he knew any thing of the plot. For Blair being upon this occasion brought prisoner to the Gate-house, and afterwards, upon a discourse of some news in the Flying-post, wherein it was mentioned that captain Blair had confessed all, and made a full discovery, and thereupon he should say, he was innocent of the plot, and knew nothing of it. You, gentlemen, are to consider the weight of this objection. First, suppose he had said so, it might be, he was not willing (as he was not obliged) to own it, and would not confess it at that time, and to those persons. It was not his interest and prudence to be too open; and therefore it does not follow, but because a man would not trust others with his confession, but denied his knowledge of a plot when there was no occasion for him to own it, that now he swears it positively, therefore he should swear falsely.

But secondly, captain Blair, who was called for the vindication of himself, and his testimony, has upon his oath declared to you, that he did not say he knew not any thing of the plot, but did deny any concern in, or knowledge of the assassination. Now this business for which sir John Freind is tried, is not for being a party in the designed assassination, but of a design with force to depose the king, and restore king James.

Then as to the other matter that was upon Friday night last; Courtney the witness says, that he came to captain Blair's chamber, and took notice of his being to be a witness at Hicks's hall the next day, and said, I pray God direct you; and he says his wife, then present, said it was against his conscience, and he seemed to be in very great trouble about it, and owned as much. But now captain Blair himself, being examined upon his oath, does deny positively, that either he or she said any such thing as that it was against his conscience: He says, that Courtney got in to him on purpose to surprize him, and he was aware of it, and his design being to keep himself free from all company, he gave directions to the keeper (as the keeper himself swears) to let no body come to him but his wife; and Mr. Courtney intruded himself upon him.

Besides, gentlemen, you are to consider the probability of that which Mr. Courtney saith: When a man is to be a witness the next day upon a bill of indictment before a grand jury, that he should be so indiscreet, as to tell any body he was going to swear against his conscience, is strange and very unaccountable. You are therefore to consider of this whole matter, what evidence captain Blair has given, and the import of it, and the weight and credibility of that evidence which is given against him.

Then sir John Freind insists upon another matter: Says he, I am a Protestant, and it is not likely that I that am a Protestant should conspire with Papists against Protestants; and for that he has called eight witnesses, who tell you they have known him, some twenty years, some more, others ten, and that they have frequently conversed with him, and never knew that he was ever popishly affected, and they have been frequently in his company since the Revolution, and they never knew that at any time he reflected upon the government; nay, I think one said, that once he did reprove a man for talking unbecomingly of the government; that he used constantly to go to church four or five years ago (though there is no account of that since.) And particularly there is one Mr. Lupton that was his chaplain, and he tells you he was in his house; and there he read the common-prayer in the family since the Revolution, and prayed for the king, and the late queen, and sir John Freind was often present at the prayers, and particularly when he prayed for the present king, and the late queen; but he says he himself has been gone thence five years, and has been little conversant with him since.

There is another witness tells you, he has been in sir John Freind's company divers times, whom he believes to be a Protestant of the church of England, and hath had a discourse concerning the present government; and that sir John Freind said, that though he could not take the oaths, and thereby conform to the government, yet he was resolved to live quietly under it; and would not engage in any manner of plot, for he that caught him in the corn should put him in the pound.

This is the sum and substance of the evidence on both sides; and you, gentlemen, are to consider the weight of this part of his defence too, whether it be a sufficient answer to the evidence given against him, and has weight enough to out-balance what the witnesses for the king have sworn? For although he was a Protestant, yet it is plain he had no great liking to the government; and therefore would not take the oaths; and though he was present at the common prayer, when the king and queen were prayed for, yet whether he joined in those prayers is very uncertain. There are a great many, who are not very well affected to the present government, that come to church, and are present at the public prayers; but it may be a very great doubt, whether they join in their prayers for the present government or no; his conscience that scruples the taking the oaths, might scruple that too; but whether sir John Freind's being a Protestant, and his declaring he would never be in a plot, be a sufficient proof, that therefore he never was in one; and that his former discourse of that kind should discredit these witnesses, that have sworn he has been so much concerned in a Plot, you are to consider; and comparing the weight and nature of the evidence on the one side, and the other, it must be left to your determination.

Then there is another thing that he did insist upon, and that is matter of law. The statute of the 25th Ed. 3. was read, which is the great statute about treasons; and that does contain divers species of treason, and declares what shall be treason. One treason is the compassing and imagining the death of the king; another is the levying of war: Now, says he, here is no war actually levied; and a bare conspiracy or design to levy war does not come within this law against treason. Now for that, I must tell you, if there be only a conspiracy to levy war, it is not treason: but if the design and conspiracy be either to kill the king, or to depose him, or imprison him, or put any force or restraint upon him, and the way and method of effecting of these, is by levying a war, there the consultation, and the conspiracy to levy a war for that purpose, is high-treason, though no war be levied: For such consultation and conspiracy is an overt-act proving the compassing the death of the king, which is the first treason mentioned in the statute of the 25th of Ed. 3. For the words of that statute are; 'That if any man shall compass or imagine the death of the king.' Now because a man designs the death, deposition or destruction of the king, and to that design, agrees and consults to levy war, that this should not be high-treason, if a war be not actually levied, is a very strange doctrine, and the contrary has always been held to be law. There may be a war levied without any design upon the king's person, or endangering of it; which, if actually levied is high-treason; but a bare designing to levy war, without more, will not be treason. As for example; * if persons do assemble themselves, and act with force in opposition to some law, which they think inconvenient, and hope thereby to get it repealed; this is levying a war and treason, though purposing and designing it is not so: So when they endeavour in great numbers with force to make some reformation of their own heads, without pursuing the methods of the law, that is a levying of war, and treason, but the purposing and designing it is not so.

But if there be, as I told you, a purpose and design to destroy the king, and to depose him from his throne, or to restrain him, or have any power over him, which is proposed or designed to be effected by war that is to be levied, such a conspiracy and consultation to levy war, for the bringing this to pass, is an overt-act of high-treason. So that, Gentlemen, as to that objection, that he makes in point of law, it is of no force, if there be evidence sufficient to convince you, that he did conspire to levy war for such an end.*

Gentlemen, the evidence you have heard what it is, you may consider the weight of it, and the circumstances that do attend it; and likewise the answers that have been given by the prisoner to invalidate that evidence, and to prove the improbability of what they have testified against him. You have heard, I say, the evidence on the one side, and on the other: If you are not satisfied, that what the witnesses have sworn is true, that sir John Freind did engage in such a design for such a purpose, then you are to acquit him; but on the other side, if you believe that sir John Freind is guilty of what the witnesses have deposed against him, then you are to find him Guilty.

Jurymen. My lord, we desire we may have that letter with us that was produced here.

L. C. J. No, no, you cannot have it by law.

Jurymen. May it not be left with the foreman, my lord?

L. C. J. No; but you may look upon it in court before you go away, if you will.

Then the Letter was handed to the Jury, and one of them handed it to the prisoner.

L. C. J. Why do you do so? You should not give the prisoner the letter.

Jurymen. It was done to see whether it was his hand; and we desire, if there be any body here that knows his hand writing, or that saw him write it, may be produced.

L. C. J. Why? Did not he own the letter to the witness afterwards? It was sworn to you he did; and that he met according to the appointment in the letter, and that money was paid.

Then the Jury withdrew to consider of their

* "Rising with force to pull down all inclosures, to expel strangers, to pull down bawdy houses, is levying of war, and treason: but a bare purposing and designing to raise such a force, for such a purpose, is not treason." Note to former Edition. As to this, see the case of Peter Messenger and others in this Collection, vol. 6, p. 879, and the cases there referred to, together with Mr. Luders's observations thereon.

* As to this matter, see East's Pleas of the Crown, chap. 2, sect. 9, and the Stat. 36 G. 3, c. 7, s. 36. The doctrine of constructive Treason is much agitated in numerous cases in this Work. See, in particular, the Case of Lord Russell, vol. 9, p. 577, and the discussions to which it gave rise, vol. 9, p. 695, et seq.; the Case of Lord George Gordon, A. verdict, and an officer was sworn to keep them according to law, till agreed; and about a quarter of an hour afterwards they returned into court, and the prisoner was brought to the bar.

Clerk of Arr. Gentlemen, answer to your names. Thomas Clark—

Mr. Clark. Here. (And so did all the rest of the twelve.)

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen, are you agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Arr. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Arr. Sir John Freind, hold up thy hand, (which he did). Look upon the prisoner: how say ye, is he Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Guilty, my lord.

Cl. of Arr. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements had he at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

L. C. J. Jailor, look to him, he is found guilty of high-treason.

Cl. of Arr. Then hearken to your verdict as the court has recorded it. You say that sir John Freind is guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no goods, nor chattels, lands nor tenements, at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge.

L. C. J. Discharge the jury.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen, the court discharges you, and thanks you for your service.

L. C. J. Then we had best to adjourn the court till to-morrow morning.

Cl. of Arr. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyez, oyez, oyez! All manner of persons that have any thing more to do, at this general Sessions of the Peace, Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, holden for the city of London; and Gaol-delivery of Newgate, holden for the city of London and county of Middlesex, may depart hence for this time, and give their attendance here again to-morrow morning at seven o'clock; and God save the King.

Then the prisoner was carried back to Newgate, and was brought the next day to the bar to offer what he had to say for stay of judgment; and afterwards received sentence of death as a traitor.

Tuesday, March 24, 1696.

THIS day the Trial of Sir William Parkyns, kn^t. came on at the Sessions-House, Old-Bailey, for High-Treason.

Cl. of the Ar. Cryer, make Proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes. All manner of persons that have any thing more to do at this general sessions of the peace, sessions of Oyer and Terminer, holden for the City of London; and Gaol-delivery of Newgate holden for the City of London and county of Middlesex, and were adjourned over to this day, draw near, and give your attendance, for now they will proceed to the Pleas of the Crown for the same city and county: and God save the King.

Cl. of Ar. Middlesex. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, You good men of the county of Middlesex, summoned to appear here this day, to try between our sovereign Lord the king, and the prisoner that shall be at the bar, answer to your names as you shall be called, every man at the first call, upon pain and peril shall fall thereupon.

Then the Jury that were returned in the panel were all called over, and the appearances of those who answered to the call were recorded.

About ten of the clock the Judges, (to wit,) the Lord Chief Justice Holt, the Lord Chief Justice Treby, and Mr. Justice Rokeby, came into the court.

Cl. of Ar. Set sir William Parkyns to the bar. (Which was done.) Sir William Parkyns, hold up thy hand.

Parkyns. My lord, if you please, I humbly beg the favour of one word before I am arraigned. My wife coming to see me in my distress, sent up a trunk of linen for our use, and the sheriffs of London have seized it, and do detain it. It has linen in it, and all her necessary things, and all things have been torn from me, since I was apprehended, but what is there; I have nothing to subsist upon but what is there; for no money can I get from any body, nobody will pay us a farthing.

Mr. Sheriff Buckingham. My lord, we were sent for to Mr. Secretary Trumball's office, and when we came there, there was a trunk that had been seized, as belonging to sir William Parkyns; and when we came thither it was opened, and there was in it some household linen, and some plate, and Mr. Secretary Trumball was pleased, after having searched the trunk, to seal it up, and deliver it to my brother and me, to be kept; and this is all we know of it.

* See East's Pleas of the Crown, chap. 2, sect. 8, 9, and the authorities there cited. See too, in this Collection, the cases of sir Henry Vane, vol. 6, p. 119, of Messenger and others, vol. 6, p. 379; of Whitebread and others, vol. 7, p. 311; of Dummer and others, A. D. 1710, and of Deacon, A. D. 1746.

L. C. J. Hplt. Where was this trunk seized?

Sh. Buckingham. We found it in the secretary's office, and it was delivered to us there, and we gave a receipt for it to bring it down again when called for; we did not seize it.

L. C. J. Look ye, sir William Parkyns, your trunk was seized, I suppose, in order to search for papers.

Parkyns. Yes, I believe it was; but I hope it shall be delivered back now they have found nothing in it, and I have nothing else to subsist upon but what is there.

L. C. J. Is there any plate there? What is there in the trunk?

Sh. Buckingham. There is some diaper and damask linen, a carpet and some pieces of plate, two or three hundred ounces of plate, for ought I know. We had it from the Secretary's office; we did not seize it.

[Then the Judges consulted among themselves.]

L. C. J. He ought to have his plate to sell, to support him that he may have bread.

Parkyns. Will your lordship please to direct the sheriff to deliver it back?

L. C. J. Well, some care or other shall be taken in it.

Parkyns. My lord, I have nothing to subsist upon, unless I can make something of what is there: I have a wife and four children, and nothing to subsist upon.

L. C. J. Let your wife make application for it at the Secretary's, it cannot now be done here. Why did you not make complaint of it before? If you had, care had been taken in it.

Parkyns. I was told there was a petition; for, my lord, I was a close-prisoner, and they told me there was a petition; but my wife never mentioned any thing of it to me till afterwards; and they talked of an order of council that they had for the sheriff's seizing it; but when I came to enquire into it, there was no order about it, but only to search and examine it.

L. C. J. Well, some order shall be taken about it.

Sh. Buckingham. My lord, we have given a receipt to the Secretary for it.

L. C. J. But he must have wherewithal to subsist and buy him bread while he is in prison.

Sh. Buckingham. My lord, I see Mr. Burleigh there, who was sir John Freind's solicitor; I would humbly move your lordship that it may be inquired into, how he came by the pannel of the jury yesterday? For it seems to reflect upon us, as if we had given the prisoner a wrong pannel.

Just. Rokeby. No, I think there can be no reflection upon you; but I think it would be very proper to have the matter examined.

L. C. J. Ay, let Burleigh come in. [Which he did.] Pray, how came you by the pannel which you gave to sir John Freind?

Burleigh. My lord, I had three several pieces sent me by sir John Freind's friends, to the Horn tavern about three or four o'clock; and I delivered one of them to sir John Freind; but he had one before I delivered mine.

L. C. J. Who sent them to you, or brought them to you?

Burleigh. I had them brought to me by a porter.

Mr. Baker. You know you might have had it from the proper officer, for asking.

Burl. I had them brought me from Sir John Freind's friends.

L. C. J. Can you tell who had it from the sheriff?

Burl. My lord, I know not: I had three copies sent me in a quarter of an hour's time; whence they came, I know not; the sheriff knows me, and every body else.

Sh. Buck. I do know you, and would have you be fair in your practice.

Baker. The inquiry is made, because a false copy is put upon him; you might have had a true copy if you had applied yourself right.

Burl. I sent to Mr. Farrington for it.

L. C. J. The sheriff delivered it the secondary, who is the proper officer.

Just. Rokeby. Sir John Freind said he had it from him yesterday.

Burl. But he had one before; how he came by it, I can't tell; nor whence those came that were brought me in.

Just. Rokeby. If you will not take care to go to the right place, it is nobody's fault but your own, if you suffer by it.

Burl. I was with my lady, and delivered a petition for this trunk.

L. C. J. But it seems it was under the countenance of the Secretary, and direction was given to go thither: some care or other must be taken in it, and shall; but go on now to arraign the prisoner.

Cl. of Arr. Hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Thou standest indicted in Middlesex by the name of sir William Parkyns, late of the parish of St. Paul Covent-Garden, in the county of Middlesex, kt. For that, Whereas an open, and notoriously public and most sharp and cruel war, for a long time hath been, and yet is, by sea and by land, had, carried on, and prosecuted by Lewis the French king, against the most serene, most illustrious, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William the 3d, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. During all which time, the said Lewis the French king and his subjects were, and yet are enemies of our said lord the king that now is, and his subjects, You the said sir William Parkyns, a subject of our said sovereign lord the king that now is of this kingdom of England, well knowing the premises, not having the fear of God in your heart, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as a false traitor against the said most serene, most clement, and most excellent prince; our said sovereign lord William the 3d, now king of England, &c. your supreme, true, natural, rightful, lawful, and undoubted sovereign lord; the cordial love, and true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance, which every subject of our said lord the king that now is, towards him our said lord the king, should bear, and of-right ought to bear, withdrawing, and utterly to extinguish, intending and contriving, and with all your strength purposing, designing and endeavouring the government of this kingdom of England, under him our said lord the king that now is, of right, duly, happily and very well established, altogether to subvert, change, and alter; as also the same our sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to put and bring; and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England, into intolerable and most miserable slavery, to the aforesaid French king, to subdue and bring; the first day of July, in the 7th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at the parish of St. Paul Covent-Garden aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, devilishly and traitorously did compass, imagine, contrive, purpose, design and intend our said sovereign lord the king that now is, then your supreme, true, natural, rightful, and lawful sovereign lord, of and from the regal state, title, honour, power, crown, command, and government of this kingdom of England, to depose, cast down, and utterly to deprive; and the same our sovereign lord the king, to kill, slay, and murder; and the aforesaid Lewis the French king, by his armies, soldiers, legions, and subjects, this kingdom of England to invade, fight with, conquer, and subdue, to move, stir up, procure and aid; and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of our said lord the king, throughout all this whole kingdom of England, to make and cause; and that you the said sir William Parkyns, to the aforesaid enemies of our said lord the king that now is, then and there, during the war aforesaid, traitorously were adhering and aiding; and the same most abominable, wicked and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, contrivances, intentions, and purposes of yours aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect and bring to effect; and in prosecution, performance, and execution of the traitorous adhesion aforesaid, you the said sir William Parkyns, as such a false traitor, during the war aforesaid, to wit, the same 1st day of June, in the year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously; advisedly, secretly, and traitorously, and with force and arms, with one Robert Charnock, (late of High-Treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, duly convicted and attainted) and with divers other false traitors, to the jurors unknown did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent, and agree, to procure, from the aforesaid Lewis the French king, of his subjects, forces, and soldiers, then and yet enemies of our said lord the king that now is, great numbers of soldiers and armed men, this kingdom of England to invade and fight with, and to levy, procure and prepare great numbers of armed men and troops, and legions against our said sovereign lord the king that now is, to rise up and be formed; and with those enemies at and upon such their invasion and entrance into this kingdom of England, to join and unite; rebellion and war against him our said sovereign lord the king, within this kingdom of England, to make, levy, and wage; and the same our sovereign lord the king so as aforesaid to depose, and him to kill and murder. And further, with the said false traitors, the same first day of July, in the year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously you did consult, consent, and agree to send the aforesaid Robert Charnock as a messenger from you the said sir Wm. Parkyns, and the same other traitors unknown, as far as, and into the kingdom of France, in parts beyond the seas, to James the 2d, late king of England, to propose to him, and desire of him to obtain of the aforesaid French king, the soldiers and armed men aforesaid, for the invasion aforesaid to be made; and intelligence and notice of such their traitorous intentions, and adhesions, and all the premises to the said late king James, and the said other enemies and their adherents, to give and exhibit; and them to inform of the said things, particulars, and circumstances thereunto relating; as also intelligence from them of the late intended invasion, and other things and circumstances concerning the premises to receive, and them to you the said sir William Parkyns, and the said other traitors in this kingdom of England, to signify, report and declare, in assistance, animation, and aid of the said enemies of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, in the war aforesaid: and to stir up and procure those enemies the more readily and boldly this kingdom of England to invade, the treasons and traitorous contrivances, compassings, imaginations and purposes of you the said sir William Parkyns aforesaid to perfect and fulfil, and all the premises the sooner to execute, manage and perform, and the invasion aforesaid to render and make the more easy, you the said sir William Parkyns afterwards, to wit, the 10th day of February, in the year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, traitorously and with force and arms, with the aforesaid Robert Charnock, and very many other false traitors to the jurors unknown, did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent and agree, him our said sovereign lord the king that now is, by lying in wait and deceit, to assassinate, kill and murder; and that execrable, abominable and detestable assassination and killing the sooner to execute and perpetrate, afterwards, to wit, the same day and year, there traitorously you did treat, propose and consult with those traitors, of the ways, methods, and means, and the time and place where, when, which way, and how our said sovereign lord the king, so by lying in wait, the sooner might be killed and slain; and did consent, agree and assent with the same traitors, that forty horsemen or thereabouts of those traitors, and others by them and you the said sir William Parkyns to be hired, procured and paid, with guns, carbines and pistols with gunpowder and leaden-bullets charged, and with swords, rapiers and other weapons armed, should lie in wait and be in ambush our said lord the king in his coach being when he should go abroad, to attack; and that a certain and competent number of those men so armed, should set upon the guards of our said lord the king then and there attending him, and being with him, and should over-power and fight with them, whilst others of the same men so armed him our said lord the king should kill, slay, and murder; and that you the said sir William Parkyns, then and there did take upon you to provide five horses for those men which should so kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king; and also that you the said sir William Parkyns, your treasons, and all your traitorous intentions, designs and contrivances aforesaid to execute, perpetrate, fulfil and bring to effect, afterwards, to wit, the day and year last abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, divers horses, and very many arms, guns, carbines, rapiers and swords, and other weapons, ammunition and warlike things, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously secretly, and traitorously did obtain, buy, gather, and procure; and to be bought, obtained, gathered, and procured did cause, and in your custody had and detained, with that intention them in and about the detestable abominable and execrable assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king, and the invasion aforesaid, as aforesaid, to use, employ and bestow; and also your treasons and all your traitorous intentions, purposes, and contrivances aforesaid to execute, perpetrate, fulfil and fully bring to effect, you the said sir William Parkyns, afterwards, to wit, the day and year last abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly and traitorously, divers soldiers and men armed, and ready to be armed, after the said detestable, abominable and execrable assassination, killing, and murder of our said sovereign lord the king so as aforesaid should be done perpetrated and committed, to rise and muster, and war and rebellion within this kingdom of England to make and wage, and with the enemies of our said lord the king, foreigners and strangers, subjects and soldiers of the said Lewis the French king, being about to invade this kingdom of England, at and upon their invasion and entrance into this kingdom then expected to be shortly made, themselves, together with you the said sir William Parkyns, to join and unite, and into troops and legions to form, you did levy, list, and retain, and did procure to be levied, listed and retained; and those soldiers and men for the treasons, intentions and purposes aforesaid, then and there, and afterwards in readiness you had, against the duty of your allegiance, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity; as also against the form of the statute in this case made and provided.

How sayest thou, sir William Parkyns, Art thou Guilty of this high treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Parkyns. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, how wilt thou be tryed?

Parkyns. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee good deliverance.

Parkyns. My lord, If your lordship pleases to favour me with a word or two.

L. C. J. Aye, what say you, sir?

Parkyns. My lord, I have been kept in hard prison ever since I was committed, nobody has been suffered to come to me till Friday last, then my counsel came to me; and being charged with many facts as I see in this indictment, it will be necessary to have divers witnesses to clear myself of these particulars; they are dispersed up and down, and I have had no time to look after them, and therefore I beg your lordship to put off my trial till another day.

L. C. J. When had you first notice of your trial?

Parkyns. The first notice of my trial was on Wednesday last, in the afternoon.

L. C. J. That is a sufficient time of notice; sure you might have provided your witnesses, and prepared for it by this time.

Parkyns. But, my lord, being kept so close prisoner, I had no opportunity for it; for it was not possible for me to get any body to come to me till Friday noon, not so much as my counsel, and then there was but two days, Saturday and Monday, (Sunday is no day for any business) and it is impossible for me to be ready in the manner that I ought to be. It is a perfect distress and hardship upon me, to be put so soon upon my trial without my witnesses, and what should enable me to make my defence; therefore I humbly intreat your lordship to put it off till another day.

L. C. J. What witness do you want, sir William?

Parkyns. I have divers witnesses, my lord, that can give an account where I was from time to time; but they are many of them out of town, and I have sent about every way, but cannot get them together in so short a time.

L. C. J. When had he notice of his trial?

Mr. Baker. On Wednesday I told him, that he must expect to be tried this day, and withal, that if he would name me any counsel that he would have come to him, he should have an order next morning for them.

L. C. J. You were told, it seems, on Wednesday that you might have what counsel you would.

Mr. Baker. And he had an order upon Thursday morning for his counsel.

Parkyns. I could not have it without application to the court at Whitehall, and could have nobody to come to me till Thursday, and it was Friday before I could get my counsel to me.

L. C. J. You might have sent for your witnesses on Thursday, and employed somebody about that matter then.

Parkyns. The solicitor that I employed was employed otherways, and I could not employ any body else.

L. C. J. Yes; you might have employed any other about that business.

Parkyns. I had nobody to send, I was kept close, and nobody permitted to come to me.

L. C. J. Your Solicitor you desired had leave to come to you.

Mr. Baker. You know that those you sent for, you had an order for.

Parkyns. I could not get him till Thursday to me, I had no messengers to send till then.

Mr. Baker. I gave the keeper direction, to let him have persons come to him to send on any errand.

L. C. J. The keeper had orders, it seems, to let any messenger come to you; and he would have helped you to somebody to send of this errand, to be sure.

Keeper. I always did it, as soon as I know they have notice of their trial.

Parkyns. But the keeper is not always in the way; and besides, when I had notice given me of my trial, it was execution day, and he was not at home that day.

L. C. J. He names no witnesses, only he says he has divers witnesses, neither is there any oath made of any witnesses; pray how long is it since you were committed?

Parkyns. I was committed this day fortnight.

L. C. J. Your commitment charged you with high-treason, and therefore you knew what you stood accused of; were you not committed for high-treason?

Parkyns. Yes, my lord, I believe I was.

Sol. Gen. (Sir John Hawles) My lord, he had a very fair time to prepare for his defence, for he saw his name in the proclamation a good while before he was taken, and there it is declared what he stands charged with.

L. C. J. You might have had a copy of your commitment, you had a right to have it, and thereby you might have seen what you were accused of.

Keeper. We never deny it, if it be demanded.

L. C. J. You cannot deny it; you know what penalty you are under if you do.

Parkyns. Nobody was permitted to come to me.

L. C. J. You might have asked for a copy, or any body else; for you had notice of your trial so long ago as Wednesday last.

Mr. Baker. I gave him notice of his trial on Wednesday, and then told him he must prepare for it against this day; he said he would endeavour to petition for a longer time; I told him it would be in vain, for he must prepare for his trial to day, and could have no longer time.

L. C. J. Sir William, truly we do not see any reason to put off the trial upon these suggestions.

Parkyns. My lord; it is very hard; then I humbly beg I may have the favour, that I may have counsel allowed me; I have no skill in indictments.

L. C. J. We cannot allow counsel.

Parkyns. My lord, if I have no counsel, I do not understand these matters, nor what advantage may be proper for me to take in these cases.

L. C. J. You are not ignorant, sir William, that counsel has been always refused when desired in such cases.

Parkyns. My lord, there is a new act of parliament that is lately made, which allows counsel.

L. C. J. But that does not commence yet, sir William.

Parkyns. My lord, it wants but one day.

L. C. J. That is as much as if it were, much longer time: for we are to proceed according to what the law is, and not what it will be.

Parkyns. But it is declarative of the common law, because it says it was always just and reasonable.

L. C. J. We cannot alter the law till law-makers do it.

Parkyns. Will your lordship be pleased to let it be read?

L. C. J. Ay, if you have a mind to it, it shall be read.

Parkyns. Yes, if your lordship pleases.

L. C. J. Read it.

Cl. of Arr. (Reads.) "An Act for regulating of Trials in Cases of Treason, and imprisonment of treason." (7 Will. and M. Cap. 3.)

All the first paragraph of the new Act was read.

L. C. J. Look ye, sir William Parkyns, this law has not taken any effect as yet; but the law stands as it did before the making of this act.

Parkyns. But, my lord, the law says it is just and reasonable that it should be so.

L. C. J. We go according to the law as we find it is.

Parkyns. And, my lord, what is just and reasonable to-morrow, sure is just and reasonable to-day; and your lordship may indulge me in this case, especially when you see how straight notice I have had, and what a little time has been allowed me, that I am not able to make any defence.

L. C. J. We cannot make a law, we must go according to the law; that must be our rule and direction.

Parkyns. Yes, my lord, but what is just and reasonable, suré is law: the law is grounded upon reason.

L. C. J. The parliament has thought fit to make such a law, which is to commence from the 25th of this month: it is not a law till the time comes that the parliament hath appointed for its being a law.

Parkyns. But, my lord, if my notice had been a convenient notice, I had been within the time limited by the act of parliament; and no one can want the advantage of that act from henceforward, nor suffer for such want but myself, which is a particular hardship upon me.

L. C. J. We cannot alter the law, we are bound by our oaths to proceed according to the law as it is at present.

Parkyns. Pray, my lord, let it be put off till another day then.

L. C. J. You shew no reason for it; you name no witnesses that you want; nor have we any oath that we ought to have in such a case.

Parkyns. I will do both if your lordship will oblige me to it.

L. C. J. There ought to be an oath certainly; but we think you have had fair and convenient notice: for you have had as much notice as sir John Freind had, who was tried yesterday.

Parkyns. As I am informed, he was charged with single facts about the town, but I am charged with many particular things more than he was.

L. C. J. The act of parliament says nothing of notice of trial; that still continues as it was before; and you have had very convenient notice: go on, Mr. Hardesty, to swear the jury.

Cl. of Ar. Sir William Parkyns, you the prisoner at the bar, Those men that you shall hear called and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, you are to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn, Parkyns. I hope your lordship will be of counsel for me then.

L. C. J. So we will; we will do you all the right we can. Look ye, you know you may challenge 35 without cause, and as many as you will with cause, but no more than 35 without cause.

Cl. of Ar. Sir Goddard Nelthorpe.

Mr. Hardesty. I will tell you presently, Sir.—You have challenged twenty-five.

Parkyns. But there are two that I gave reason for: Do you put them in among them? that is, Mr. Hancock and Mr. Tylor as the king's servants.

Cl. of Ar. You may speak to my lord about it; but if that be allowed, then there are but twenty-three.

Parkyns. Well, Sir, go on then.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Heames.

Parkyns. I have no exception to him. (He was sworn.)

L. C. J. Sir William Parkyns, you have challenged two, and have assigned the cause of your challenge, that is, Hancock and another, and the reason of your challenge is, because they are the king's servants. I am to acquaint you, that is no cause of challenge; but however, the king's counsel do not intend to insist upon it, if there are enough besides. They are willing to go on with the pannel; and I speak this, because I would not have it go for a precedent, nor have it understood that the cause you assign is a good cause: But however they will not stand with you, if there be enough to serve.

Parkyns. My lord, I submit to it; the jury is full, I think.

Cl. of Ar. No, these are but eleven sworn yet.

Parkyns. But how far have I gone in my challenges?

Cl. of Ar. There are four which you may challenge more.

Parkyns. There are two allowed me, though it be not a precedent: Are there four still?

Cl. of Ar. Yes, you may challenge four more, and no more. Edward Thompson.

Parkyns. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Nicholas Rufford.

Parkyns. I have no exception of him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, countez. William Northey.

Cryer. One, &c. (and so the rest till the twelve.)

Cl. of Ar. Nicholas Rufford.

Cryer. Twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyez, if any one can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeant, the king's attorney-general, or this inquest now to be taken, of the High-Treason whereof the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance; and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance.—And all jury-men of Middlesex that have appeared, and are not sworn, may depart the court.

The names of the twelve sworn were these; William Northey, Edward Gold, Daniel Thomas, Henry Whitecote, Robert Bampton, Thomas Sutton, Thomas Edling, Robert Sanderson, Ralph Marsh, John Whiston, Thomas Heames, and Nicholas Rufford.

Cl. of Ar. Sir William Parkyns, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause: He stands indicted by the name of sir William Parkyns, late of the parish of St. Paul Covent-Garden, in the county of Middlesex, knight, that whereas (prout in the Indictment, mutatis mutandis), and against the form of the statute made and provided. Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are; your charge is to inquire, whether he be guilty of the high treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty; if you find that he is Guilty, you are to inquire what goods and chattels, lands, tenements, he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since: If you find him Not Guilty, you are to inquire whether he fled for it; if you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty; if you find him Not Guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more; and hear your evidence.

Mr. Mountague. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury—Parkyns. My lord, your lordship was pleased to say, you would be my counsel. I am ignorant in matters of indictments, I beg if there be any fault in it, you will let me know it.

L. C. J. Truly I have observed no fault in it; I do not know of any.

Mr. Mountague. Gentlemen, this Indictment does contain as heavy an accusation as can be laid upon any man, for it not only charges the prisoner with a traitorous design of subverting the government, and raising war and rebellion within this kingdom; which was to be done by adhering to the king's enemies, and promoting a foreign invasion, but likewise with a conspiracy against the life of the king, which was to have been taken away by a bloody assassination.

Gentlemen the indictment sets forth, that sir William Parkyns, the prisoner at the bar, did meet several times with Charnock, and other false traitors; and there it was consulted and agreed, how they should procure French forces to land within this kingdom; and then they were to raise rebellion amongst his majesty's subjects, to join with the invaders. Mr. Charnock was sent from the prisoner at the bar and the rest, as a messenger into France, unto the late king James, to acquaint him with this bloody design, and to desire him to borrow of the French king as many troops as he could spare, to make a descent upon this kingdom; and they at the same time were to facilitate the descent, by getting as many men as they could to make the assassination; and the number of forty was pitched upon, who were to be provided for that purpose; of which the prisoner at the bar was to find five, who were to lie in wait with the rest, and set upon the king as he came along in his coach, upon his return from hunting. Some were to assault and attack the guards, while others were barbarously to assassinate and murder the king in his coach: And particularly it charges the prisoner with undertaking to procure and provide five horses and arms, that were to be employed in this bloody assassination; and also with gathering together great quantities of arms and ammunition that were to be used in the insurrection. To this indictment the prisoner has pleaded Not Guilty; if he be not guilty, God forbid he should be convicted! But if he be guilty, and we prove the fact, the nation expects that you will do justice to the king and kingdom, and find him so.

Att. Gen. (sir Tho. Trevor). May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury; the prisoner at the bar, sir William Parkyns, stands indicted of high treason, for compassing the death of his majesty, and adhering to his majesty's enemies: and the overt-acts laid in the indictment to prove this treason are, That he with others had several meetings and consultations about this design; and sent a messenger over to France to the late king James, to procure French forces to invade the kingdom, to depose the king, and subject the kingdom to a French power: and likewise that he did enter into a conspiracy with several persons for the assassination of his majesty's royal person. These are the overt-acts mentioned in the indictment, to prove this charge of treason against the prisoner.

Gentlemen, the evidence to prove these overt-acts, and which we shall produce, will be in this manner: it will appear that the prisoner at the bar, sir William Parkyns, has had a commission from king James to raise a regiment of horse; and about May last, he with several others had a meeting at the Old King's Head, in Leadenhall-street, where were present my lord of Ailesbury, my lord Mountgomery, sir William Parkyns, sir John Freund, sir John Fenwick, Mr. Charnock, Mr. Porter, and one Mr. Cook; and Goodman came in to them after dinner. And at that meeting it was consulted and concerted among them, how they should bring back the late king James, and depose his present majesty; and in order to that, they did resolve to send Mr. Charnock as a messenger to the late king James, to desire him to obtain from the French king 10,000 men to invade this kingdom; 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, 1,000 dragoons; and to encourage the late king to this, they did assure him by the same messenger, that they would meet him with 2,000 horse upon his landing; and they did all undertake and agree that they would do it; and Mr. Charnock undertook to go of this message.

Gentlemen, about a week after this meeting, Mr. Charnock not being willing to go upon this errand without a good assurance that they intended to perform what they had resolved upon, they therefore had another meeting of most of the same persons that were at the former, and particularly the prisoner at the bar was one; and that was at Mrs. Mountjoy's, a tavern in St. James's-street. And at that meeting they did all agree, as formerly, and continued in their former resolution, to send Mr. Charnock to assure the late king, that they would meet him, according as they had promised, if he would give them notice where he was to land, and he should not fail of their assistance. And at these meetings they did take notice, that then was the most proper time for such an invasion: for the king was gone to Flanders, most of the forces were drawn thither, and the people were dissatisfied, and so it would be the fittest opportunity to accomplish their design. And they desired Mr. Charnock to make haste to carry this message, and to intreat king James that he would be speedy and expeditious in his coming, that they might not lose this season.

Gentlemen, after these meetings, Mr. Charnock did within a few days go over into France, and did deliver his message to the late king James; who took it very kindly, but said that the French king could not spare so many forces that year, having other work to employ them about: upon which, within a month's time, or less, he came back again, and brought an account of his message to those gentlemen who sent him. This was in May or June last, and so the further prosecution of the design ceased at that time.

But, gentlemen, the last winter it was revived again, and attempted, and carried on very near to the obtaining a fatal success. And you will hear, that the prisoner at the bar, sir William Parkyns, has had too great a hand, and been a very great instrument in both the parts of this wicked conspiracy and treason; not only in the invasion, which he with others sent the messenger over to procure; but also in the other part, the blackest part, even the assassination of the king's person.

About January last sir George Barclay, a lieutenant of the Guards to king James in France, was sent over into England to engage persons to join in the conspiracy and assassination; and for his assistance there were sent over with him, and before and after him, some 20 troopers of the late king's, that were his guards in France. And sir George Barclay, to encourage the persons that were to join, and whom he had brought over with him, pretended an authority to justify it, that is, a commission from the late king James; and he communicates this design to Mr. Charnock, Mr. Porter, and several others, and amongst the rest to the prisoner at the bar, sir William Parkyns, having a great confidence in him, and did acquaint him he had such a commission, and he shewed it him, and that commission was to levy war against the king's person; which they took to be a sufficient authority for them to assassinate the king's person.

Gentlemen, in order to the accomplishing this horrid conspiracy, there were several meetings and consultations had, at which the prisoner at the bar was present, and very active. Sometimes they met at captain Porter's lodgings, at another time at the Nag's-Head in Covent-Garden, at another time at the Sun in the Strand, and another time at the Globe in Hatton-Garden, in order to accomplish this design: and at these meetings you will hear they did propose several ways and methods for the execution of it; and several persons, particularly one of them that have suffered the punishment of the law for this, were appointed to go and view the ground, where the king's person might most conveniently be assaulted. Mr. King, that was executed for it, was one, captain Porter was another, and one Knightley was the third; and these did go to see the ground. And the day before they went there was a meeting, at which was present the prisoner at the bar, and others, wherein it was concluded upon, that they should go; and they went accordingly to see the most convenient place for it. They went to Brentford, and afterwards to the other side of the water to Richmond, and surveyed all the ground; and the place they pitched upon as the most proper for their purpose, was, when his majesty should return from hunting, to do it in the lane betwixt Brentford and Turnham-Green. And accordingly, when they returned in the evening, they came by appointment to the place where the rest of the accomplices were to meet, at the Nag's-Head tavern in St. James's, and gave an account of their proceedings; and at that meeting likewise was sir William Parkyns, the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Charnock, and several others; and upon the report of captain Porter and Mr. King's expedition, they did resolve the thing should be done in that place, and that it should be done in this manner.

Sir George Barclay with about eight or ten in his party, who were to be chosen out of all the other parties, were to assault the king's coach, and endeavour to kill the king, and all the rest that were in the coach with him, whilst the others in two parties were to attack the guards; and the number in all was to be about 40. This was fully agreed upon.

And, gentlemen, the first time that they resolved to put this traitorous design in execution, was the 15th of February, which was a Saturday, the usual day that the king was wont to go a-hunting on; but it happened by great providence, that the king did not go abroad that day.

They had contrived further, to make the thing sure, that there should be two persons, whom they called orderly men, who should be placed at Kensington, to give notice when the king went abroad; and Chambers was one, and Durance that was a Flensing was another; and Durance was likewise employed to view the inns about Turnham-Green and Brentford, for the lodging of their men, who were to be placed two or three in an inn, that they might not be observed.

Gentlemen, the first day appointed for the accomplishing this design, which was the 15th of February, being over, and they disappointed; yet they did afterwards resolve to go on and execute it. And the next Saturday, which was the 22d of February, was pitched upon for the time of execution; and accordingly on Friday the 21st of February, the day before, there was a meeting at the Nag's-head in Covent-Garden; and there was present sir George Barclay, capt. Porter, and several others, and amongst the rest the prisoner at the bar was there: they had at first some discourse among them that they were in doubt, because of the first disappointment, whether there had not been some discovery, but that doubt was soon over; for it was said, it could not be so, for then they should not have been there together. That seemed probable, and the disappointment was imputed to some accident; and that gave them new assurance to go on, and they were resolved to do it in the same manner, as they had formerly resolved, on the next day, which was Saturday.

Gentlemen, at that meeting Mr. Porter acquainted them, that he had the misfortune to have some of his horses fallen sick or lame, and he acquainted the prisoner with it; and sir William Parkyns was careful to supply him with other horses, and told him, he could get a note from one Lewis, who I think is major of the horse to my lord Feversham, to get three horses; and accordingly he did send a note for three horses to Mr. Lewis.

Upon the 22d of February in the morning, which was the time for the execution of this bloody conspiracy, they had met together, and resolved to go on with it, and put it in execution; and that they had notice from Chambers, that the king did go a-hunting that day, and there was great joy among them all, thinking themselves sure; and so they ordered all things to be got ready. But afterwards, about one o'clock, there came other news, that the king did not go abroad, but the guards were all come back in great haste, their horses being all of a foam, and the king's coaches were sent back to the Mews; then they began to be in a great consternation, and they thought the thing had taken air, and was discovered. This, gentlemen, is a short account how it will appear upon the evidence, as to the conspiracy of assassinating the king, and several meetings, and consultations about it; at which the prisoner at the bar, sir William Parkyns, was present.

But, gentlemen, there will be a little more evidence, if it be necessary, to confirm this former evidence, and to shew the part that the prisoner at the bar had in this treasonable, this barbarous conspiracy; for it will appear, that as the prisoner had a commission from the late king James to raise a regiment of horse, and had sent a messenger into France to invite the late king over, with 10,000 French; so he had made great preparation of arms to be ready for that purpose. About Michaelmas last the prisoner at the bar sent a parcel of goods, as he called them, which were put into cases, I think they were about eight small boxes, put into very large cases, and sent down by his order into the country, unto one Haywood. It seems this Haywood had married Mr. Chatnock's sister; and Charnock writ a letter to him, and desired that he would give sir William Parkyns leave to lodge some goods there, which were of great value, and he durst not trust them at his own house in Warwickshire, because his servants were not there to look after them; and accordingly upon that letter Mr. Haywood did give leave that the goods should be carried thither, and they were so, and there they were locked up privately, and kept till this barbarous conspiracy was discovered; then you will find, the prisoner at the bar sent his own servant down, the Tuesday after the discovery, and gave him orders immediately (his name is Eubank, and he is the groom, and looks after his horses) to go down to Warwickshire to one Evans, who carried the goods, and desire him with all speed to remove those goods, and to take care to remove them privately, and to secure them, and to hide them. And accordingly on Wednesday he came there, which was Ash-Wednesday; and acquainted Evans with what sir William had ordered him, and they went that very night with a cart to Mr. Haywood's; and though it was late, and they were desired to stay till the next morning, they would not; they said they could stay no longer but would remove the goods immediately, and accordingly they were carried from thence that night, to sir William Parkyns's own house in Warwickshire; and there they were buried in the garden. These goods that were of this great value were put into the ground to preserve them. But after this discovery, sir William Parkyns being accused, and his name put in the proclamation, and search being ordered to be made at his house, these goods that lay hid at Haywood's, and upon the removal thence were thus buried in the ground, came to be discovered, and the cases were broken open, and then they did appear to be goods of an extraordinary nature indeed, for you will find they were horse arms for troopers; there were two and thirty carbines, five and twenty cases of pistols, and about forty odd swords without hilts upon them, but the hilts lay loose by them; so that this will make it apparent, without dispute, how far the prisoner at the bar has engaged in this conspiracy, and what preparations he had made for the execution of it.

Gentlemen, it will appear further against the prisoner at the bar, that he hath had a considerable number of horses, that have frequently been brought up from his house in Hertfordshire, to the George-inn in Holborn.

But before we come to that, I would acquaint you with another particular part of our evidence, that is precedent in point of time. About Christmas last, the prisoner did acquaint one Sweet, who is an officer in the Excise, (and I am very sorry that we should have any such officers that should be thought fit to be intrusted with secrets of this nature) sir William Parkyns acquainted this Sweet, and gave him an account that he had long had an assurance that king James would land; but now he had it under his own hand, that he would land very speedily, and that he had made preparations for that purpose to meet him. That great things were expected from him; that his own troop was ready, and it consisted chiefly of old soldiers; and that several persons who had been officers would be volunteers under him. He said he intended to go into Leicestershire, and there he was to meet several gentlemen from the North, and from the West, to consider and settle a correspondence how to meet the late king upon his landing; and accordingly sir William Parkyns did go; and you will have an account that he came to Leicester on Friday night, one Sendamore went along with him; there he staid all Saturday, and a good part of Sunday. There came several persons to him while he was at Leicester, particularly one captain Yarborough, the son of sir Thomas Yarborough, and a parson, who said they came as far as from York to meet sir William Parkyns at Leicester; and there was great resort thither at that time, as you will hear from the witnesses. Sir William Parkyns came back again from Leicester to Brick hill that night and returned to his own house on Monday night; and after his return, he acquainted this Sweet, that he had been his journey to Leicester; that he met with several gentlemen there from the North, and other places, and had settled a correspondence, and had found them all fully engaged, and well inclined; all went well, and there was no danger of any miscarriage at all; and this was about January last, that this expedition was made by the prisoner.

And now, gentlemen, as to that particular about the horses, which were so frequently brought up this last winter from his house in Hertfordshire, to the George-inn in Holborn, there is one very unfortunate circumstance that attends this matter; that is, that these horses were brought to town just the several nights before the king was to be assassinated; for upon Thursday the 13th of February, he being in town, sent directions to his groom to bring up three of his horses on Friday, which was the 14th in the afternoon, and all these horses were furnished with pistols and furniture for troopers; according to those directions his servant brought up the three horses, and he came and acquainted his master that they were brought up according to his order; sir William Parkyns was then at his lodgings, which were in the same house where Mr. Charnock did lodge; when his man had told him the horses were come, he pretended at first that he had some thoughts of going out of town that evening, but that he had changed his mind, and would go in the morning; and he would have the horses ready against the next morning, which was Saturday the 15th, the first day upon which the assassination was intended to be put in execution.

The next morning when his man came to him again, he had changed his mind, and he would not go out of town in the morning, but he would go in the afternoon: and it will appear that he did not go out of town that day, nor the next day, nor till Monday; and then the design had miscarried by the king's not going abroad a Saturday, and the horses were carried back; and when he went out of town upon Monday, one Holmes went along with him, and he went with him to his house in Hertfordshire; and there he staid until Friday after, which was the day before the next time that was appointed for the execution of the assassination. And upon the Friday they came up again, and then there were more horses, four or five, that were brought up that day; and all of them with pistols, and jack-boots, and other furniture and accoutrements for troopers; and these came to the George-inn, where sir William Parkyns gave his man, Eubank, particular orders to be very early the next morning at Kensington; that was the 22d, and he was to go, as he told him, to one Brown, that he said was concerned in the king's kitchen, and lived two doors off the gate that turns up to the king's house; and he was to tell him he was sir William Parkyns's servant, but that he came from a man that lodged at a confectioner's house over against Gray's inn; in which place, by the description of the person, you will find sir George Barclay lodged.

The man went accordingly at eight o'clock in the morning to Kensington, and inquired out this Brown, and met with him, and told him he was sir William Parkyns's servant, but came from the gentleman that lodged at the confectioner's in Holborn. Brown said he had nothing to say to him, but bid him give him his almanack, and he writ in it, that he would be in town in two hours himself and wait upon him; and bid him carry that to the man that lodged at the confectioner's: And this Brown by the circumstances of the whole must probably be one of the orderly men who lodged at Kensington, to give notice when the king and the guards went out.

Sir William Parkyns's servant came back to the confectioner's house, and there he met with a man that went by the name of Rogers; he will tell you he was a Scotch man, for he spoke broad Scotch, and he will give you a particular description of the man, by which, I believe it will appear that it was sir George Barclay. Sir William Parkyns's servant, after he had delivered his message to this Rogers, came back to his master, and told him he had done his errand according as he was ordered; and sir William Parkyns asked him what Rogers said, and he told him that he bid him tell his master, if he would come to him, he would be ready at home for him. This was upon Saturday morning the 22d of February.

About eleven-a-clock that day sir William Parkyns, and this Lewis that we spoke of before, came to the George-Inn; and there sir William Parkyns asked his servant whether he had received any more than two saddles, for there were two saddles sent in thither, according to an order that had been given, to furnish two other horses that stood there at the George-Inn, and which sir William Parkyns told his groom belonged to two friends of his, and bid him be sure to take care of them, and to see them well fed, and ordered two saddles to be bought for them. Lewis said he did think they had more than two; but you will see by the evidence that this same Lewis had provided thirty saddles for sir William Parkyns; but there seemed to be a controversy between them at that time how many had really been sent in, and Lewis affirmed there was twenty-four; but sir William Parkyns said, I have had but twenty-two of the thirty yet, for I have but two brought in here, and I had twenty before. This you will hear fully proved; and I think it is impossible for any body to believe, but that all this preparation of saddles, pistols, boots, and other things, must convince any body of the prisoner's being so far engaged in this design, that he can never answer it without giving you a very good account what this preparation was for.

Gentlemen, a great part of this will be proved to you by one that acted in it, as a servant to sir William Parkyns, that is, as to the coming up of the horses, jack-boots, pistols, and other arms at that time; and that when on the last Saturday it was disappointed, all the horses, not only those sir William Parkyns brought, but the other two, went away in a great hurry and confusion, and nothing was ever heard of them more; and that will be proved by the servants in the very inn.

Gentlemen, I have now opened to you the nature and state of the evidence; we will call our witnesses, and make it out very undeniably and substantially, and therefore I will not give you any farther trouble.

Sol. Gen. Call Mr. Porter. (Who was sworn.) Mr. Porter, pray will you give the court and the jury an account of the meeting at the King's-Head in Leadenhall-street; and who was there, and what resolutions and agreements they came to?

Capt. Porter. About the latter end of May last, or the beginning of June, there were two meetings had, the one was at the King's-Head in Leadenhall-street, the other was at Mrs. Mountjoy's near sir John Fenwick's. At the first meeting there was my lord of Ailesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Freind, sir William Parkyns the prisoner at the bar, sir John Fenwick, capt. Charnock, Mr. Cook, and myself. Mr. Goodman came in after dinner, and there we consulted which was the best way for king James's coming in; and we all resolved to send a messenger to him, to invite him over, and to desire him to interpose with the French king for the getting 10,000 men to come over with him, 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons. It was then considered who should be sent; and all the company agreed Mr. Charnock was the properest person. Says Mr. Charnock, if you send me, pray tell me what errand I shall go upon: We did likewise then agree, that he should assure the king, if he would come over at such a time, we would meet him with a body of 2,000 horse.

Att. Gen. Did Charnock undertake to go upon that message?

Porter. Yes, he did, and to propose this matter to him, that he might propose it to the French king for the getting of the men.

Sol. Gen. Before you go away, I desire to ask of you one thing, did sir William Parkyns, the prisoner at the bar, agree to the message?—Porter. Yes, he did.

Sol. Gen. Had you any other meeting about this business, and when was it, and who was there?

Porter. My lord, captain Charnock said at first he would not go of a foolish message; and thereupon we all agreed to be at the head of 2,000 men to meet king James at his landing, and every one should bring his quota.

Att. Gen. When was the second meeting, and where was it, and who was there, and what was agreed upon?

Porter. The second meeting was at Mrs. Mountjoy's, where captain Charnock desired us once more to meet, before he went away, to know whether we kept to our first resolution? And we did agree to what was resolved upon at first, and he said he would go in two or three days time.

Att. Gen. Did the company agree to it then?

Porter. Yes, they did, Sir, all that met at that time.

Sol. Gen. Pray name them over again who they were?

Porter. Sir William Parkyns was actually there, and my lord of Ailesbury, and sir John Freind, and captain Charnock, Mr. Cook, and myself; I cannot tell whether my lord Montgomery was there, or Mr. Goodman.

Att. Gen. Pray when did you see captain Charnock, or speak with him, after that?

Porter. It was when I was in prison about the riot, and he told me he had been there; but there would be nothing done in that matter at present, for king James said, the French king could not then spare so many men, though he thanked us for our kind offer: and he said he had been with my lord of Ailesbury, sir William Parkyns, and the several other people of quality, which he did not name, and had carried them the particular messages that he had in command from the king to carry to them.

Att. Gen. Now, pray tell us, what you know about the design of assassinating the king, and what hand the prisoner at the bar was to have in it?

Porter. About some weeks before I heard of the assassination, I came to lodge in the house in Norfolk-street, where capt. Charnock lodged; and where sir William Parkyns lodged when he came to town. Most commonly we used to go in the evening to the tavern, or drink a bottle of wine at our own lodgings; and one morning I asked Mr. Charnock, if I should see him at night? He said he was engaged in private company for that night, and he could not go with me to the tavern. For, says he, there are some gentlemen that are lately come from France, and there is something to be done for the king's service. If there be so, says I, pray let me be concerned: Says he, they are but newly come, and they will see nobody else but me at present. A little after I fell sick of a fit of the gout, and Mr. Charnock came to visit me, and we fell into discourse, and I asked him about those gentlemen that were come from France, what they came about? He told me it was sir G. Barclay that came from France, and several other officers with him, and that he had a commission from the late king James to levy war against the person of king William, or the prince of Orange, as I think it was named in the commission.

L. C. J. Who told you this?

Porter. It was capt. Charnock. He desired to know how many men I could bring. I desired a little time to consider; but I said there would be a great many would join if the king landed, whom I did not think fit to trust with a thing of this nature before-hand. Some few days after, capt. Charnock came into my chamber, and brought sir George Barclay, and major Holmes that said he was come from France; and there we had little more but a general discourse: But a little after that I got well of the gout, and we had several meetings at several places; at the Globe-tavern in Hatton-garden, at the Nag's-head in Covent-Garden, and at the Sun in the Strand, where sir William Parkyns was always present. And there we did consult of the best ways to assassinate the king, as he came from Richmond after hunting. Sir George Barclay said, he had received 800*l.* from king James's secretary towards the buying of horses, and furnishing both horses and men for the expedition; and it was considered of how many men it would be necessary to bring. The number agreed upon was about forty, of which sir George Barclay was to provide twenty; I promised to bring seven or eight, sir William Parkyns engaged to bring five, whereof three should be mounted with his own men, and the other two my men were to mount upon.

Att. Gen. Do you know the names of those people that he was to mount?

Porter. I never had the names myself.

Att. Gen. Well, what was done after these consultations?

Porter. I asked captain Charnock one time; if I might not see the commission that king James had given: He said he had never seen it himself, but sir William Parkyns had. I asked sir William Parkyns, one evening as we were smoking a pipe by the fire-side, whether he had seen the commission? He said, he had; and that because king James would not trust any of his ministers, it was written and signed with the king's own hand.

Att. Gen. Pray did he tell you what it was for?

Porter. He said it was for raising and levying war upon the person of the king, but I do not know whether he called him king William, or the prince of Orange; but I suppose it was the prince of Orange.

Att. Gen. Pray then give us an account of your going to view the ground, where it was most convenient to do the business.

Porter. There were several propositions about the place where it was to be done; one was to be on the other side of the water by ambuscade in Richmond Park, the other was to be on this side of the water after the king was landed. Sir G. Barclay was for that that was upon the other side of the water; I thought that it would take up too much time to go over thither, that it was better to be done on this side; but because there was difference of opinions, it was resolved upon that somebody should be appointed to view the ground; and I was appointed for one, Mr. Knightley for another, and Mr. King would needs go with us for a third, and we three did go. We lay all night at Knightsbridge, and the next day went and viewed the grounds on both sides the river; and came back that evening to the Nag's-head according to appointment, where was sir William Parkyns the prisoner, and sir George Barclay, and Mr. Charnock, and we gave an account that we had viewed both places: And upon our report it was resolved, that it should be done on this side of the water, in the lane between Brentford and Turnham-
Green.

Att. Gen. Are you sure sir William Parkyns, the prisoner at the bar, was there, at that meeting at the Nag's head?—Porter. Yes, he was.

Att. Gen. Did he agree to the resolution?

Porter. It was in general agreed to by all that were there.

Att. Gen. Pray, captain Porter, then give us an account of the days that were fixed for the execution of this design?

Porter. There was Saturday the 15th, and Saturday the 22d, because Saturday was the day the king used to go a-hunting and shooting.

Att. Gen. Were there any men at Kensington, to give you notice when the king went abroad?

Porter. There were two men that had a lodging at Kensington, the one was one Chambers, who belonged to captain Charnock, and the other was a Fleming, one Durance, who came over with sir G. Barclay, and he went every day, and thrust himself among the guards to bring intelligence.

Sol. Gen. What was the reason the design was not executed?

Porter. The first day, Durance brought notice in the morning that the guards were gone abroad; and afterwards there came notice, that the king would not go abroad that day; for which reason we adjourned it to the next Saturday.

Att. Gen. What was the method you was to take in the execution?

Porter. The method agreed upon was this: There was one Rookwood that came from France upon this expedition, he was to command one party, and captain Charnock and myself was to command another party, to attack the guards; and sir G. Barclay was to have four men out of each party to attack the coach while we attacked the guards.

Att. Gen. Well, you say the first day you was disappointed by the king's not going. When was the next meeting?

Porter. The next meeting was upon Friday, the day before the 22d. I was sick all the week, and I do not know whether I lay a-bed all the week, or no; but upon Friday they met, and it was at the Sun-Tavern in the Strand: There was none but sir G. Barclay, captain Charnock, sir William Parkyns, and myself.

Att. Gen. What discourse was there then?

Porter. Sir George Barclay came in, and said, he was afraid the thing was discovered; I told him I fancied not, for if it had, we should not have been in that house at that time. Then, says he, let us go on, and try another day. Sir William Parkyns was asked if his horses were come to town: He said they were come to town that night. Said I, I have had a misfortune with my horses, two of them are fallen lame, and won't be fit for service. Says he, if I had known that, I could have brought more horses out of the country: But, says he, I will send to Mr. Lewis, who was gentleman of the horse to my lord Feversham, and I believe he can help us to more horses; he will be with me to-morrow morning, and I will get a note from him for two more. In the morning I sent to him, and he sent me a note for two horses to mount my men: and he sent me word Mr. Lewis could help me to two or three others, that they were all three saddled, and one was accoutred with hostlers and pistols, but the other two had only saddles. I did not see sir William Parkyns on Saturday, the 22d, but I met some of my friends, who were to go along with me upon this enterprize; and we had first notice that the guards were gone abroad, and that the king would go, at which all were very glad: But when we had notice that the king did not go, we were afraid the thing was discovered, and I went out of town, and I did not see any of them afterwards till they were taken.

Att. Gen. Pray, captain Porter, have you heard any thing from sir William Parkyns of his having a commission from king James?

Porter. I have heard captain Charnock ask sir William Parkyns, why he did not go along with us in this expedition? He said, he did not go, because he could not go.

Att. Gen. Was he not to be one in the number that was to act in the assassination?

Porter. No; he said he had other business to do, he had a regiment to look after.

L. C. J. How many horses had you from Lewis?

Porter. I had never a one, only sir William Parkyns sent me word, if I wanted I might have three, for I had told him I would not send for them, till I heard whether the king went abroad; and then I had notice that the king did not go.

Att. Gen. Had you a note for them?

Porter. Not for these three horses; but Cranbourne said he had a note for two horses.

Parkyns. Did he say he had a note from me?

Porter. No, I don't say so, sir William; Cranbourn told me, he had a note whither to go for them.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any questions, sir William?—Parkyns. No, my lord.

Juryman. My lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether at any of those meetings there was any discourse of the assassination before sir William Parkyns?

L. C. J. What say you to that, captain Porter?

Porter. Yes; he was at all the meetings and consultations.

Juryman. Pray, my lord, I desire to know, whether sir William Parkyns discoursed of it himself, and what he did say about it?

Porter. I cannot say exactly what he did say in particular, only he agreed to it, and was to furnish five horses for it, and said it was necessary to be done; for it would bring the king in more easily, though he could not personally engage in it himself, because he had other business; he was to look after his regiment.

Sol. Gen. If sir William Parkyns will ask captain Porter no questions, we will go on to our next witness, which is one Abraham Sweet, whom Mr. Attorney mentioned. [He was brought in and sworn.]

Att. Gen. Mr. Sweet, will you give the court and jury an account, what sir William Parkyns said to you about king James's landing?

Att. Gen. Pray, will you give an account what discourse you had with sir William Parkyns, the prisoner at the bar, about king James's returning and landing with French forces?

Sweet. Sir William Parkyns did tell me, that he did expect king James's landing; and he said his own troop was composed of old soldiers.

Att. Gen. How long have you known sir William Parkyns?

Sweet. This three years.

Att. Gen. Pray tell the time when this discourse was. About what time was it?

Sweet. This was since Christmas, about Christmas last.

Att. Gen. Where was it that you had this discourse?

Sweet. It was about his own house.

L. C. J. What discourse?

Sweet. We were talking about king James's coming.

L. C. J. Who told you that king James was coming?—Sweet. Sir William Parkyns.

Att. Gen. What did he say?

Sweet. He said he had bought a great many saddles, thirty saddles; and that his own troop was composed of all old soldiers.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you of any assurance that he had of king James's landing?

Sweet. Yes; he said he had the king's word for it?

Att. Gen. Was there any discourse between you about any journey that sir William was to take?

Sweet. Yes; he did tell me he was to go into Leicestershire, and was to meet several gentlemen in Leicestershire; and he did go, and after he came back again, he said he had met his friends, and all was well, and that the west was as much inclined to king James's interest as the north, and that a Lord's brother was concerned.

Att. Gen. What other discourse had you about this matter?

Sweet. Nothing else, as to particulars, that I can remember.

Att. Gen. What orders had you to come up to town in February, and when, and from whom?

Sweet. Sir William Parkyns sent for me, and he sent me a letter about the 11th of February that I should come to him the next day; and I did come the next day.

Att. Gen. Whither did you come? Where did you find him?

Sweet. At his lodgings in Norfolk-street, at the house where Mr. Charnock lodged; and after I had spoken with sir William Parkyns about the letter which he had sent me to come up, he told me, that the business that he had designed for me, he did not think fit I should do, because of my family.

Att. Gen. Pray, what directions had you from him, what you were to do when you went into the country?

Sweet. When I went into the country, he ordered me to go to his house, and send up three of the strongest horses.

Att. Gen. When was this, do you say?

 Sweet.* It was in February.

Att. Gen. What time in February?

Sweet. The eleventh or twelfth, which was Wednesday; and at my going away, he told me if I had not a letter from him the Friday following, I should come to town again. I did come to town again, and then he asked me, if I had made provision for my family? I told him, no; then he asked me, why I came up to town? He told me I might go into the country again on the morrow morning.

L. C. J. What did he tell you?

Sweet. He said I might go back again into the country. I came upon the Saturday morning to him.

Att. Gen. Pray, what day was that Saturday?

Sweet. I believe it was the 13th or 14th of February.

Att. Gen. You say, Wednesday was the twelfth?

Sweet. Yes, I believe Wednesday was the 12th, and I came to town the Friday after that 12th, that was the 14th, and on the Saturday I went home again.

Att. Gen. You say you came to him on the Saturday morning, what passed between you then?

Sweet. I went the next morning to sir William Parkyns's lodgings, but he was gone out, and had left word, that I must come again about eleven of the clock: I did go about that time, and he was not come in, and there I met Mr. Chambers, and one Mr. Lee, whom I had seen there the night before.

Att. Gen. And what discourse had you then with them?

Sweet. We had little discourse, for I had only seen them the night before; but I think Chambers told me he had been at Kensington, and I desired to know what news there; and he told me William kept as close as a fox; and he shewed me his wounds, and said those wounds wanted revenge.

Att. Gen. Where did he say he received those wounds?—Sweet. At the Boyne.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Mr. Sweet, did he tell you for what use his troop was?

Sweet. He did not tell me positively; but I understood it to be to join king James when he landed.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, where did you dine that Saturday?

Sweet. With sir William Parkyns, and Mr. Charnock, and Chambers, and one or two more that I did not know.

Att. Gen. Will you ask him any questions, sir William?

Parkyns. Did I tell you, Mr. Sweet, that I had a troop of horse?

Sweet. I will tell you your own words, and no other: You said, your own troop was composed of old soldiers?

L. C. J. Pray let me ask you one question; How many horses were you to bid the man to bring up to town?—Sweet. Three, my lord.

Att. Gen. And were they not his strongest horses?—Sweet. Yes, my lord, they were.

Att. Gen. Did he say any thing to you about volunteers?

Sweet. Yes; he said there were some gentlemen that were captains and old officers that would be volunteers under him.

Parkyns. Pray, where were those words spoken?

Sweet. Either in your house or in the garden, I cannot tell directly which, but somewhere about your house it was.

Parkyns. Where is that house?

Sweet. In Hertfordshire.

Parkyns. Then I am in your lordship's judgment, whether words spoken in Hertfordshire can be an evidence of a treason acted here in Middlesex?

L. C. J. Sir William Parkyns, if there be a design to kill the king, and there are several overt acts to prove that design, and one is in one county, and another is in another county, the party may be indicted in either of the counties, and evidence may be given of both those overt-acts, though in several countries. It is true you being indicted in Middlesex makes it necessary that some evidence should be given of some things done in Middlesex, as there is; as your meeting at Mrs. Mountjoy's, and at the Nag's-head in Covent-garden, and the Sun in the Strand, where were several consultations, which are overt-acts of the same treason; and if treason be committed in several counties, the party may be indicted in any one, and the evidence may be given of facts done in all.*

Parkyns. Then, Mr. Sweet, you do not say that I had raised a troop, or would raise a troop.

Sweet. I told you your own words, that your troop was made up of old soldiers.

L. C. J. But yet I must tell you further, sir William Parkyns, if I remember right, there is evidence given of a discourse you had in Norfolk-street, where you lodged, and that is in Middlesex.

Parkyns. My lord, I did not observe that he said any thing of me about Norfolk-street.

Att. Gen. Yes; that is what he says: You told him you had thought of a business for him, but you would not engage him in it, because of his family.

Parkyns. Pray, Mr. Sweet, did I tell you any thing what you were to do?

Sweet. No, Sir, you did not.

Parkyns. I hope the Jury will take notice

* See the fourth Resolution in sir Henry Vane's Case, and the Note to it, vol. 6, p. 123, of this Collection.

of that: I did not tell him any thing that he was to do.

L. C. J. Well, that was no great matter. Will you ask him any more questions, Sir?
Parkyns. No, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Then our next witness is James Eubank. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Do you know sir William Parkyns.—Eubank. Yes, he is my master.

Att. Gen. What servant was you to him?

Eubank. I was groom to him.

Att. Gen. How long have you been his groom?—Eubank. Not a twelvemonth yet.

Att. Gen. Pray, first give an account what journey you took with him.

Eubank. I went into Leicestershire with him.

Att. Gen. Pray tell us what you know of that matter.

Eubank. Yes, my lord, we went from our own house to Stony-Stratford, and there we lay all night.

Att. Gen. What time was this?

Eubank. I cannot tell the day of the month, it was in January.

Att. Gen. What day of the week was it?

Eubank. It was on a Thursday.

Att. Gen. And where did you go from Stony-Stratford?

Eubank. We came the next day to Leicester.

Att. Gen. Who went with him?

Eubank. One captain Scudamore.

Att. Gen. How long did you tarry at Leicester?

Eubank. When we came the next day to Leicester, we staid there till Sunday morning.

Att. Gen. What company came to your master when he was at Leicester?

Eubank. Sir, I am a stranger, I know none them, I was never there before.

Att. Gen. Can you remember whether there was one Yarborough there?

Eubank. There was one that said his name was Yarborough.

Att. Gen. Whence did he come?

Eubank. He said he came out of Yorkshire.

Att. Gen. Who came with him?

Eubank. There was a gentleman in black cloaths, that said he was a minister.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any others that came thither to your master?

Eubank. It was market day, and I had my horses to look after; there were a great many people went up and down stairs; but whether they went to him, or no, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. When did you come back again?

Eubank. We staid there till Sunday morning, and then we came away.

Att. Gen. To what place did you go that night?

Eubank. To a town called Brickhill, and the night following we came home.

Att. Gen. Who came back with him?

Eubank. None but captain Scudamore, who went with him.

Att. Gen. Whither did you go the next day?

Eubank. We came to Bushy about 8 o'clock on Monday night.

Att. Gen. Well after this, did you bring up any horses to the George-inn to your master, and when?—Eubank. Yes, three horses.

Att. Gen. Ay, when?

Eubank. I cannot tell the day.

Att. Gen. What day of the week was it?

Eubank. Upon a Friday.

Att. Gen. What month was it in?

Eubank. Indeed, I cannot say that.

Att. Gen. Do you remember Valentine's-day?—Eubank. Yes; it was upon that day.

Att. Gen. That is the 14th of February, a remarkable day, and was then of a Friday, the day before the assassination was to have been executed. Whither did you bring them?

Eubank. To the George-inn.

Att. Gen. How were they furnished? Were there pistols upon them?

Eubank. No; the pistols were in town, and the horses were sent after my master.

Att. Gen. Where were the pistols left?

Eubank. Indeed, I don't know.

Att. Gen. Pray, when you came to town, did you go to your master, and acquaint him with it?—Eubank. Yes, Sir, I did.

Att. Gen. Pray, what did he then say to you?

Eubank. He said he thought he should go home that night.

Att. Gen. Did he change his mind?

Eubank. Yes, for he did not go till Monday.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you he should go a Saturday?

Eubank. Yes; he said he thought he should.

Att. Gen. Did you come to him to know his mind, and what did he say?

Eubank. He said in the morning, he would go in the afternoon; but he did not.

Att. Gen. Afterwards when did he go?

Eubank. Upon Monday.

Att. Gen. Who went with him that Monday?

Eubank. One Holmes, a fat, thick man.

Att. Gen. Well, pray when did you come to town again?

Eubank. Upon the Friday following.

Att. Gen. How many horses did you bring up then?

Eubank. On the Friday following we brought up four; my master himself came up with them.

Att. Gen. Who came with him?

Eubank. Mr. Holmes, and I, and another servant.

Att. Gen. How were the horses furnished?

Eubank. Every horse had pistols.

Att. Gen. What did you bring beside? Were there any boots?

Eubank. None but what we rid in.

Att. Gen. Where did you leave those horses?

Eubank. At the George-inn in Holborn.

Att. Gen. What directions did your master give you that night for going the next morning upon an errand, and whither?

Eubank. I had no message from him; but there was a note that I was to carry to Kensington to one Brown; and I was ordered to go to the gentleman that lives within a door or two next the going into the king's gate, I forget his name; but this man where Brown lodged belonged to the court, some officer in the kitchen to the king; either confectioner, or cook, or something; and this man lay there.

Att. Gen. What was your message to him?

Eubank. I was to tell him, that I came to speak with one Brown, and that I came from a gentleman that lay at the confectioner's in Holborn, over against Gray's inn. I know the gentleman by face again, if I see him?

Att. Gen. Well, what did he say to you?

Eubank. He bid me set my horse at the Red lion, and he would come to me presently; and so he did. Says he, I have no business that I need to send; but I will write in your almanack, and you may carry it back and shew it him, that I will come to town betwixt nine and ten o'clock. I did go back and tell that gentleman at the confectioner's.

Att. Gen. What kind of gentleman was it?

Eubank. A lusty man, with a great nose, and a black wig; he speaks broad Scotch, and he was a swarthy coloured man, and he had a wide mouth.

Att. Gen. What age was he of?

Eubank. A middle aged man.

Att. Gen. Pray, what did he say to you?

Eubank. He asked me if I had seen the gentleman? I told him, yes. He asked me what the gentleman returned for answer? I told him, he had writ in my almanack, which I had shewn him, that he would be in town between nine and ten o'clock. He asked me then where I was going? I said, to my master. Says he, tell your master that I will be in my chamber ready for him.

Att. Gen. Did you go to your master, and tell him so?—Eubank. Yes, I did.

Att. Gen. And what did he say to you?

Eubank. He said he designed to go home in the afternoon, and therefore bid me go to the inn, and make ready the horses, and know what was to pay for them, and he would come by and bye thither.

Att. Gen. Did he afterwards come to the inn?

Eubank. Yes, Sir, about three or four o'clock in the afternoon.

Sol. Gen. Pray, who came with sir William Parkyns?—Eubank. One Lewis.

Att. Gen. Do you know him?

Eubank. I have seen him before with my master.

Att. Gen. What is he?

Eubank. They say he is my lord Feversham's gentleman.

Att. Gen. What did he say to you about any saddles?

Eubank. They asked me what saddles, and how many had been sent in there? And I said but two.

Att. Gen. What said Mr. Lewis?

Eubank. Mr. Lewis said there must be a mistake, because my master said he had but twenty-two, for he reckoned he had more; there should be twenty-four in all.

Att. Gen. Did he say so, or sir William Parkyns?

Eubank. It was Mr. Lewis that said there were twenty-four to the best of my remembrance.

Att. Gen. Where were they sent?

Eubank. Indeed I know not, I never saw any of them but those two.

Att. Gen. Who delivered those two to you?

Eubank. My master, sir William Parkyns.

Att. Gen. Who were those saddles for?

Eubank. They were for two gentlemen's horses that were there.

Att. Gen. Whose horses were they?

Eubank. They were not my master's; but they stood at that place.

Att. Gen. Did your master ever speak to you about them, to look after them?

Eub. He said, if at any time I was there, I should see that the hostler gave them their corn.

Att. Gen. Were they your master's horses, or not?—Eub. Not that I know of.

Att. Gen. What time did you go out of town?

Eub. I went out of town with them about four o'clock in the afternoon.

Att. Gen. When did you hear from your master after that?

Eub. Upon Monday I had a letter from him.

Att. Gen. What was that letter for?

Eub. It was to go to my master's house in Warwickshire, to one Richard Evans that was his servant, to whom he sent a letter.

Att. Gen. What were the contents of that letter?

Eub. I did not see what they were, it was sealed.

Att. Gen. Did you carry that letter to Evans?—Eub. Yes, I did.

Att. Gen. What time did you come thither?

Eub. I came there a Tuesday at four o'clock.

Att. Gen. What did Evans and you do after you had read the letter?

Eub. We went to fetch some boxes that my master had ordered Evans to fetch home. It was about two miles, or more from home, at a tradesman's.

Att. Gen. What was his name, was it Haywood?

Eub. Yes, I think it was something like that name.

Att. Gen. Did you go with Evans to fetch the boxes from thence?

Eub. They had a man that drove the team to fetch them.

Att. Gen. Where they carried in a team then?—Eub. Yes, they were.

Att. Gen. Were you there when the goods were brought back?

Eub. Yes, I was at my master's house.

Att. Gen. What did they do with them?

Eub. They buried them in the garden, Sir.

Att. Gen. What, in the boxes?

Eub. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. How many boxes were there?

Eub. Five or six, I think, I know not what was in them.

Att. Gen. You helped to bury them, did you not?

Eub. No; but I was there, I saw them buried.

Att. Gen. Did Evans tell you what they were?

Eub. Evans told me they were choice goods.

Att. Gen. Evans told you so, did he?

Eub. Yes.

L. C. J. What time of the day or night were they fetched home?

Eub. They went away about four o'clock in the afternoon.

L. C. J. How far is it from sir William Parkyns's house to Haywood's?

Eub. I think about three or four miles, I cannot tell how far exactly.

L. C. J. What time did they return?

Eub. About ten or eleven o'clock at night.

Juryman. My lord, I understand he says they buried them immediately; was he there, and did he help to bury them?

Eub. No, I did not help to bury them; but I saw earth put upon them.

Att. Gen. Pray, Eubank, let me ask you one question: the person that lay at the confectioner's, did you observe whether he had a lame arm, or no?

Eub. No, I did not take notice of any such thing.

Sol. Gen. Will sir William Parkyns ask him any questions?

L. C. J. What say you, sir William, will you ask him any questions?

Parkyns. You say one Holmes went out of town with me; pray give an account what Holmes that is?

Eub. It is fat Mr. Holmes, if it please your honour, he lives at the Golden Key in Holborn.

Parkyns. My lord, I observe this to distinguish it, that it was not, as Mr. Attorney opened it, major Holmes that is in the proclamation; it was one that used to be at my house frequently; he was at my house all the summer.

Att. Gen. You did well to ask him that question to explain it.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any more questions?—Parkyns. No, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Then our next witness is one Thomas Hipwell. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Where do you live?

Hip. At in Warwickshire.

Att. Gen. With whom do you live?

Hip. I live of myself, Sir.

Att. Gen. Do you know of any goods that were carried from Mr. Haywood's house to sir William Parkyns's house?

Hip. I came from Litchfield fair upon Ash-Wednesday, where I had been to carry goods for my master.

Att. Gen. Did not you say you lived of yourself? I asked you before, who you lived with?

Who is your master?—Hip. Mr. Haywood.

Att. Gen. You said you had no master.

Hip. That is, when he pleases to employ me, I work for him.

VOL. XIII.

Att. Gen. Pray tell what you carried from Haywood's house, and who came for them?

Hip. There were, to the best of my remembrance, either seven or eight boxes.

Att. Gen. Who came for them?

Hip. There was one of sir William Parkyns's men, one Richard Evans, that was his servant, and one Whelstone, that was tenant to sir William.

Att. Gen. Well, how did they come, and what did they do?

Hip. They brought a waggon and two mares.

Att. Gen. About what time was it?

Hip. It was about nine or ten o'clock at night when they went away.

Att. Gen. What orders had you from your master?

Hip. It was near upon seven o'clock, when the waggon came, and my master wished me to go to borrow a mare of —, at —; I did so, and I brought the mare I had borrowed with me home.

Att. Gen. What was that mare borrowed for?—Hip. I know not.

Att. Gen. What use was she put to afterwards? What did you see more?

Hip. Why, before the team came (about a quarter of an hour before) to fetch these goods, my master told me, that sir William Parkyns's men were to come to fetch some bedding and other goods, what they were he knew not; and he ordered me, when they knocked at the gate, to let them in; and I did so.

Att. Gen. Well, friend, did they carry away any goods, and what were they?

Hip. They were in boxes at first, in three boxes; and then sir William Parkyns's servant did knock off the outside lining, which was a deal board, and he drew the nails, and took out of two boxes three boxes a-piece, and two out of another: to the best of my remembrance I think there were eight, but I am not sure whether there were seven or eight.

Att. Gen. Did they carry them away that night?

Hip. Yes, sir Wm. Parkyns's man Richard and the tenant carried them to the waggon, and I lighted them down with a lanthorn, according to my master's order.

Att. Gen. When, what day was this?

Hip. It was Ash-Wednesday at night.

Att. Gen. Then set up Mr. Haywood, (who was sworn before). Pray give my lord an account, when sir William Parkyns's goods were brought to your house, who brought them, and what directions were given about the careful keeping of them.

Haywood. My lord, about Michaelmas last, sir William Parkyns's man came to me with a letter from one Mr. Charnock, and the effect of the letter was, to desire the favour of me to lodge some goods of sir William Parkyns at my house; for he was taking his servants from his house, and he was loth to leave his goods in an empty house, and he desired me to let them lie at my house, which I did.

R

Att. Gen. How were they put up?

Haywood. I think in three chests, pretty big chests, nailed up and tacked; and there was a bed and bedding, and a piece of tapestry or two.

Att. Gen. Pray, did that letter come from Mr. Charnock?—Haywood. Yes; Evans, sir William Parkyns's man, brought it me.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, how are you related to that Mr. Charnock? What kin is he to you?

Haywood. I married his sister.

L. C. J. You took the goods into your custody upon that letter from Charnock?

Hayw. Yes, my lord, I did.

Att. Gen. Pray, will you give an account, whether you were in town before this discovery, and had any discourse with Mr. Charnock or sir William Parkyns about these goods? When did you see Mr. Charnock afterwards?

Hayw. I came up to London the 16th day, and I was in London the 17th, 18th, and 19th; I think those three days; and I went to see Mr. Charnock at his lodgings, but I was hardly with him a quarter of an hour; I told him sir William Parkyns had sent some goods to my house, and I desired to know when he would fetch them away. Says he, I cannot say when I shall see him again. Said I, I shall have some business at the Temple, and I will meet you at the Temple coffee-house. Says he, I will meet. And bring sir William Parkyns with you, if you can, said I. He came about eight or nine o'clock on Tuesday morning; says he, sir William Parkyns is at my lodgings, just a-going out of town, and would desire to see you. So I went up, and sir William Parkyns was ready to go out of town. I told him I had some goods of his at my house, and I desired to know how he would dispose of them; what he would do with them. He would take them away, he said, the first opportunity, or to that effect.

L. C. J. When was this? What month?

Hayw. It was in February last.

L. C. J. What day?

Hayw. I think it might be about the eighteenth day.

L. C. J. It was you that desired to have them taken away, it seems, was it not?

Hayw. I asked him when he would take them away, or what he would do with them.

L. C. J. And what answer did he make?

Hayw. He said he would take them away the first opportunity, as soon as he could dispose of them, or to that effect.

Att. Gen. Now, when you came home, tell us who came for those goods, and when?

Hayw. I think it was upon a Shrove-Tuesday that I came home, and my wife said sir William Parkyns had sent for his goods, and desired to have them away; but that she had made answer, I was not at home, but should be at home soon, and then he might have them away. The next day I came home from Litchfield fair, about five or six o'clock at night. It was Ash-Wednesday at night when I came home, and the man came to me between six and seven, and told me his master desired to have the goods away. I told him he might have them when he would; he said he would have them away that night. I told him it was an unreasonable time: but, says he, the waggon is a-coming, and I desire you would give me leave to take them away; which I did: then he said he had but two horses, and he desired me to lend him a horse; which I did, and he took the goods, and went away with them; but for what he did afterwards with them, I know nothing at all of it.

Sol. Gen. Then swear Mr. Whetstone, [which was done.]

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, do you give an account when you went with Evans to Haywood's house, and what happened.

Whetstone. His man came to me—

Att. Gen. Whose man?

Whetstone. Sir William Parkyns's man, to desire me to go to Mr. Haywood's to fetch some goods of sir William Parkyns, some bedding, and some odd things, which I did; and said he, I will go the next way to the house, and I will meet you before you can get thither; and he did meet me half a mile off the house, and told me I must stay, and not come to the house till it was night, till it was later.

L. C. J. Who told you so?

Whetstone. Sir William Parkyns's man told me so; so he went forwards to the gate, and then came back, and called me to come in; then we went to the house, and loaded the waggon with boxes and bedding that was there.

Att. Gen. How many boxes were there?

Whetstone. I cannot tell whether there were seven or eight.

Att. Gen. Whither did you carry them?

Whetstone. We carried them to sir William Parkyns's house.

Att. Gen. What was done with them?

Whetstone. There they were put into the ground by the wall side, where they were found.

Att. Gen. Why, was you present when they were found?

Whetstone. Yes, I saw them dug up.

Att. Gen. Then you can give us an account of them: What were they?

Whetstone. They were arms.

Att. Gen. How many were there? What quantity?

Whetstone. Truly, I cannot tell.

Mr. Baker. Where is the constable, Thomas Watts?—Watts. Here am I. (He was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Are you the constable?

Watts. Yes, Sir, I am the constable, and searched sir William Parkyns's house, and upon searching in the garden, I found some arms there.

Att. Gen. Pray what quantity of arms did you find there?

Watts. Four dozen of swords, thirty-two carbines, twenty-five brace of pistols.

Att. Gen. What kind of swords were they?

Watts. They were broad swords, two-edged swords.

Att. Gen. Were there any hilts to the swords?

Watts. No; but there was a box of hilts that I suppose was prepared for them.

Att. Gen. Where did you find them?

Watts. In a border under the wall by the wall side.

Juryman. Did you see the boxes broke open, Sir?

Watts. Yes, Sir, I took them and broke them open my own self.

Juryman. Was Whetstone by, pray, Sir, when they were broke open?

Watts. He was not there by at the first, when we dug them up; but I brought them to my own house, and there I broke them open, and there we saw them.

Att. Gen. Will you ask him any questions, sir William?—Parkins. No, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Then call Turton, Freeman, Fielding. (Who were all sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray set up Mr. Freeman. (Which was done.)

Att. Gen. Where do you live?

Freeman. At the George Inn in Holborn.

Att. Gen. What are you?

Freeman. I am hostler there.

Att. Gen. Pray do you give an account what horses were kept there of sir William Parkyns, and how many.

Freeman. He was a guest to the house all this last summer, sometimes more, sometimes less.

Att. Gen. How was it last winter about February last, how many horses had he then?

Freeman. He had sometimes three came in, sometimes four; the most that ever he had was five.

Att. Gen. What time was that that he had five, pray?

Freeman. To my best memory, it was just the week before the disturbance, before the Plot broke out.

Sol. Gen. Before the proclamation, you mean?

Freeman. Yes, before the proclamation.

Att. Gen. When was it? What day of the week was it?

Freeman. They came in on Friday night.

L. C. J. Holt. What, did five come in then?

Freeman. Yes, I think so.

L. C. J. Holt. Who was with him?

Freeman. I only saw his groom and another servant.

Att. Gen. How were they accoutred?

Freeman. Four with holsters and small pistols, one was a led mare with a portmantuan; and in a horse cloth wrapped up there was one or two pair of jack boots, and, I think, a collar in one; I cannot tell whether there was one bridle or two.

Att. Gen. When did they go away?

Freeman. On Saturday in the afternoon.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any persons to come there on Saturday morning?

Freeman. There were two men that were there that rid out between two and three hours; they rid out between nine and ten, and they came in again between twelve and one; where they had been I cannot tell; but they had rid pretty hard for the time they were out, for the horses came in in a sweat.

Att. Gen. Before this time that you now speak of, what horses came up? Can you remember how many horses came up the week before?

Freeman. The week before there were some, but how many I cannot remember; they very rarely stayed above, a night.

Att. Gen. What do you know of any other horses that were left there?

Freeman. There were three horses that were at our house a week, that were very good horses; but I do not know whose horses they were, nor the names of the gentlemen that owned them. The gentlemen that brought them in paid for the horses, only the groom told me his master, sir William Parkyns, had ordered him to see the horses fed. I never received a farthing of sir William Parkyns, but always of the groom.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you observe any particular horse that was brought in there, a roan horse?

Freeman. Yes, there was one horse brought in.

Att. Gen. From whence did that horse come?

Freeman. As was told me, from Mountague house.

Att. Gen. I believe you mistake the place; recollect yourself a little.

Freeman. Somerset house, I mean; a porter brought it.

Att. Gen. Are you sure it was Somerset house?—Freeman. Yes, it was.

Att. Gen. Do you know one Lewis?

Freeman. I do not know him; perhaps the tapster does.

L. C. J. Holt. How many horses came from Somerset house?

Freeman. Only the roan gelding, and a very fat man mounted him, and rid out with sir William Parkyns.

Parkyns. Pray, Sir, what sort of horse was that bay gelding that you say the fat man rid upon?

Freeman. I say he rid upon a little roan gelding about fourteen hands high.

Parkyns. But the bay gelding, how high was that?

Freeman. About fourteen hands high.

Parkyns. There's your mighty horse for service!

Freeman. They were no great sized horses, none of them.

Parkyns. And have not you known these horses to have been mine a great while?

Freeman. Yes, I have known them to be yours a good while.

L. C. J. Holt. What, was the roan gelding sir William Parkyns's?

Freeman. No, not the roan, but the others; they were no strange horses, they were frequently there all last summer; there was no new strange horse but the roan.

L. C. J. Holt. Will you ask him any more questions?—Parkyns. No, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Then set up Mr. Turton. (Which was done.)

Att. Gen. Pray will you give an account what you know of horses that were standing at the George Inn in Holborn?

Turton. I have known sir William Parkyns to have used the inn this four or five years, ever since the inn was built; and in last February he came to town with three horses the first time.

Att. Gen. What day of the month was that;

Turton. I cannot say what day of the month, but it was about the week before his last coming there, which was just before the discovery of the plot.

Att. Gen. Do you know what day of the week it was?

Turton. No, truly I do not, for I keep no account of horses going in or out. The last time of his coming was with about four or five horses to the best of my knowledge, and that was upon the Friday before the Plot broke out; and then upon that Friday, sir William Parkyns gave order to his groom to get the horses ready against Saturday morning.

Att. Gen. Did he go out with his horses on Saturday morning?

Turton. He did not go out with all the horses according as he had given order; but two gentlemen rid out with two of the horses, and staid out about two or three hours, and came in again, as if they had rid pretty hard, the horses being in a sweat; and in the afternoon they all went fairly out of town, and gave out that they expected to be in town on Sunday or Monday following, but they did not return; but then came down one Mr. Lewis, I know not that that is his name, only when I formerly belonged to my lord of Oxford, I knew him to be gentleman of the horse to my lord Feversham, but I did not know his name.

Att. Gen. Had you not seen him there before? What time did he come?

Turton. I do not know that I ever saw him there before; he was on Saturday in our yard.

L. C. J. Holt. You are asked when Lewis came?

Turton. The first time I see him was on Saturday, in the yard, asking for sir William Parkyns.

L. C. J. Holt. What time on Saturday was that?

Turton. It might be three of the clock in the afternoon, about an hour or thereabouts before sir William Parkyns's horses went away; and asking for sir William Parkyns, and he not being there, he returned back again; and after they were gone, he came again, and I told him they were gone; but the groom had acquainted me, and given me an account, that he would be there again on Sunday or Monday. On Sunday in the afternoon, about five or six, Mr.

Lewis came to enquire if sir William Parkyns's horses were come to town; I told him no; and so he came again upon Monday morning betwixt eight and nine of the clock, and asked me if I heard nothing of his coming to town; I told him no, I did not hear of his coming again.

Att. Gen. The horses that came up on Friday night, how were they accounted?

Turton. Two or three of them had holsters; I cannot say but for pistols they had four or five case.

Att. Gen. Had they no carbines?

Turton. No; but only horse pistols.

Att. Gen. Did you not observe any other arms, or other furniture?

Turton. I did see a pair or two of jack-boots that they rid in, but I did not see any more.

Att. Gen. Were there any that were wrapt up in a horse-cloth?

Turton. No, I did not see any, there were not brought into the house.

Mr. Cowper. Do you know what time the horses were saddled that day?

Turton. No, I did not.

Parkyns. You observed, and said there were two or three cases of pistols, did not I always ride with pistols?

Turton. Yes; you seldom came without two or three pair when you came with servants.

Parkyns. And as to the jack-boots, you said we rid in them.—Turton. I suppose so.

Parkyns. We alighted at Mr. John's house, and so our boots were sent thither: And these were small horses all of them; pray will you tell the court what sized horses they were; was there ever a great horse among them?

Turton. Never a one, I believe, that exceeded above fourteen hands and a half, some under fourteen.

Sol. Gen. Did you see the roan gelding? What size was that?

Turton. A small pad, that might be about thirteen and a half.

Att. Gen. Did you ever see him come with so many horses before?

Turton. I have seen more at the Sword and Buckler, when I lived there; and he used to inn there.

Att. Gen. How many have you seen at the Sword and Buckler?

Turton. I have seen four or five at a time; but this is many years ago, seven or eight years ago, when he used to keep his coach and four horses, and come up with several saddle horses with him.

Att. Gen. How long have you lived at the George inn?—Turton. About two years.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any other horses that stood there?

Turton. There were two that were pretty sizeable horses larger than any of sir William's own.

Att. Gen. Whose were they?

Turton. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Did any body own these?

Turton. I don't know who owned them; there was one that paid for their meat, and took them away.

Att. Gen. Who is that?

Turton. Truly, Sir, I cannot tell; I do not know who he was; I never saw him in my life.

Sol. Gen. Has sir William Parkyns any more questions to ask him?—Parkyns. No, Sir.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we shall call no more witnesses, unless he gives further occasion; we leave it here till we hear what he says to it.

L. C. J. Sir William Parkyns, Mr. Attorney General and the king's counsel have done; now is your time to make your defence.

Parkyns. My lord, I rely upon your lordship for my defence; for I am ignorant of these proceedings; I rely wholly upon your lordship, to give a true account of them to the jury; I hope your lordship is so just, that you will repeat the evidence to the jury as it is, and no otherwise. But I do not observe, that as to the assassination there is more than one witness, and that is captain Porter: There is not a tittle more! and as to that, I suppose your lordship will declare to the jury, that I was not concerned in it; and captain Porter declares, I was to have no hand in it, only I was to furnish five horses, and accidentally I was at some meetings, but he does not declare that I was to do any thing in particular.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, you agreed upon the debates to the several resolutions of assassinating the king, and said, that it was necessary and fit to take him off.

Parkyns. Still, that is but one witness, I deny it utterly; and the law says positively there shall be two witnesses.

L. C. J. Not to every overt-act, there is no law says so.

Parkyns. As to the assassination there is but one, no other but he; and so as to the regiment, he did not say that I was to raise a regiment; but that he was told by a gentleman that I had been desired to be in the matter, but I would not, because I had engaged in another business, about a regiment; but this was all but hear-say.

L. C. J. Yes; he said you owned you had a regiment. Besides, it is said you owned you had your saddles, and your troop consisted of old soldiers.

Parkyns. No, captain Porter never said so.

Att. Gen. That was Sweet.

L. C. J. You told Porter, you had a regiment to look after.

Parkyns. Captain Porter is here, I desire he would explain himself.

L. C. J. Yes, and you told Sweet, that your troop consisted of old soldiers, and that you had bought thirty saddles.

Parkyns. My troop, aye! But still there was nothing of a regiment; nor did they say I had raised a regiment, or a troop, or was to raise a regiment.

Sweet. You told me your troop consisted of old soldiers. I did not say that you had said you had raised or would raise, but it did consist of old soldiers.

L. C. J. He says that which makes it plain, that you were to have a troop, or had a troop, consisting of old soldiers, besides volunteers that had been officers; and that you had bought a great many saddles, thirty saddles; and you were to go into Leicestershire; and accordingly you did go, and upon your return, you did give an account that all was well, and the west as well inclined to king James's interest as the north.

Parkyns. That I went into Leicestershire, and met several gentlemen, and that they were all well inclined; I hope that is no evidence of treason against me: every body ought to be well inclined.

L. C. J. Aye! but they were all well disposed or inclined to king James's interest.

Parkyns. He did not say so; if your lordship pleases to call him again.

L. C. J. Call him again. (Sweet was set up again.)

Sol. Gen. What did sir William Parkyns tell you of his journey into Leicestershire?

Sweet. He said he had been there, and had met his friends, and all was well.

L. C. J. What did he say? Did he name king James?

Sweet. He did not name king James to me at that time.

L. C. J. What was the discourse about, that they were all well inclined to?

Sweet. He always named it the king's interest, and did not name king James; but I understood it, and always took it to be king James he meant.

Mr. Mountague. What did he say of the North and West?

Sweet. He said that the West was as well inclined to the king's interest as the North.

Att. Gen. What did he say before he went?

Sweet. He told me he was to go into Leicestershire to meet some of the King's friends.

Parkyns. Pray, recollect yourself, and consider what you say.

Sweet. He said, some gentlemen rid as far to him, as he did to meet them.

Att. Gen. Was that the time he talked about the troop?

Sweet. No, that was before this time. I cannot remember the particular time; it was at his own house, and captain Scudamore was with him.

Att. Gen. When was the discourse about king James's landing?

Sweet. He told me that he believed now that king James would land, he said he had his own word for it; it was about Christmas.

Att. Gen. What did he say about preparation for it?

Sweet. He said his own troop was to consist of all old soldiers.

L. C. J. Did he tell you he had a troop?

Sweet. I speak his own words; he said, My troop consists of all old soldiers.

L. C. J. Was it 'consists', or will 'consist', though I think there may be no great matter of difference in this case?

Parkyns. Yes, my lord, but there is a great deal, sure; for 'will consist' shews nothing yet done, and all is but words.

L. C. J. Sweet, answer to sir William Parkyns's question.

Sweet. I tell your lordship, I repeat his own words, My troop consists or is composed of all old soldiers.

Mr. Cowper. What did he say of volunteers?

Sweet. He said, there were some gentlemen that would go along with him as volunteers, that had been old officers.

Mr. Cowper. Pray let me ask another question? when he discoursed of the present King, by what name did he use to speak of him?

Sweet. He called him by the name of the prince of Orange.

Parkyns. Pray, recollect yourself, Mr. Sweet, and think of what you say: since he was declared king, did I ever call him prince of Orange; I am upon my life, and pray speak nothing but the truth.

L. C. J. Consider, and answer the question, What did he use to call him?

Sweet. Truly, my lord, I am not positive as to that, I understood it so. I never knew that he allowed him to be king of England.

Parkyns. Did you ever hear me call him prince of Orange, since he was king?

L. C. J. Look ye, Sir, how long have you been acquainted with him?

Sweet. About three years, my lord.

L. C. J. Well, that is long since his Majesty was declared king; have you ever heard sir William Parkyns call this king prince of Orange?

Sweet. I am not positive in that, but I understood he did not allow him to be king.

Sol. Gen. You frequently discoursed with him about the government, it seems; pray, what did he use to call him?

Sweet. I have heard him call him king William, and the little gentleman.

Parkyns. When ever did you hear me call him the Little-gentleman? Mr. Sweet, pray, when you are upon your oath consider well, and recollect yourself, and do not answer rashly and suddenly, but think of what you say. I always expressed myself, when I had occasion to speak of him, and called him king William, as other people use to do, I never used the words, little-gentleman, nor prince of Orange neither.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him call him otherwise than king William?

(He paused a while.)

L. C. J. Pray speak the truth and no more.

Sweet. I have heard him call him prince of Orange.

L. C. J. But you have heard him call him king William too?—Sweet. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. But pray, when he spoke of the king, what king did you understand by it?

I used to understand king James.

Parkyns. What is that to me what he understood?

L. C. J. But I would observe to you one thing, when you came from Leicestershire, you talked how well disposed they were to the king's interest; he says, he understood that king to be king James, and you said the West was as well disposed as the North; pray, now, were you employed by king William to see how the gentlemen stood affected to him?

Parkyns. No, nor by king James neither.

L. C. J. Why then should you concern yourself for the king's friends in the West and the North?

Parkyns. I never was in the West in my life, and therefore cannot tell why I should tell him any thing about the West.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, when was it that sir William Parkyns spoke about the king's landing?

Sweet. It was about Christmas, he said he believed he would land.

Parkyns. Did I tell you positively it would be so then?

Att. Gen. He tells you he said you did believe it, for you had it from his own mouth.

Parkyns. That shews it is not probable I should tell him so; that I should have it from his own mouth, carries such an improbability with it, that the evidence is felo de se, it destroys itself.

Sol. Gen. He does not say you had it from his own mouth, but that you had his word for it; and this being about Christmas, long after our king was returned, it could mean no other king but king James.

L. C. J. Look you, sir William Parkyns, there is another thing I would observe, Why did you send your man to Kensington to one Brown? Who is that Brown? and what was the man that lodged at the confectioner's in Holborn?

Parkyns. I cannot tell who it was, I know neither Brown nor the other man; but I sent my man at the request of Mr. Charnock, who lodged in the same house with me; he desired he might go upon an errand for him to Kensington, and I directed him to go upon such an errand, for he was formerly Mr. Charnock's servant, and I desired him to go of the errand if he requested it. Who these men were, I know not, neither of them, nor any of their business.

L. C. J. But he was bid by the man that lodged at the confectioner's to tell his master that he would stay within for him.

Parkyns. That might be Mr. Charnock, for he was his servant once.

L. C. J. But he says he carried the message to you, and you received it. Well, have you any more to say?

Parkyns. My lord, I think there is but one positive evidence of any one overt-act.

L. C. J. Yes; what do you think of the design of bringing in king James, and consulting about it, and assisting in the invasion, and preparing a troop, and providing arms and horses? Are not these overt-acts? Do you think your having a troop of old soldiers is no overt-act?

Parkyns. There is no positive proof of any troop or any arms.

L. C. J. It is proved there were arms sent by you at Michaelmas last to Mr. Haywood's, Charnock's brother in law, and these lay there till Ash-Wednesday last, after your name was in the proclamation; and then they were removed in the night, and buried at your house, and were taken up there; and here is an account given what arms they were, four dozen of swords, twenty-five pair of pistols, thirty-two carbines.

Parkyns. First it does not appear when these arms were brought, nor for what intent they were brought from Haywood's.

L. C. J. But what use had you, a private man, for so many arms? And then your going into Leicestershire to meet some gentlemen, and your giving an account how they stood affected to the king's interest, whether that be understood for the interest of king James, I must leave to the jury, since you give no account that you were employed by king William.

Parkyns. My lord, I went upon my private occasions, and then talked of news as other people do.

L. C. J. But when you returned back again, you declared all was well, and gave an account how persons were disposed in the West and North.

Parkyns. Is there any persons named, or particulars? Can it be an overt-act of treason for me to discover my acquaintance?

L. C. J. But your going with that design to engage in an interest against the king, and for the late king.

Parkyns. He does not say I discovered my design. I went to meet with some friends of my own.

L. C. J. Did he not tell you he was to go to Leicestershire?

Mr. Sweet. Yes, he did so.

L. C. J. Did he tell you to what purpose?

Sweet. He said he was to go to meet some of the king's friends.

Parkyns. Did I tell you who?

Sweet. No.

L. C. J. But there was a lord's brother, what did he tell you of that?

Sweet. He said all things were well, and the West was as well inclined as the North.

L. C. J. To what?

Sweet. To the king's interest.

L. C. J. Treby. You spoke of a lord's brother that was concerned?

Sweet. He said several persons of quality in the West were concerned, and a lord's brother was among them.

Juryman. My lord, I desire he may be asked, when he said the king would land, what king he meant, whether he named the late king, or king James?

L. C. J. Well, answer that; when he dis-coursed to you of the king's landing, did he name the late king James? or did he say the late king James?

Juryman. Was he mentioned in the discourse?

Sweet. He never used to mention king James to me, but only the king, which I understood always of king James.

Att. Gen. Pray what time was it that he spoke of the king's landing?

Sweet. It was about Christmas.

Att. Gen. Therefore no other king could be meant but king James, for there was no other king to land at that time; and he said he had the king's word for it. I suppose he cannot pretend he had king William's word for it.

Parkyns. I hope, to talk of the king's landing is no treason; it is but words: If I tell an idle story of what I think may come to pass, shall that be reckoned treason? Then for him to say, I had it from the king's own mouth, it is impossible to be true, and is no overt-act, being only words, and cannot be reputed treason. And then as to the other two parts of the charge, the consultations with my lord of Ailesbury, and those other persons, there is but one witness; nobody but Porter; neither is there any more but he for the assassination; his evidence is but a single proof, and there ought to be two positive witnesses, by the law, to each overt-act.

L. C. J. Holt. No: there ought to be two witnesses to each species of treason, that is all.

Parkyns. There ought to be two witnesses to both these parts of the treason.

L. C. J. Holt. I must tell you, sir William Parkyns, if any person does design and contrive that the realm should be invaded, or the king deposed, and another set upon the throne, that conspiring to invade the realm, or depose the king, are overt-acts of high treason, within the statute of 25 Ed. 3, and the same species of treason as designing to assassinate him is. It is compassing, designing, imagining his death and destruction. Now the question is, whether there is not another witness, besides capt. Porter, to prove another overt-act of this design?

Parkyns. I don't find there is; for all the rest is only discourse.

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, for what? Do you think providing arms for that purpose is only discourse?

Parkyns. The witnesses do not say for what purpose the arms were bought.

L. C. J. Holt. Nor do you tell us of any other purpose.

Parkyns. My lord, it does not appear when they were bought.

L. C. J. Holt. Aye, but what occasion had you for such a quantity of arms?

Parkyns. My lord, I did not buy them, after all. I found them. If I had had liberty to have sent down for witnesses, I could have proved that these arms were in boxes all rusty in my house when I first came to it.

L. C. J. Holt. Aye: But why were they buried, just at the time when the Plot was broke out, and the whole design discovered?

Parkyns. I cannot tell, my lord, how to help it, if they will make an ill interpretation.

L. C. J. Holt. What interpretation would you have us make?

Parkyns. My lord, it is very easy to imagine, people do not care to be found with arms at such a time; but, however, the having of arms is no treason. They are as much a commodity as any thing else.

Att. Gen. And then the horse coming to town just at such a time, and the saddles.

Parkyns. I have not bought a horse this two years, and I travelled in no other manner than I used to do. So the groom tells ye, I used to come to town with three or four horses always. I never kept less than six or seven horses this twenty years; sometimes a great many more; and they were very little horses, pads, no way fit for the service they are presumed to be for.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any thing more to say, Sir?

Parkyns. I hope, my lord, as to the assassination I am clear: Perhaps the world would imagine, I have had some inclinations to king James's service, and perhaps they may not think amiss; but I never did any thing, nor had an opportunity to do.

L. C. J. Holt. God be thanked you had no opportunity!

Parkyns. And I hope my life shall not be taken away without proof; I hope it will be rather thought, that every one should be taken to be innocent; and it would better please the king, that I should be acquitted, than to let me be found guilty upon slight grounds and imaginations, of which little or nothing can be made.

L. C. J. Holt. No question of it: It will please the king and every body else, that you should be found innocent.

Parkyns. Then I hope, my lord, you will not strain the law to take away my life; according to the rule, That it is better five guilty men should escape, than one innocent man suffer: For the blood of a man may lie upon every body, if it be causelessly shed; and it is very severe to strain the law to take away any man's life.

L. C. J. Holt. Look ye, sir William Parkyns, I must tell you, you may be under a very great mistake: You may think it necessary to have two witnesses to every overt-act, but that is not so; for if there be one witness to one overt-act, and another witness to another overt-act of the same species of treason, that is all that the law requires.

Parkyns. Here are two species of treason, levying war is one species, and assassination is another.

L. C. J. Holt. Your design was, originally, the restoring of king James, and in order to that the dethroning of king William.

Parkyns. That appears but by one witness, which is not according to law, which requires two.

L. C. J. Holt. One way of effecting your design was by assassination, the other by invasion, or by force.

Parkyns. Still, my lord, here is the same witness, and that is but one.

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, there are two.

Parkyns. None but captain Porter.

L. C. J. Holt. What, not as to the restoring of king James, which tends to the dethroning king William?

Parkyns. In what particulars, my lord?

L. C. J. Holt. Your providing arms, and going to Leicestershire, and sending Charnock on that errand into France. As to the assassination, indeed, there is but one positive witness, besides other circumstances, which have their weight; but as to the other, you said the king would come—Parkyns. It was my opinion, that's all.

L. C. J. But you said you had his word for it.

Parkyns. Does not that answer itself, my lord? Is it possible it should be true, that I who was in England, should have the word of one that is at such a distance beyond sea?

L. C. J. And then your buying of saddles, for what purpose were they?

Parkyns. My lord, does he say it was in order to it? I am sure he does not, and I hope I shall not be presumed out of my life.

L. C. J. When you talked of the king's landing, and said, you had his word for it; you likewise said, your troop was made up of old soldiers, besides volunteers that had been officers.

Parkyns. Still there is nothing done; he does not say there was one man raised.

L. C. J. And your going into Leicestershire upon such an errand, as you told him you went upon.

Parkyns. Well, my lord, I must leave it to your lordship. I hope you will consider well of it.

L. C. J. We must do that which is right between the king and his subjects.

Parkyns. And, I hope, my lord, the conversion of subjects is more acceptable than the destruction of them: and the government is more concerned to save the innocent, than to stretch the law to punish the guilty.

L. C. J. It will be more acceptable, and, indeed, the king and kingdom are very much concerned in this matter, and at this time, sir William; and the government ought to take care to preserve itself. Have you any more to say, Sir? If you have, pray speak it.

Parkyns. I have no more. I submit it to your lordship; I think there is but one witness, and all the other is but conjecture and nonsense; and one witness is not sufficient, by the law of England, for by the statute there must be two.

L. C. J. I have told you my opinion.

Parkyns. Besides, your lordship has known me this many years, and you know that my education was not to war and fighting, but the gown; and your lordship knows how peaceably I have lived.

L. C. J. I have known you heretofore, sir William, while you kept your profession and your gown.

Parkyns. And now in my old age, my lord, I am grown lame, and have lost the use of my hands with the gout, and scarce able almost to go on my feet. Therefore I cannot in reason be thought probable, that I should engage in such a business as this; and therefore I hope you will interpret all things in a milder sense, in favour of life, rather than for the destruction of it, and the ruin of a man's fortune and family.

L. C. J. I tell you, you have had my opinion concerning the number of witnesses. I suppose my lord and brother will declare theirs.

L. C. J. Treby. My lord chief justice, it seems, does please to have us deliver our opinions; I think we ought to be very tender in a case of blood: I think the life of sir William Parkyns is at stake, and we ought to be careful that he have no wrong done him. But I think in the cases of treason, especially of this nature, the life of the king, and the lives of all the innocent people of the kingdom are also at stake; and we must be indifferent in this case, and by the grace of God we will be so. The question that sir William Parkyns proposes, is, Whether there are two witnesses upon this evidence, to this matter of which he is indicted, which is, the compassing and imagining the king's death? one witness, at least, does positively prove, that you sir William Parkyns did agree to the design of assassinating the king's person, and promise to provide and contribute horses and arrays to that purpose. Now suppose this is proved but by one witness, and the evidence had gone no farther, then your objection would have had a very good ground, that this could not be a legal proof of treason; but I must tell you, that this treason of compassing and imagining the king's death may be made evident by other overt-acts, besides that of assassination: to conspire with a foreign prince to invade the realm, to provide arms, to join with invaders, and to make an insurrection against the king, these are overt-acts of imagining the king's death. For it cannot be supposed, but that he that would have an invasion and an insurrection against the king's person, does intend the destruction of the king; he that would take away all his defence, which he might have by the assistance of his subjects, and leave him exposed to his mortal enemies, cannot but be presumed to design the king's ruin and murder. Therefore, sir William, such things being in their nature a compassing and imagining the king's death; your providing arms and a troop are evidences and overt-acts of this treason; and so will your going up and down and meeting people in order to rise, if that were your business, in Leicestershire, &c. as it seems by the evidence it was.

Parkyns. But that is not said, my lord, I humbly beg your pardon for interrupting you; it is not said, that I met them to rise, by no evidence whatsoever; and therefore, pray, my lord, do not enforce it beyond what the evidence has proved; he said, I went to meet my friends: was there any thing said it was in order to a rising?

L. C. J. Treby. I think you mistake your own words, as you spoke them to the witness, if I did take them, as I think I did, right, for they were several times repeated. I will do you no wrong, sir William, I assure you. You went into Leicestershire, and you say, it was to meet your friends; the witness says, it was to meet the king's friends; by the king, it is very plain, you meant not king William, but king James; for you spoke before of the king's landing, which was at Christmas last, when every body knows king William was in England. These coupled together—

Parkyns. I beg your pardon, my lord; those two things are not both to be joined together; the discourse of the king's landing was at Christmas, as he says; the other thing, my journey into Leicestershire, was a month afterwards, and therefore they cannot be coupled together.

L. C. J. Treby. The coupling of them, that I meant, was only to shew who was understood to be spoken of by you, when you named the king; so the question is, Whether you did not mean the same person in January that you meant in December, by the word king, especially since, as a discovery you had made, you said farther, the West was as well inclined to the king's interest as the North, and a lord's brother was concerned in it? If by the king you had meant king William; how impertinent and insensible had been all this discourse, that the west was as well inclined as the north, and that a lord's brother was concerned in it; concerned in what? In being inclined to king William; to what purpose could that be said?

Parkyns. It may as well be interpreted that way as the other.

L. C. J. Treby. I must leave that to the jury. And I confess, if there was not somewhat more in the case, you might the better argue upon this as to the interpretation. But laying aside the consideration of your riding into Leicestershire, &c. here is this providing of arms, proved by four or five witnesses, and the serving of them in that manner; and there is no account given by you, that they were provided for the service of the government, or that you were employed so to do. Certainly it is not lawful to provide arms, especially for a whole troop, as for aught I perceive here was, though indeed I am not skilful enough in those businesses, to know how many make up a troop; but it is plain here was an insurrection intended, when the invasion was made; and that is an evidence that these arms were to be employed upon that account, for no other use was to be made of them, nor is pretended. If you had found those arms in your house, as you say, it had been your duty to have delivered them up, or disposed of them to the use and service of the government, which service too, could only be when you had a commission from the government, and not of your own head. And then, besides all this, you acknowledge that you had a troop of old soldiers.

Parkyns. It is but slidingly that; for he only tells you, that a troop would be composed of old soldiers.

L. C. J. Treby. How can that be? when he says, he repeats your own words, My troop consists of old soldiers; can any body say, that his troop consists of old soldiers, without having a troop?

Parkyns. Pray, Mr. Sweet, speak; my life is at stake, did I say to you, it did consist, or it was to consist? Recollect yourself, and consider well before you speak.

L. C. J. What was it that he did say? It did consist, or it would consist?

Sweet. He said, his troop was composed all of old soldiers.

Parkyns. But does it appear by any evidence, that I had a troop? If I had, who were they? None of these men do appear. Does this troop consist of men in the air? that I should list men that are all in nubibus, and not one of them to be known. Suppose I should tell him a lye, or make some brags, is this treason? Here is no person proved to be listed or named.

L. C. J. But arms were found in your house for a troop.

Parkyns. But where they were bought, and when they were bought, and made ready, it does not appear; and I affirm to your lordship, if you would give me but one day's time, I would prove, that they were at my house in Warwickshire when I first came down thither, which is two years ago. And I will fully make it out to your satisfaction, or I will be crucified or any thing in the world. I can prove it by a great many witnesses, by my friends, and all the servants that belonged to me, they were there long before this discourse was had or thought of.

Just. Rokeby. If your lordship expects that I should deliver my opinion, I am ready to do it. As to this matter of law that sir William Parkyns has proposed, he says, There are not two witnesses to the same overt-act, and therefore no evidence of treason; truly, I take it, and always did, that the law is, there need not be two witnesses to the same overt-act; but if there be two witnesses, one whereof speaks to one overt-act, and another to another overt-act of the same species of treason, these are two witnesses within the law. Now, I think, there are two overt-acts in the indictment of this treason. The treason is compassing the death of the king; the overt-acts are first, the particular design of the assassination upon his person, and the other is, the bringing in of a foreign force, and preparing horses and arms to meet that foreign force here: All to the same intent and purpose, the compassing and imagining the king's death. Now, besides that of the assassination, there are a great many witnesses that prove there were arms prepared; for there were found a great quantity, when they opened the boxes; which boxes, it is plain, he himself sent down to Haywood's house: For though Charnock writ a letter, yet it was by his direction, as he owned to Haywood, when he was here in town. And then his servant fetched them away from this place, and this I take to be another overt-act, and proved by several witnesses. Sir William Parkyns speaks of his being a gown-man; but I do not know what a gownman has to do with such a quantity of arms.

Parkyns. If you will give me leave to send for some people, I will demonstrate it as clear as the sun, that they were in the house two years ago, when I came first thither.

Just. Rokeby. There were preparations two years ago, it appears, for the destruction of the king and kingdom; however, the men that were accused of it, had the luck to escape and be acquitted.

Parkyns. My lord, I hope I shall not be interpreted out of my life, I desire the statute may be read.

Just. Rokeby. What statute do you mean?

Parkyns. The 25th of Ed. 3, and the new statute too,* let them both be read to the jury, that they may consider of it.

The Statute of the 25th of Edw. 3. was read.

Parkyns. There is nothing of two witnesses there.

L. C. J. No; but there is another Statute of the 5th of Edw. 6. cap. 2. that may be more for your advantage: Will you have that read?

Parkyns. Yes, if you please; I know there is another Statute that does direct it, and I expected to have found it in this Statute.

Cl. of Ar. This is an act made in the 5th and 6th years of king Edw. 6.

The Statute was read to these words, "Unless without Trial he shall confess the same."

Parkyns. There is enough.

L. C. J. You have heard the Statute read, would you infer any thing from it?

Parkyns. I infer that there ought to be two witnesses, and here is but one.

* L. C. J. There are two witnesses.

Parkyns. Not direct to the same thing.

L. C. J. I shall leave it to the jury, whether this evidence does not prove an overt-act, to demonstrate a design against the king; if the design be to depose him, and that is manifested by two overt-acts, undoubtedly that is treason within the Statute of 25 of Edw. 3.

Parkyns. That I agree, but yet there must be two witnesses of it.

* L. C. J. Suppose dethroning the king be the main design that strikes at his life, and you resolve it shall be done one way or other. One way by assassination, the other by insurrection; or by invasion and joining with a foreign army.

Parkyns. My lord, I conceive there ought to be two witnesses for each.

L. C. J. No, no: for that very last act that is to take effect in a few days, declares it is sufficient, if there be one to one overt-act, and another to another; but still it must be of the same head or species of treason; and deposing the king and assassinating of him, and preparing to raise an army against him, or to excite an invasion, are but one sort of treason.

Parkyns. It may be so, if they were overt-acts of one sort of treason; but rising in arms, and assassination are as different things as can be in the world, and therefore there ought to be two witnesses to each of them.

Just. Rokeby. That which I delivered as my opinion was, that one witness proving one overt-act, and another witness proving another overt-act of the same sort of treason, are two good witnesses, according as the law requires. And I am the more fully confirmed in it, by the clause that is in this new act of parliament, made for trials in cases of treason, that a man shall not be convicted of treason, but by and upon the oaths and testimony of two lawful witnesses, either both of them to the same overt-act, or one of them to one, and the other of them to another overt-act of the same treason.

Parkyns. Of the same treason, aye.

Just. Rokeby. And here it is the imagining the death of the king, that is the treason.

Parkyns. Then you may say every thing else is so; but if you please to let the whole Statute be read.

L. C. J. You shall have it read if you will; but this is all that is in it concerning this matter. Now a design to depose the king, which is manifested by some overt-act, is an overt-act to prove the design of the death of the king.

Parkyns. Then it must be manifest, and not by interpretation; and all these things are by interpretation, except it be what Porter swears.

L. C. J. If by overt-act it be proved, that you designed his deposition, that is an overt-act to prove your design of his death.

Parkyns. They are very different things, death and depositions. We have seen a king deposed, and yet he is alive.

L. C. J. Treby. I am sure we have seen a king agreed to be assassinated, and yet, God thanked, he is still alive.

L. C. J. It is not the succeeding in the design, but the design itself that is the treason. God forbid that it should have success to make it treason.

L. C. J. Treby. But whenever people will agree together to bring in foreign forces, or to prepare men and arms against the king that is in possession, this is reckoned an overt-act of a design against his life, and has always been reckoned so by my lord chief justice Hales, my lord chief justice Coke, and by all those men that have been reputed the most tender in cases of this nature: For any act that expresses an intent of dethroning the king, by means of an invasion by a foreign force, and an insurrection against the king, is a proper proof of a design of his destruction; and if not, then agreeing to shoot him is not an overt-act. Men may say also, that there need be actual shooting to make out the overt-act in that case.

Parkyns. If your lordship pleases to have the act read, I shall submit to your lordship's judgment.

L. C. J. Let it be read.

Parkyns. If you please to read the act, the preamble of it.

Cl. of Ar. This is an act made in the 7th year of our sovereign lord the king: Is that the act? It is an act for regulating of trials in cases of high treason, and misprision of treason. Is that the act?

Parkyns. Yes, yes. (The act was read.)

Just. Rokeby. I believe if you look into the great case in parliament, the case of my lord Stafford, you will find it was declared for law, that one witness to one overt-act, and another witness to another overt-act of the same treason, they were two witnesses within the law, and this was a solemn resolution in parliament in the House of Lords.

Parkyns. I believe it has been done; but here is a beneficial law made, which if my trial had been put off a few days, I should have had the benefit of it.

L. C. J. It would have been the same thing as to this matter, for this act declares the very same thing, as to the two witnesses.

Parkyns. And then, my lord, I could have had witnesses to have taken off a great part of this evidence, and the law comes to take effect within one day, and it turns here upon this matter of Sweet, who is not a good evidence: for it is manifest he has contradicted himself, and it is manifest he has sworn what cannot be true.

L. C. J. Wherein?

Parkyns. That I should say the king would land here, for I had his word for it.

Just. Rokeby. You might have his word, and not delivered by his own mouth; there are other ways to convey a man's word, besides speaking.

Parkyns. But then we do not call it his word, that's hearsay.

Just. Rokeby. If a man write his note that he will do such a thing, we may very well say, we have his word for it.

L. C. J. It is not impossible but that you might speak with him.

Parkyns. It is impossible I should speak from hence to France.

L. C. J. You might have been over with him; I believe a great many others have, and it is proved Mr. Charnock went over.

Just. Rokeby. If any man should have said at the latter end of the last month, I believe that there was an assassination intended against the king, because I have his word for it, merely from reading his speech to the parliament, wherein he affirms that he had several proofs of it, that had been a proper expression, though he did not hear the king speak it.

Parkyns. Yes, if he had the speech to produce.

Just. Rokeby. Then if it come by letter, or message, or common fame, he might send you word by particular messenger.

Parkyns. Yes, if there was any such authority as that it were true. But he has manifestly contradicted himself, and captain Porter swears for his own life, and I must leave it to you, whether they are to be believed.

Just. Rokeby. Captain Porter's testimony has been sufficiently confirmed by the acknowledgment of dying persons.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more to say, sir William Parkyns?

Parkyns. No, my lord, I submit it to your lordship's direction.

L. C. J. Then what say you to it, Mr. Attorney, or Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel for the king in this matter, and it is my turn to sum up the evidence against the prisoner at the bar; he stands indicted for compassing the death of the king, for designing to depose the king, for promoting a foreign invasion, for intending an insurrection here at home, and for aiding and abetting the king's enemies, and for doing what he could to procure the subjection of his own country to foreigners and strangers.

Gentlemen, some of these crimes run into one another; designing the death of the king by assassination; and designing to depose the king, amount to one and the same thing with compassing and imagining the death of the king.

My lords the judges have given you their opinion in that point of law, and I think it is agreeable to all the resolutions that have been since the making of the statute of 25 of Edw. 3. I think that it has been explained so in the time of Richard the 2d; but this I am sure of, that it was so resolved in the time of Henry the 4th, when there was a design to set up Richard the second again, and it was adjudged to be high-treason in compassing and imagining the death of the king. For deposing the king, is destroying him in his politic capacity, as much as assassination and murdering of him is destroying him in his natural capacity; and the conspirators in such cases know what the great end is they aim at, to subvert the government as it is established by law, whereby every man enjoys his own property, and the freedom of his person, and those that will be quiet may have their liberty and property preserved entire to them; but some people are so very impatient of submitting to the law, that they cannot be content to be in servitude themselves, but they must needs do all they can to bring it upon their fellow subjects. And it were very well if that those who were in love with slavery, would but go to some other places, where they may have enough of it, and not bring it upon those who are so little desirous of such a thing, as we are, and I hope always shall be.

Gentlemen, to prove sir William Parkyns Guilty of this treason, whereof he stands indicted, we have produced several witnesses; and first there is Mr. Porter, and he tells you sir William Parkyns told him he had seen a commission from king James, written with his own hand, for making war against the person of king William.

Parkyns. Sir, I beg your pardon, for interrupting you, but there was not one word of that said; here is Mr. Porter, pray ask him, if ever I saw a commission from king James.

L. C. J. Porter did say so, if I remember any thing Porter said; you told him you had read the commission, and it was written with his own hand.

Parkyns. All that I heard of it was, that when I was desired to make one in the assassination, I refused it because I said I was busy about the matter of my regiment.

Att. Gen. Pray call Porter again. (Capt. Porter came in.)

Sol. Gen. Pray, capt. Porter, will you give the court and the jury an account what you heard sir William Parkyns say about the commission that came from king James?

Porter. I asked Mr. Charnock why I might not see the commission, and he told me he had never seen it himself, but sir William Parkyns had. I did ask sir William Parkyns, whether he had seen it, and he told me he did see it, and read it, and it was to raise war against the person of the prince of Orange.

Att. Gen. Whose hand was it in did he say?

Porter. It was written with king James's own hand.

Parkyns. This was my mistake, I thought he had said I told him I had a commission for a regiment.

Mr. Montague. Did he give any reason, why it was written with king James's own hand?

Porter. We used to say amongst ourselves, it was, because he would not trust any of his ministers with it.

Sol. Gen. I would not do sir William Parkyns any wrong, but only sum up what is material in the evidence given against him. I remember very well Mr. Porter said, Mr. Charnock told him sir William Parkyns had seen the commission, but I would not offer that as evidence against the prisoner what another told him, but he says besides that sir William Parkyns told him himself, that he had seen it, and that it was written with king James's own hand. He says that they had several meetings together, sir William Parkyns, and a great many others; and he names the places, the Nag's-head in Covent-Garden, the Sun Tavern in the Strand, and the Globe tavern in Hatton-Garden; he tells you particularly that it was agreed that King (who was executed), and Knightley, and himself, should go and view a place that should be proper for the as-assassination, and to give a report to the prisoner, and the rest of the conspirators, what they thought the most proper place; and that accordingly they did view the place, and came home at night, and met the company, whereof sir William Parkyns was one; and they gave an account how the place was viewed, and which was thought most proper, and then all the company agreed to it. He says indeed, that sir William Parkyns was not one that was to execute it in his own person, but one Scudamore was to be the man employed by him; and he did say it was a thing that was very necessary to be done, and would facilitate the introduction of king James, and the bringing him back again: And there is likewise this concurring evidence of Mr. Porter's with what I shall observe by and by, that sir William Parkyns was to procure five horses, three whereof he was to mount himself, and two he was to send captain Porter to mount; and if there were further occasion he could procure more from Mr. Lewis, gentleman of the horse to my lord Feversham; and accordingly we have produced to you two witnesses, Freeman and Turton, the one a tapster, the other an hostler that lived at the George-inn in Holborn, who give you an account that upon Friday before the first day that was designed for the assassination, there did come three horses to town, for sir William Parkyns; but it being put off upon the disappointment, they were sent out of town again. Upon the Friday afterwards, the day before the discovery, then there were four horses brought to town, and a 5th was of Mr. Lewis, which was a roan gelding.

Parkyns. Pray, Sir, will you please to observe what sort of horses they were; and particularly the height of them, that it may be known how fit they were for this business.

Sol. Gen. I will do you no wrong, sir William, if I can help it. The Jury have heard the evidence; and by and by they will hear my lord's directions: but they do say there were four brought to town, and a fifth was sent, a roan gelding; first, the witness said the horse came from Montague-house, but then presently he recollected himself, and acknowledged the mistake; and afterwards said it was from Somerset-house. So there were the five horses, three whereof sir William Parkyns was to mount, and 2 captain Porter, as he himself says; and these facts I instance in, as making a concurring evidence, and very near to two witnesses to prove this part of the conspiracy.

Then, gentlemen, captain Porter goes further, and says, that he had heard (but sir William Parkyns did not tell him so himself) that sir William Parkyns had a commission to raise a regiment of horse, and was preparing so to do, against the time of the invasion, to join with the forces that were to come from abroad. To confirm which, we have called Mr Sweet to give you an account that he had been acquainted with sir William Parkyns for three years, and that he had often talked with him about the king, that is, his present majesty, whom he called the prince of Orange, and the little gentleman; and about king James, whom he used to call always king; and he said the king was to land very speedily, and that he had a troop which consisted of old soldiers, and that there were several volunteers that were officers; he said he was to take a journey into Leicestershire, and accordingly he went; and when he returned back again he said, the west and the north were very well inclined to the king's interest, or to that purpose. And to strengthen his evidence we prove, that he did go accordingly into Leicestershire, and we prove it by his servant that went with him, where he met with several persons, particularly one Yarborough, and a parson; what they did transact the servant cannot prove, but he is a concurring witness to prove, that he went into Leicestershire; and we have all the reason in the world to believe that he went on that errand that he spoke of before, that is, to meet the king's friends, as he called king James. And then there is a further concurring evidence, his having a regiment, or a troop, it is not material, whether it be one or the other; and that is the matter of the arms, 4 dozen of swords, 32 carbines, 35 cases of pistols, that were hid in the garden of his house: And these arms we have traced further, he sent them from his house to Haywood's house; there he thought they would not lie safe, and therefore sir William Parkyns sends for them privately; they were to come away at night, and be brought back to his house, and they were accordingly brought back in the night to his house, and there they were buried; and the same person saw them taken up afterwards, which brought them to sir William Parkyns's house, and proves they were the same boxes that were buried, and which upon opening proved to be these arms, that were first sent to Haywood's and afterwards brought back to his own house.

So that this, gentlemen, is a concurring evidence both to what Sweet says, and to what Porter says; and those are the two witnesses to this part of the treason, that there was a provision of arms and men for this purpose, which he said he had a commission for.

Now, gentlemen, against all this he makes but a very small objection.

As to the matter of two witnesses to every overt-act, that has been over-ruled by the court; and as to the arms, he says he found them at his house when he first came to it; and then they were old rusty arms, but of this he gives you no manner of evidence. But if they were there when he came to the house, how came he at this time of day to hide them, and secrete them? Why might they not be as public now as they were before he came, which he has had time enough to prepare to prove since the finding of them? And he does not give you so much as any colourable reason why he so secreted them. And therefore it is a most just and violent suspicion, that they were for the purposes that the witnesses have given you an account of; and you have reason to believe they were provided for to arm that number of men, which he was to raise to assist the French when they came to land here. So that if you believe what the witnesses have sworn, you cannot say but that he is guilty of the treason charged upon him; and we doubt not you'll find him so.

Mr. Cowper. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; I am of the same side of counsel for the king. Sir William Parkyns has given us a good caution, which I shall take care to observe: and that is, not to strain either fact, or law, to his prejudice. But, my lord, when such a matter as this, a crime of this nature, is so far proved against the prisoner at the bar, that nobody can in his private judgment reasonably acquit him; then I think it a good piece of service to the public to make the matter so plain, that it may be put beyond all manner of doubt, both for the case of the jurors, and for the satisfaction of all others that hear this trial.

My lord, sir William Parkyns has truly divided his indictment into two parts, the one that accuses him of being concerned in the assassination, and the other that accuses him of being concerned in inviting the French into the kingdom, and engaging to meet them with an armed force.

My lord, as to the first part, I must do sir William Parkyns that right, that there is but one positive evidence as to the assassination; but that evidence tells ye he agreed to it at several meetings; nay, that he was one who said it was necessary to be done, in order to the other design he was engaged in, the facilitating the landing of the French, and king James his descent and restoration. There is, I say, indeed, but one witness of that matter, but the evidence of that one witness is confirmed by many concurring circumstances; by his sending for horses to town the day before the first Saturday, when this execrable treason was to have been executed; by sending them out of town again that day upon the disappointment; by sending for them again the Friday before the second Saturday that the king was to have been assassinated; by his having more horses than were usual with him that day; by his taking care then of three horses that were none of his own, and one of them brought very suspiciously from Somerset-house; and that all these eight horses should be immediately hurried and carried away upon the disappointment the second Saturday, and nothing ever heard of them afterwards. I say one of them was brought very suspiciously; for, my lord, you observe it came from Somerset-house, and was sent by Lewis according to the prisoner's promise to captain Porter, which Lewis, it is apparent by all the witnesses of this matter, was privy to this design.

My lord, there is another circumstance besides this, which, I think, has not been observed; and that is, his sending for Sweet up to town before the second time that the king was to have been assassinated; he came up indeed before both the times: the first time he was told by the prisoner, he had once designed to have used him in a business; but upon second thoughts he had compassion for his family. And when he came the second time, he was first asked what condition he had left his family in, whether he had provided them money. He said, No; and there upon he was chid: and the prisoner said, he might then as well have staid at home. All these circumstances, besides the one positive evidence, savour strongly of his having a great hand in the design of assassinating the king.

But then, my lord, as to the other part; his inviting the French, and preparing to meet them, that is positively proved by two witnesses. Captain Porter tells you, that the prisoner was at the two meetings in Leadenhall-street, and St. James's-street, where it was expressly resolved by all that were present, and the prisoner among the rest, to send Charnock over to invite the French to invade this kingdom, and to promise to meet king James at his landing with two thousand horse. He swears, That sir William Parkyns did particularly agree to what was resolved upon at both the consults. And Sweet tells you that he had prepared for the same design; for that sir William Parkyns told him the king would land, he had his word for it; and he himself had a troop of old soldiers. 'My troop does consist' (he spoke it in the present tense; for it being a doubt, sir William Parkyns did himself that right as to examine the witness again, and he repeated it as his words) 'My troop consists of old soldiers, or is composed of old soldiers;' and he was to have several volunteers that had been officers.

My lord, these two positive witnesses are evidence that goes to the same species of treason, nay, to the same design, the raising a rebellion, and the deposing the king, which is killing him in his politic capacity; I say, these two go home to the same design.

And, my lord, this evidence upon this branch of the indictment, is corroborated too by very strong circumstances. There is a journey to Leicester, which Sweet speaks of, that sir Wm. Parkyns told him he would undertake: this journey it is proved by his servants that he did undertake; that he met there with several persons, and came back and made his report to Sweet of the success of his journey, and how well disposed the king's friends were, by which name he always meant king James; for when he spoke of our present king, he called him the Little Gentleman, or sometimes king William, and sometimes, as the witness at last said positively, the prince of Orangé: but when he spoke of the king, without any thing else, he always meant king James; and besides, he spoke of a king that was beyond sea at Christmas last, which could not be king William, who was then, and had been in England so long before.

My lord, the prisoner in his defence says, that this servant of his that went with him into Leicestershire, had been formerly Charnock's servant, and was sent by Charnock with the message to Kensington, and not by him. Yet I must observe, that the evidence swore positively he was sent by sir William Parkyns, his master, and brought the note in the almanack back to the person to whom he was directed to carry it, who lodged at the confectioner's house; and when he had so done, that the person that lodged at the confectioner's did not remit him to Charnock, but to his master sir William Parkyns, with a message that he would be at home, and stay there ready, whenever he should have occasion for him: and this was upon the very Saturday the king was to have been assassinated.

My lord, sir William Parkyns has complained, that if he could have had his evidence here he could have proved the arms had been two years in his house, and that he found them there when he came thither first. If we should admit that matter, we might confess, and avoid it; for it is apparent that these arms were on this occasion put up in a suspicious manner in boxes, and sent to Haywood's (who is a suspicious person, by reason of his relation to Charnock, upon whose letter and recommendation they were received), and concealed till the plot was disappointed; and then they were carried away from that place, and buried in sir William Parkyns's own garden. This was just after the breaking out of the plot; and they were buried for the better securing them as choice goods. And whereas the prisoner says they were old and rusty when he found them, it now appears they were clean and new-furbished arms, and the hilts were off the swords, and packed together.

My lord, he has recourse to another argument in the last place, the most moving, I must confess, of all, and that is the argument of pity; he has spoke of his education in the profession of the gown, of his infirmities, his age, and his family. Arguments of pity I am very unfit to give an answer to, and should be very unwilling to extinguish any motions of it; but this I must observe, even by way of answer to that argument, that the time was when he should have pitied himself, and not engaged in such an abominable and merciless a design; that he should have had pity upon his country, which he plotted to bring under the greatest confusion and desolation; that he should have had pity upon the best of kings and the best of men; but then there was no pity, when they thought they had laid their designs so that they had him in their power, but they resolved barbarously to murder him, and persisted in the resolution of assassinating him after they were once disappointed; that it seems, did not discourage them, but they undertook it a second time, and it does not appear that they ever had any remorse at last for it; but the plot broke out, and so their design was frustrated.

My lord, this is the sum, I think, of his defence; I have, as well as I was able, given an answer to the objections made to it, and I must now leave it with you, gentlemen of the jury: and though these considerations that I have mentioned may not quite remove all compassion, yet they may serve to confirm you in a resolution of doing the king, and kingdom, and yourselves justice; and that is all we ask of you.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, sir William Parkyns is indicted of high-treason, for designing, imagining, and compassing the death of the present king. There have been several witnesses produced that have given evidence upon this indictment; the first of them is Mr. Porter, who has been a witness heretofore against several upon the like occasion; and he gives you this account, that about the latter end of May, or the beginning of June last, there was a meeting of divers persons at the Old King's-head tavern in Leadenhall-street, in the city, where they dined together; and there was sir William Parkyns, captain Porter himself, sir John Fenwick, sir John Freind, and divers others that he has mentioned to you. At that meeting they did consult together, which way the late king James might be restored, and it was thought very necessary that there should be a French force sent over hither to join with others for his restoration. And they did among themselves agree and determine, what number of forces might be convenient for that purpose; they did propose 10,000; 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons; and that a message should be sent over to king James, to persuade him to solicit the French king to furnish him with such a number of men, to be sent over into England. Mr. Charnock, that was then in the company, was the person agreed upon among them to be the messenger to be sent upon this errand; which employment he did undertake, upon their promise, that they would raise among themselves 2,000 horse for to meet the late king at his landing.

This being at that time determined, and Mr. Charnock having accepted this employment, he did make preparation to go upon this errand. In some time after (a week or a fortnight, or thereabouts) there was another meeting, at which were several of the same persons that were present at the former, and among them sir William Parkyns was one: and this meeting was at one Mrs. Mountjoy's, that keeps a tavern in St. James's-street, where they did discourse of what they had formerly agreed upon, and did again consider, whether they should proceed to send Mr. Charnock with that message; to which they all agreed, that Mr. Charnock should go, and he accordingly went: and captain Porter met him about five or six weeks after the meeting at Mrs. Mountjoy's; and Charnock told him he had been with the several persons who had sent him, and had acquainted them with the answer of king James; which was, that at that juncture of time the French king had such occasion for his forces, that he could not spare them, or furnish him with so many to come over here. This is the first matter that Porter gives you an account of.

But then captain Porter tells you farther, how the design of assassinating the king was set on foot about the latter end of January, or the beginning of February last; about which time sir George Barclay was sent over with a commission from the late king James; which seems to have given great encouragement to that party of men: For sir George Barclay, captain Porter, and sir William Parkyns, with divers others, had several meetings at the Globe tavern in Hatton-Garden, the Nag's-Head tavern in Covent-Garden, the Sun tavern in the Strand, and other places. And at these meetings they entered into consideration, what was the best way to restore the late king James to the throne; and it was agreed among them, that the best means for the effecting that restoration would be to kill king William, which they resolved to undertake; and at these debates and resolutions sir William Parkyns, the prisoner at the bar, was present. Captain Porter being asked whether sir William Parkyns, at these consults, did consent to the king's murder, he said they did all agree to the assassination of the king; and sir William Parkyns said, he thought it was very necessary to be done, to facilitate the restoration of the late king.

Gentlemen, this design of assassinating the king being thus resolved upon, the next thing considered among them was, how it might be effected. There were several ways proposed: One was by an ambuscade; for the king having a house in the country by Richmond, his Majesty used to go once a week a-hunting thereabout, and to return at night; and therefore an ambuscade on that side of the water, near the house, was proposed. Then another proposal was made to fall upon the guards on this side the water, and at the same time that the king's coach was to be set upon. And these two places being proposed, there was some difference of opinion among them; whereupon it was agreed that some persons should be sent to view the ground on both sides the water, which persons were captain Porter, King that was executed, and one Knightley: And so some days before the 15th of February they did go on both sides the water, and viewed the ground, and returned in the evening to the Nag's-head tavern, according to agreement; where were met together sir George Barclay, Mr. Charnock, and the prisoner at the bar sir William Parkyns. And there they made their report of their view of the ground; upon which both the proposals were debated; and at last they did all agree that the attack should be made upon the king on this side of the water, in a lane that was between Brentford and Turnham-green; and the attack upon the guards was likewise to be made thereabouts.

Sir William Parkyns was to furnish five horses, whereof three of them were to be by men of his own providing; the other two were to be mounted by men of captain Porter's providing; Mr. Porter, Mr. Charnock, and one Rookwood were to be principally engaged in attacking the guards. The number of men agreed upon for the whole were about forty, or few more, and sir George Barclay was to have a party out of them all, of about eight; and as those others went to fall upon and charge the guards, sir George Barclay with his party of men, was to attack the king in his coach, and by shooting into the coach to kill the king and all that were with him.

The time agreed upon for putting this design in execution was on Saturday the 15th of February. That day it was expected the king would go a hunting. And two men were planted at Kensington to give notice when the king went; and upon such notice these men were to march out in small parties, and to lodge in the inns and public-houses about Brentford and Turnham Green, upon notice of the king's return from the other side of the water, and sir George Barclay was to be in readiness to set upon the coach in the lane, and the other party to attack the guards.

But this horrid design was very happily discovered, which prevented the king's going abroad on that day; and though they were disappointed for that time, yet the design was not at an end: But their resolutions continue to make the like attempt when they could have another opportunity. And for that purpose there was another meeting, as captain Porter tells you, upon the Friday following at the Sun tavern in the Strand, at which sir William Parkyns, sir George Barclay, Rookwood, and Charnock, and captain Porter, were present; and they did agree to attack the king and the guards the next day, in the same place and manner that they had formerly agreed upon. But by good providence the king had notice of it, so that he did forbear to go abroad that day; whereby these conspirators were totally disappointed of their barbarous and villainous design which they had resolved upon, and had made such preparations to compass.

It is true, captain Porter does tell you, sir William Parkyns was not to be one that should be actually present at the assassination; but he was to furnish five horses; three of them to be mounted by men of his own providing, and two by men that captain Porter was to provide. And you are told positively that captain Porter, at this last meeting, did complain that two of his horses were fallen lame, and acquainted sir William Parkyns with it; and he promised to help him to two more by the means of one Lewis that was gentleman of the horse to my lord Feversham.

Then you are told, that sir William Parkyns sent to Sweet to come to town the 11th of February, and Sweet comes to town accordingly on Wednesday the 12th of February; and then he had discourse with sir William Parkyns at his lodgings; where sir William told him, that because of his family, he would not employ him in the business he intended for him, and therefore bid him go home again; and withal directed him to return to town the Friday following, and order his groom to bring his horses to town; he mentioned three horses which should be the strongest he had. The groom brought up the three horses, and Sweet came to town with him, and staid till Saturday. Sir William Parkyns said, he thought to go out of town in the afternoon, but did not, but staid till Monday, when he went out of town.

But upon the Friday following the horses of sir William Parkyns were brought to town again, which now were four, and were set up at the George-inn in Holborn; and it appears that Mr. Lewis furnished one horse; for there were five horses upon the account of sir Wm. Parkyns, of which a roan horse was one, which came from Somerset-house. This is proved by the ostler; and that Lewis himself came in on Saturday in the afternoon to inquire for sir Wm. Parkyns; but he was gone, and the horses were taken away, and he once came with sir William Parkyns to the inn. These are circumstances that do concur with and confirm captain Porter's evidence concerning the providing horses for this design.

Then there is another particular of captain Porter's evidence concerning the commission from king James, which is remarkable: it was told you, that he asked Charnock whether he had seen the commission: he said, No, but sir William Parkyns had: and sir Wm. Parkyns was asked by Porter, as they were sitting by the fire-side, whether he had seen the commission; and sir William Parkyns answered, that he had seen it, and had read it, and it was written with king James's own hand; and that the substance of it was to make war upon the person of the present king, who was called in the commission, as you may suppose, the prince of Orange. So that, gentlemen, as to the design of the assassinating the king, and of this commission, which was understood by them to be for that purpose, this is the sum and substance of Porter's evidence, so attended with and confirmed by these circumstances, as you have heard.

Besides, the other witness, Sweet, who was a great acquaintance of sir William Parkyns, tells you, That about Christmas last he was informed by sir William Parkyns, that the king would come, which he understood to be meant of king James. He asked sir William Parkyns, how he knew it? and he said, He had his word for it; and that his troop consisted of old soldiers, and he had thirty saddles; and besides, there would be some volunteers, which were old officers. Then he said, He was to go into Leicestershire, and he did go with one Scudamore; and this was in January, about the latter end, as I remember. They lay that night at Stony-Stratford, and the next night at Leicester, and Scudamore went with him; and afterwards one Yarborough, and a parson, came to him out of Yorkshire: and when he came back he said, He found all there to be very well; and the west was as well inclined to the king's interest as the north; and a lord's brother was concerned.

Then in the next place you are told, That at Michaelmas last Mr. Charnock did write a letter to one Haywood, who had married his sister, and lived near sir William Parkyns in Warwickshire, to desire him to receive some goods into his house that were to come from sir William Parkyns's, and lay them up very carefully; for they were choice goods, which sir William durst not leave in his own house, because he had left it. And accordingly there were these boxes and chests sent to Haywood's, and received by him into his house, where they continued till the latter end of February. Haywood about this time, when the design of the Assassination was on foot, met with sir William Parkyns in town, and asked him how he would dispose of those goods? Thereupon sir William Parkyns sent his servant into the country; and notice was given on Ash-Wednesday, the Wednesday after the first proclamation that issued upon the discovery of this conspiracy, that these goods should be removed: and a man, in the evening, went to Haywood's house with a cart and horses, and removed these chests; they were three in number; and those being opened, there were eight lesser ones taken out, and carried away about nine or ten o'clock at night to sir William Parkyns's house in Warwickshire, where they were buried in the garden, and afterward were dug up; which was at the searching sir William's house upon the breaking out of the plot; and when they were opened, it did appear what sort of goods they were: they were arms, a considerable quantity of them; four dozen of swords without hilts, twenty-five pair of pistols, and a great number of carbines, thirty-two as I remember, and a parcel of hilts packed up in a box by themselves. This, gentlemen, is sworn to you by the persons that were present at the digging them up, and opening the boxes.

Then, gentlemen, you are told, That though sir William Parkyns pretends they were arms that he found in the house when he came thither, yet they were not old rusty arms, as he pretends, but they were very bright, and fit for use and service.

There is one circumstance more that seems to affect sir William Parkyns, about the business of the assassination; and that is proved by Eubank, sir William's own servant. There was a note sent upon Saturday, the 22d of February in the morning, to one Brown at Kensington, by sir William Parkyns's man; and this Brown writ in the servant's Almanack, that he would be in town himself in a little time, and bid him carry it to a man that lodged at a confectioner's over against Gray's-Inn gate in Holborn: sir William Parkyns's man accordingly goes to this confectioner's, and speaks with the person there that he was directed to go to; and he says he was a Scotchman, and talked broad like a Scotchman, and he bid him go and tell his master, that he would stay within for him till he came: and he did accordingly.

Gentlemen, This is the sum and substance of the evidence that is given against sir Wm. Parkyns. Now you are to consider what sir William says for himself: he does admit, and agree, That what Porter says is very positive and full; but that is but the evidence of one witness: for, says he, by the law no person ought to be convicted of high-treason upon the testimony of one witness. As to the matter of law he is in the right: no man ought to be convicted of treason upon the testimony of a single witness. Now, first suppose the design to assassinate the king had not been proved; consider then whether there be not two witnesses besides. Porter proves, that Charnock was sent into France, by sir William Parkyns, and others, upon that errand; to which, if you add the testimony of Sweet, that swears, that sir William Parkyns told him the king would come, and he had a troop, and had bought saddles; and what is said concerning his going into Leicestershire, and his having a quantity of arms: if all which be understood in pursuance of the design against his present majesty, then there are at least two witnesses of several overt acts of the same treason.

For, gentlemen, I must tell you, though there had been no evidence of, a design to assassinate the king, but the design and purpose had been to depose him, and set the late king upon the throne, or join with a force to invade the realm, that is high-treason within the statute of 25 Edw. 3, as being a designing the death and destruction of the king. There hath been a full proof by two witnesses, if what Sweet, and the other witnesses besides Porter say, to prove sir William Parkyns to be concerned in that design, which shall be considered further of by and bye.

But in the next place, suppose that the meetings at the King's-Head in Leadenhall-street, and at Mountjoy's, had not been proved; but the design to assassinate the king is proved by one witness, and the providing men and arms to fight against him is proved by one other witness; this is a proof of the same treason: for though the overt acts be several, yet they both tend to the same end, the destruction of the king, though in a different manner; and though the law requires two witnesses to the same sort of treason, yet it does not require two witnesses to any one overt act. For if one witness prove one overt act at one time, and another witness prove another overt act at another time, these are two witnesses within the meaning of the law; and so it has been always practised, and never denied to be law that I know of.

Besides, it is observable upon this point, which my brother has mentioned, that this new act of parliament, which does not yet take effect, provides, that there shall be either two witnesses to one overt act, or one witness to one, and another to another of the same species of treason; and you have had the opinion of all of us now that are here, that these are overt acts of one and the same species of treason.

But then sir William Parkyns objects, That Sweet does not prove any overt act. Now for that, you are to consider the force of Sweet's evidence, who tells you the discourse of sir William Parkyns, about Christmas last, of the king's coming, of his saddles, and of his troop consisting of old soldiers, and volunteers that were old officers. But says sir Wm. Parkyns, this is only words, and words are not treason. But then consider, that they are words that relate to acts and things. You hear he had a great quantity of arms, beyond what he, as a private man, could have occasion for, or would use. He does not give you any account what he was to do with those arms, or to what purpose he should keep them, nor why he caused them to be removed in the night, after they had lain privately in Haywood's house, and caused them to be carried back to his own house, and buried them in the ground, and at such a time when there was a plot, and after the plot was discovered, and a proclamation out for his own apprehension.

Sir William Parkyns's discourse with Sweet, of king James's coming, and his troop consisting of such men, plainly shews what those arms were for. For, gentlemen, men's discourses and their words explain their actions; and an indifferent action in itself may be so explained by words, that it will be unlawful. It is lawful for a man to buy a pistol; but if it can be plainly proved from his words or his speeches, that the design of buying it was to use it against the person or life of the king, that will be an overt act. Now, when sir Wm. Parkyns said, The late king would come, and that he had a troop which consisted of such soldiers; then these arms being found in that manner, I must leave to your consideration whether it is not a proof, for what purpose he did provide them, and to what use he intended to put them; especially since he gives you no account, what use or occasion he had for them. He says, indeed, he found them in the house two years ago; how probable that is, you may consider.

Then there is another thing, his going into Leicestershire with Scudamore, and his meeting there with Yarborough and other people in that private and basty manner. He went out on the Thursday, and came home again upon Monday night; and then he meets with Sweet, and tells him that all was well; and the West was as well inclined to the king's interest as the North. What king must he mean? He had no commission from king William to go into Leicestershire to discourse with people, to see how they stood affected to his interest. Sweet comes and tells you, that when sir William Parkyns spoke of the king, he understood he meant king James. I must leave it to your consideration, how you will interpret these words.

It is true, gentlemen, it is not fit there should be any strained or forced construction put upon a man's words or actions, when he is tried for his life. You ought to have a full and satisfactory evidence to convince you, that he is guilty, before you pronounce him so; but, however, you are to consider the nature of things, and the circumstances that attend them. If you can suppose that he went into Leicestershire to king William's friends, and that he was of opinion, the West was as well affected to king William as the North; then you make a different construction from Sweet, who tells you, that always when he spake of the king, he understood it of king James; and at Christmas, when he spoke of the king's coming, it must be meant king James; for king William was here before, and he pretends not he had any authority to raise a troop for king William.

So that, gentlemen, I must leave it to you upon the whole matter; if you are satisfied, that sir William Parkyns is guilty of the matters of which he stands charged, you will find him guilty; you have heard the evidence, and will consider of it; and if, upon the whole, you are not satisfied that he is guilty of the matters charged in this indictment, then you are to acquit him.

Then an officer being sworn to keep the Jury according to custom, they withdrew to consider of their verdict, and in less than half an hour returned into court.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen of the Jury, answer to your names. William Northey.—

Mr. Northey. Here. (And so of the rest.)

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, are you all agreed on your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Sir William Parkyns, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon the prisoner; how say ye, is he Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty.—Foreman. Guilty, my lord.

Cl. of Ar. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements, had he at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

L. C. J. Jailor, look to him, he is found guilty of high treason.

Cl. of Ar. Then hearken to your verdict as the court has recorded it. You say that sir William Parkyns is guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no goods or chattels, lands or tenements, at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge; and so you say all?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, the court discharges you, and thanks you for your service.

While the Jury was withdrawn to consider of the verdict, sir John Freind was brought from Newgate to the bar, in order to his being called to Judgment, and after the verdict, he addressed himself to the court thus:

Freind. My lord, I humbly beseech your lordship to give me leave to read this Paper.

(To which the Court gave no answer.)

Freind. My lord, will your lordship give me leave to read it?

L. C. J. Ay, if you will.

Freind. (Reads.) My lord, I humbly move in arrest of judgment, that I am not convicted of treason by two witnesses, as I ought to have been within the statute of the 25th of Edw. 3; for Mr. Porter swears, That I, with others, in May or June last, sent to the French king to invade England; he is the only witness to that matter. Mr. Blair swears, That I shewed him a commission in Surrey-street, about two years since, signed by king James, and counter-signed Melford, to be a colonel of horse, and that I gave him some monies for the cherishing of the men. My lord, here is no levying of war sworn by Mr. Blair; and conspiring to levy war not being treason, I am convicted by one witness, and therefore I pray counsel may be assigned me, to plead this matter.

L. C. J. Sir John Freind, that which you move now is not in arrest of judgment; it is matter that does arise upon the evidence, and what you now say, arraigns the verdict, and the proceedings upon your trial. There were two witnesses against you, that is plain. You were not indicted for levying war, but for compassing and imagining the death of the king; and we told you the design of the invasion, and conspiring to depose the present king, and restore the late king, was an overt act of that high treason. The commission was not so much stood upon, but the advancing monies upon this account, to Blair your lieutenant colonel, to give to the men, that was a plain overt act, and so there were certainly two witnesses against you.

Freind. My lord, I hope I can clear myself: I thank God, I am as innocent as the child unborn, of the assassination of the king. I would not have the people think that I am such a man.

L. C. J. But you remember, it was sworn you knew of it, and we have told you, that the design of restoring the late king by force, and deposing the king, are overt acts of imagining his death, if such an intention be proved, as it was in your case, and the jury have found it so.

Freind. My lord, I humbly beseech you, because I do not understand matter of law, and am advised to move this in arrest of judgment; I desire my counsel may be heard to it.

L. C. J. We cannot hear counsel; but upon a matter that arises upon the record itself, that is, the indictment. We cannot enter into any examination of this matter that you now speak of, you had a long trial yesterday.

Freind. My lord, I am sorry to give your lordship any occasion of trouble; but I humbly beseech you, if it may be, that I may be heard by my counsel, for the satisfaction of the world; pray, my lord, hear what they can say.

L. C. J. They cannot say any thing; no counsel in the world that understand themselves, can argue any thing against what has been so often settled and always practised.

Freind. My lord, if it be to be granted, I beseech your lordship to grant it.

L. C. J. It cannot be granted; besides, the matter you now move upon is improper; it was all considered upon your trial. It was told you, we did all agree, that a conspiracy to levy war to depose the king is treason, or to invade the realm is treason. All this was considered at your trial, and that is now over.

Parkyns. My lord, if your lordship pleases, I desire I may have the liberty of some friends and relations, and a minister to come to me.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, by all means.

Parkyns. If your lordship pleases, that they may come and be private with me, and pray let me have a rule of court for it, otherwise I shall not have any benefit of it.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, it is very fit you should have it; there shall be an order of court for it: see that the keeper take care it be done with safety.

Freind. My lord, I desire the same liberty of a minister, and my relations and friends to come to me; that for what time I have to live, I may make the best use I can of it for my soul, which I hope God will enable me to do.

The Court was adjourned until five o'clock on the afternoon, and about six the justices returned, and the court was resumed.

Cl. of Ar. Set sir John Freind to the bar: (which was done.) Sir John Freind, hold up thy hand, (which he did.) Thou standest convicted of high-treason, for traitorously compassing and imagining the death of our sovereign lord king William the 3rd. What canst thou say for thyself, why the court should not give thee judgment according to the law?

Then being made to kneel, he afterwards stood up.

Freind. I have said already, what I have to say in arrest of judgment.

Com. Serj. Sir, you have heard the judgment of the court, as to what you have said; if you have nothing else to offer, the court must proceed to judgment.

Cl. of Ar. for Middlesex. Sir William Parkyns, hold up thy hand, (which he did.) Thou standest convicted of high-treason in compassing and imagining the death of the king, and adhering to the king's enemies. What canst thou say for thyself, why the court should not give thee judgment to die, according to the law?

He was made to kneel, and rise up again.

Parkyns. I have nothing more to offer.

Cl. of Ar. Then, cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes; all manner of persons are commanded to keep silence, while judgment is in giving, upon pain of imprisonment.

Which Proclamation was made on both sides the court; and then Mr. Common Ser-jeant sitting with the rest of the court upon the bench, pronounced the sentence.

Com. Serj. You the prisoners at the bar, sir John Freind and sir William Parkyns, you have been indicted for high-treason, in compassing the death and destruction of the king: for your trial, you have put yourselves upon the country, which country has found you guilty. The offence is the greatest in the judgment of the law that a man can commit; and it is justly and reasonably so. For robbery and murder are injuries to private persons, but compassing the death of the king, is compassing the destruction of the father of your country, and letting in rapine, death, and desolation upon thousands of people. And even this, the heinousness of offences, is capable of aggravation; for there have been always excuses, and sometimes justifications for rebellion: and as to murder and private revenge, there may be somewhat said in mitigation from the violence of men's passions. But to sit, and conspire, and consult, and debate the destruction of a prince; no man yet ever had the confidence to make an excuse for it. I would not add to your affliction; I am sensible of the severe judgment that is to follow, and which you have brought upon yourselves, and cannot but pity you for the great burden of guilt that you have laid yourselves under. I only say this to offer it to your serious consideration, in the few moments you have to prepare for another world, and another judgment. All that remains for me, is to pronounce the judgment of the law in these cases, and the court does award it.

'That you, and each of you, go back to the place from whence you came, and from thence be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, where you shall be severally hanged up by the neck, and cut down alive; your bodies shall be ripped open, your privy-members cut off, your bowels taken out and burnt before your faces; your heads shall be severed from your bodies, your bodies respectively to be divided into four quarters, and your heads and quarters are to be at the disposal of the king: and the Lord have mercy upon your souls.'

Then the prisoners were carried back to Newgate.

On Friday, April 3, 1696, sir John Freind and sir William Parkyns were drawn on sledges from Newgate to Tyburn, where they delivered the following Papers to the Sheriffs:

SIR JOHN FREIND'S PAPER.

Knowing that I must immediately give an account to God of all my actions, and that I ought to be specially careful of what I say in these last hours, I do solemnly profess, that what I here deliver is from my very soul, with all the heartiness and sincerity of a dying Christian.

The cause I am brought hither to suffer for,

I do firmly believe to be the cause of God and true religion, and, to the best and utmost of my knowledge and information, agreeable to the laws of the land, which I have evermore heard do require a firm duty and allegiance to our sovereign; and that as no foreign, so neither any domestic power can alienate our allegiance. For it is altogether new and unintelligible to me, that the king's subjects can depose and dethrone him on any account, or constitute any that have not an immediate right in his place. We ought, I think, not to do this; and surely, when it is done, to assist him in the recovery of his right, is justifiable, and our duty. And however things may seem at present, I do believe, I am sure I heartily pray, that he shall be one day restored to his rightful throne and dominions.

As for any sudden descent of his majesty upon these his dominions, in order to the recovery of them, I declare I had no certain knowledge of it; nor can I tell what grounds there was to believe it, so little reason had I to be in a present preparation for it. I suppose it is not expected I should here endeavour to clear myself of the Assassination, which was not the thing alleged against me; however, it was mentioned, through what means I know not. As it was insinuated to my disadvantage, I forgive such as were therein instrumental; and I do also, from the very bottom of my soul, freely forgive, and beg of God to do so too, such as were any ways accessory towards the taking away my life, which I really look upon to be their misfortune more than mine.

I profess myself, and I thank God I am so, a member of the Church of England, though, God knows, a most unworthy and unprofitable part of it; of that church which suffers so much at present for a strict adherence to loyalty, the laws and Christian principles; for this I suffer, and for this I die.

Though I have a perfect charity for people of all professions, and do heartily wish well, and would endeavour to do so to all my fellow-subjects, of what persuasion soever. And indeed I have met with a great deal of uprightness and sincerity among some people of very different opinions in religious matters.

And I hope and desire it may not be taken as an uncharitable censure, or undue reflection, that I objected to the legality of popish evidence, being advised so to do for my better security, upon the foundation of a statute law.

Having owned myself a member of the Church of England, I must take this opportunity, and I do it for God's glory, to apply myself to you that are royalists of that church, and of the same faith and principles with myself: and I beg of you, for God's sake, and the love of your souls, to be very constant and serious in all religious offices, and holy duties, of divine worship and service, which I have too much neglected, as I own to my great sorrow: let no excuse, no dangers, prevent or hinder you in the most necessary and serious matters; and be, I beseech you, very careful and cir-cumspect in all your actions, behaviour, and conversation, as I earnestly exhorted all that came to me.

I have, I thank God, a great deal of satisfaction in my present sufferings, and have found it so ever since I have been under them: And blessed be God it doth continually increase upon me. And I do now lay down my life with all cheerfulness and resignation, in sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whose merits alone I hope for the pardon of my sins, and the salvation of my soul.

And so, O Lord! into thy hands I commend my spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord! thou God of truth!

And I do heartily and humbly beseech the Almighty God, and my most gracious Father, to forgive and bless this sinful nation; deliver it from the guilt of rebellion, blood, and perjury, that is now on all sides more than ever, and from all those other heinous sins which cry aloud. Preserve and bless this Church. Comfort our distressed king; restore him to his right, and his misled subjects to their allegiance: bless also his royal consort, our gracious queen Mary; his royal highness the prince of Wales, that he may grow in stature, and in favour with God and man; support and strengthen all those that suffer in any kind for a good cause; give them patience under all their afflictions, and a happy deliverance out of them. Forgive all mine enemies.

Pardon my former neglect and remissness in religious worship, and holy duties, and all the sins I have been guilty of to this very moment. Consider my contrition, accept my tears; and now thou art pleased to take me hence, take me into thy favour, and grant that my soul may be without spot presented unto thee, through the merits of thy most dearly beloved Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen. JOHN FREIND.

SIR WILLIAM PARKYNS'S PAPER.

It hath not been my custom to use many words, and I shall not be long upon this occasion, having business of much greater consequence to employ my thoughts upon. I thank God I am now in a full disposition to charity, and therefore shall make no complaints, either of the hardships of my trial, or any other rigours put upon me. However, one circumstance I think myself obliged to mention. It was sworn against me by Mr. Porter, that I had owned to him that I had seen and read a commission from the king to levy war upon the person of the prince of Orange. Now, I must declare, that the tenour of the king's commission, which I saw, was general, and directed to all his loving subjects, to raise and levy war against the prince of Orange, and his adherents; and to seize all forts, castles, &c. which, I suppose, may be a customary form of giving authority to make war; but I must confess I am not much acquainted with matters of that nature: but as for any commission particularly levelled against the person of the prince of Orange, I neither saw nor heard of any such.

It is true, I was privy to the design upon the Prince, but was not to act in it; and am fully satisfied that very few, or none, knew of it but those who undertook to do it.

I freely acknowledge, and think it for my honour to say, that I was entirely in the interest of the king, being always firmly persuaded of the justice of his cause: and I looked upon it as my duty, both as a subject, and an Englishman, to assist him in the recovery of his throne, which I believe him to be deprived of contrary to all right and justice; taking the laws and constitutions of my country for my guide.

As for religion, I die in the communion of the church of England, in which I was educated.

And as I freely forgive all the world, so whoever I may any ways have injured, I heartily ask them pardon.

WILLIAM PARKYNS.

Jerciny Collier, a Nonjuring Minister, publicly absolved them at the gallows. After which they were executed according to their sentence.

386. The Trial of AMBROSE ROOKWOOD, for High Treason: At the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer for the County of Middlesex, sitting in the Court of King's-Bench at Westminster :*
8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.

THE Court being sat, at which were present the lord chief justice Holt, the lord chief justice Treby, Mr. justice Nevil, Mr. justice Powell, and Mr. justice Eyre; the Court proceeded in this manner:

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyez, oyez, oyez: All manner of persons that have any thing more to do, at this Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, holden for the county of Middlesex, draw near and give your attendance. God save the king.

Then the Grand Jury were called over, and the appearances marked, and witnesses being sworn in court, to give evidence to them upon a bill of indictment against Alexander Knightley, they in a little time after withdrew to hear the evidence.

Then the keeper of Newgate was ordered to bring his prisoners to the bar, (which he did); to wit, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne; who were thus arraigned:

Cl. of Ar. Robert Lowick, hold up thy hand, (which he did); Ambrose Rookwood, hold up thy hand, (which he did); Charles Cranburne, hold up thy hand, (which he did.)

You stand indicted in the county of Middlesex, by the names of Robert Lowick of the parish of St. Paul Covent-garden, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman; Ambrose Rookwood of the same parish, gentleman; and Charles Cranburne of the same parish and county, yeoman; for that you, together with one Christopher Knightley, of the same parish and county, gentleman, not yet taken; not having the fear of God in your hearts, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as false traitors against the most serene, most illustrious, most clement, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William the 3d, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. your supreme, true, rightful, lawful, and undoubted lord, the cordial love, and true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance, which every subject of our said lord the king that now is, towards him our said lord the king should bear, and of right ought to bear, withdrawing, and utterly to extinguish, intending and contriving, and with all your strength resolving, designing, and conspiring the government of this kingdom of England, under him our said sovereign lord the king that now is, of right, duly, happily, and well established, altogether to subvert, change, and alter, as also our said lord the king to death and final destruction to put and bring, and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England, into intolerable and most miserable servitude to Lewis the French king to subjugate and intral, the 10th day of February, in the seventh year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times as well before as after, at the parish of St. Paul, Covent-garden, aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did compass, imagine, and contrive, resolve, design, and intend, our said lord the king that now is, to kill, slay, and murder, and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of our said lord the king, throughout this whole kingdom of England, to make and cause, and the same your most impious, wicked, and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, contrivances, and purposes aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, you the said Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, together with the said Christopher

Knightley, and very many other false traitors, to the jurors unknown, afterwards, to wit, the same 10th day of Feb. in the year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and divers others days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, traitorously, and with force and arms, did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent and agree, him our said lord the king that now is, by lying in wait, and guile, to assassinate, kill and murder; and that execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing the sooner to execute, and perpetrate, afterwards (to wit) the same day and year, and divers other days and times, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously did treat, propose, and consult, of the ways, manner, and means, and the time and place, where, when, how, and in what manner, our said lord the king, so by lying in wait, the more easily you might kill; and did consent, agree, and assent, that forty horsemen, or thereabouts, whereof the said Christopher Knightley, you the said Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, should be four; and every one of you traitorously took upon himself to be one, with guns, muskets, and pistols, charged with gunpowder and leaden bullets, and with swords, rapiers, and other weapons being armed, should lie in wait, and lie in ambush, our said lord the king in his coach being, when he should go abroad, to invade, and that a certain and competent number of those men, so armed, should set upon the guards of our said lord the king then attending him, and being with him, and should fight with them, and overcome them, whilst others of the same men so armed, our said lord the king should assassinate, slay, kill, and murder; and you the said Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, together with the said Christopher Knightley, the treason, and all the traitorous intentions, designs, and contrivances aforesaid, to execute, perform, fulfil, and bring to effect, afterwards (to wit) the aforesaid 10th day of February, in the seventh year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, divers horses, and very many arms, guns, pistols, swords, rapiers, and other weapons, ammunition and warlike things, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously, secretly, and traitorously did obtain, buy, gather together, and procure, and cause to be bought, obtained, gathered together, and procured with that intention, then in and about the detestable, horrid, and execrable assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king that now is, as aforesaid to be used, employed, and bestowed; and the same premisses, the more safely and certainly to execute, do, and perform, the aforesaid Christopher Knightley, with one Edward King, late of high treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said lord the king that now is, duly convicted and attainted, by the consent and agreement of divers of the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, the said 10th day of February, in the seventh year abovesaid, went and came to the place proposed, where such intended assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king by lying in wait, should be done, performed, and committed, to see, view, and observe the convenience and fitness of the same place for such lying in wait, assassination, and killing, there to be done, performed, and committed: and that place, being so viewed and observed, afterwards, (to wit) the same day and year, their observations thereof to several of the said traitors and conspirators did relate and impart, (to wit) at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid: and you the aforesaid Charles Cranburne, the same day and year there, in order the said execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination, and killing of our said lord the king, by the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, the more readily and boldly to execute, perform, and commit, advisedly, knowingly, and traitorously did bring and carry between divers of those traitors and conspirators, forward and backward, from some to others of them, a list of the names of divers men of those who were designed and appointed our said lord the king so as aforesaid by lying in wait to kill and murder; against the duty of the allegiance of the said Christopher Knightley, you the said Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, and against the peace of our said lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

How sayest thou, Robert Lowick? Art thou guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Lowick. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, How wilt thou be tried?

Lowick. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee good deliverance.

How sayest thou, Ambrose Rookwood? Art thou guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Rookwood. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, How wilt thou be tried?

Rookwood. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee good deliverance.

Charles Cranburne, How sayest thou? Art thou guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Cranburne. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, How wilt thou be tried?

Cranburne. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee good deliverance.

Cranburne. My lord, I desire your lordship would grant me the favour for my wife to come to me in private, and that I may have pen, ink, and paper.

L. C. J. (sir John Holt). Pen, ink and paper, you must have; but as to the other, we must consider of it. Keeper of Newgate, What has been usual in those cases?

Keeper. My lord, we let nobody come to them in private but their counsel.

L. C. J. That's provided for by the act that allows them counsel; but has it been usual heretofore to permit any body else to be with them in private; the wife, or any other relations?—Keeper. It has not.

L. C. J. It is very dangerous if it should; therefore let him have his wife come to him in the presence of the keeper.

Cranburne. And pen, ink, and paper, I hope, my lord?

L. C. J. Yes, yes, that you shall have.

Cranburne. You don't deny me, my lord, that I may have my wife come to me?

L. C. J. No, we do not, but she must not be in private with you, for fear of an escape.

Rookwood. I beg the same favour, my lord, to have my brother come to me, and pen, ink, and paper.

L. C. J. You shall have the same rule; but you, keeper, must have especial care whom you do permit to come to them, and be private with them; for it is still at your peril if any ill accident happens by your indulgence to them: and yet it is fit they should have all that is reasonable for preparing for their defence at their trials.

Lowick. And I desire, my lord, I may have my sister come to me, and the liberty of her being in private with me.

L. C. J. Your friends may come to you at seasonable times, in the presence of the keeper; you shall have any thing that is reasonable, but the safety of the government must be looked after. Therefore, keeper of Newgate, take back your prisoners, and bring them here this day se'nnight at seven o'clock in the morning, without any other order.

[They staid at the bar about half an hour, the Judges consulting among themselves about the precept for the petty jury upon a late act of parliament, which has appointed six days for the jury to be summoned before they appear to try any cause, and upon the last Act in Regulating Trials in Cases of High Treason; which requires that the prisoner shall have a copy of the pannel of the jury duly returned, at least two days before his trial.]

Then the Prisoners were carried away, and the Grand Jury withdrew to consider of the evidence against Knightley, and in a quarter of an hour came back, and being called over, delivered in a bill to the court.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, you are content the court shall amend matter of form, or false Latin in this indictment, without altering any matter of substance without your privy.

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Then, gentlemen, you may go for this time; and you are to take notice if there be occasion at any time to call you together, you shall have sufficient warning given to you beforehand. This is Billa Vera against Alexander Knightley for high treason.

[Then the Judges resumed the debate among themselves, and at last resolved that there should go three several Venires for the petty jury, returnable this day se'nnight; one to try between the king and Robert Lowick, the second to try between the king and Ambrose Rookwood, and a third between the king and Charles Cranburne; because, though the indictment be against them jointly, yet it was a several offence in every one of them, and they might sever in their challenges, and that would be troublesome, and therefore it was thought best to sever them in their trials; and therefore the court adjourned for an hour or something more, while the precepts for the jury were preparing, and according to the adjournment met, and signed and sealed the precepts, and then adjourned the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer until this day se'nnight, at seven in the morning.]

Die Martis Vicesimo primo Aprilis, Anno Regni Regis Willielmi Tertii Octavo, Anno; Dom. 1696.

The court sat about eight o'clock, at which were present a great number of noblemen, and persons of quality, who were in the commission, and seven of the judges; to wit, the lord chief justice Holt, the lord chief justice Treby, the lord chief baron Ward, Mr. justice Nevil, Mr. justice Powel, Mr. justice Eyre, and Mr. baron Powis.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes. All manner of persons that have any thing more to do at this Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, adjourned over to this day, draw near and give your attendance. And God save the king.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, Sheriffs for the county of Middlesex, return the precepts to you directed, upon pain and peril will fall thereon.

The Under-Sheriff returned the Precept.

Cl. of Ar. Mr. Baker, pray, whom do you intend to begin with?

Mr. Baker. With Ambrose Rookwood.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, You good men of the county of Middlesex, summoned to appear here this day, to try between our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoners that are, and shall be at the bar, answer to your names, as you shall be called, every one at the first call, and save your issues.

The whole pannel was called over, and the appearances of those that answered recorded; and the defaulters were again called over.

Cl. of Ar. Keeper of Newgate, set Ambrose Rookwood to the bar, (which was done). You the prisoner at the bar, Ambrose Rookwood, those men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

Sir Bartholomew Shower. If your lordship pleases, we have a doubt or two to propose to your lordship, in respect of the trial this day : but before I offer it, we beg your favour for a word in behalf of ourselves.

My lord, We are assigned of counsel, in pursuance of an act of parliament, and we hope that nothing which we shall say in defence of our clients shall be imputed to ourselves. I thought it would have been a reflection upon the government and your lordships' justice, if being assigned we should have refused to appear ; it would have been a publication to the world, that we distrusted your candor towards us in our future practice upon other occasions. But, my lord, there can be no reason for such a fear ; I am sure I have none ; for we must acknowledge, we who have been practisers, at this bar especially, that there was never a reign or government within the memory of man, wherein such indulgence, such easiness of temper, hath been shown from the court to the counsel, as there always hath been in this. Never was there such freedom and liberty of debate and argument allowed to the bar, and we thank your lordship for the same.

My lord, We come not here to countenance the practices for which the prisoner stands accused, nor the principles upon which such practices may be presumed to be founded ; for we know of none, either religious or civil, that can warrant or excuse them. But the act of parliament having warranted the appearing of counsel for persons accused to make defence for them, we hope your lordship will give us leave to make what objections we can on their behalf.

L. C. J. Holt. Look ye, sir B. Shower, go on with your objections ; let us hear what you have to say.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, It appears to be a doubt to us, upon this act of parliament, whether this cause can be tried this day : and if it be a doubt, we hope, though it should not have that weight with the court, that we apprehend it has : yet your lordship will excuse us, and settle it according to your judgment. The act requires, That all that shall be accused and indicted for high-treason, whereby any corruption of blood may, or shall be made to any such offender or offenders, or to any the heir or heirs of any such offender or offenders, or for misprison of such treason, shall have a true copy of the whole indictment ; and afterwards shall have copies of the pannel of the jurors who are to try them, duly returned by the sheriff and delivered unto them ; and every one of them so accused and indicted respectively two days at the least before he or they shall be tried for the same. Now if your lordship will please to cast your eye upon this Venire Facias, and it will appear to be returned but this day, and that is not according to the intent of this law. And it is impossible then, if it be as we apprehend it, and put it, that this trial should go on at this time ; and that this construction should be so as we say, not only the words, but, as we take it, the intent and meaning of the act of parliament too are for us ; that there ought to have been a copy of the pannel after the return two days before the trial. For in the first place, my lord, the words are plain : it must be a copy of the pannel duly returned by the sheriff. Now, though it be a copy of the array of the pannel which we have delivered to us, yet it is not a copy of the pannel of the jurors returned ; for it is no return till it come into court. And the king's counsel must admit, that in the case of all writs returnable, it cannot be said that there is a return, where there is a writing upon the back, or a label annexed, till it be actually returned into court. As in the case of a Fieri Facias, or a Mandamus, an action for false return cannot lie till the writ be actually returned. For such action must be brought into the county of Middlesex, where the court resides, before whom the return is made, and not in the county where the sheriff lived that made the return ; for it is not a return till filed in court. Now here the words of the act are ; ' He shall have a copy of the pannel of the jurors who are to try him, duly returned by the sheriff two days before the trial.' Now, we humbly insist that the words 'duly returned' must be antecedent to the having the copy, or else he cannot be said to have a copy of the pannel duly returned. The act of parliament does not say which shall be duly returned ; and therefore there does arise a doubt, whether your lordship will not direct us to have a copy after the return made, which is but this day.

Mr. Phipps. If your lordship pleases to spare me a word of the same side : We take it, that by this act of parliament the jury must be duly returned before the pannel is delivered to us. Now the return is the answer that is indorsed upon the writ with the pannel annexed, and delivered into court ; for the return is to the court, and till it be delivered into court, it cannot properly be said to be a return. We acknowledge the copy of this pannel has been delivered unto us, two or three days ago. But the Venire being not returned till to-day, we think we have not a copy of the pannel within the intent of, and according to the act of parliament. And I desire to put your lordship this case : this act of parliament does likewise provide, that the prisoner should have a copy of his indictment five days before his trial, to enable him to consult with his counsel how to plead and defend himself ; suppose then a copy of a bill that is intended to be presented to the grand jury, be delivered to the person accused five days before the grand jury are to meet, and they afterwards meet, and find it, and the party is brought immediately, and arraigned upon it : this is a true copy of the indictment, yet certainly the intent of the act of parliament is not answered, for it was not a true copy of the indictment at the time it was delivered. And I take this case to be under the same reason. This is not a pannel duly returned, till now ; and therefore by consequence we have not that advantage that this act of parliament intended to give us; for which reason we humbly apprehend we ought not to be tried to-day; which we submit to your lordship.

L. C. J. What say you to it, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. (Sir Thomas Trevor). My Lord, with submission, this objection will receive a very plain answer. If I understand it aright, they say that they ought to have a copy of the pannel after it is returned, and that it cannot be said to be duly delivered, according to the provision in this act of parliament, till after the Venire Facias be duly returned into the court, and then they are to have it two days before they are tried. They say the Venire Facias is returned but to-day, and so the copy delivered to them, is not pursuant to the act of parliament; and so they cannot be tried to-day: this I take to be the objection. But with submission, my lord, it will be plain both by the words of the act, and the reason and intention of it, that there is no occasion at all, nor no necessity of having the writ returned before the copy of the pannel be delivered. The words of the act of parliament are these: 'That every person and persons who shall be accused, indicted, and tried for treason, or misprision of treason, after the 25th of March, 1696, shall have copies of the pannel of the jurors who are to try them, duly returned by the sheriff, and delivered to them two days before they be tried.' Now, first, my lord, I think it is apparent what the meaning and design of the act of parliament was, that the prisoner should know two days before the trial, who were the jury that were to pass upon him, that he might have an opportunity to consider how he should make his challenges as he thought fit, and time to enquire into the qualifications of them, that if there were any particular ground of challenge, he might not lose that benefit; so that if he has a copy of the pannel arrayed by the sheriff, which is afterward returned by the sheriff into court, and there is no variation of that pannel afterwards; then certainly the end and intent of the act is entirely pursued: for by that means the prisoner has the names of all the jury returned, and are afterwards called, and has a full opportunity of making such challenges as he thinks fit. And as the reason and intent of the act is answered by this construction, so the very words of the act are answered: for it is not said in the act, that he shall have a copy of the pannel after it is returned, but it is said a copy of the pannel duly returned by the sheriff; that is, when the sheriff has arrayed a pannel, then he is to have a copy of that pannel; and if afterwards the sheriff return the same pannel into court, is not this a copy of the pannel duly returned? With submission it is, and sufficient to answer both the words and intention of the act of parliament. It is true, my lord, if the act of parliament had said he should have a copy of the pannel after it was returned, then we could not have said but that the objection would hold. But when the words are general, and it is most reasonable to be interpreted that the copy is to be delivered when the array is made, because that answers the intent and end of the act of parliament, which was to enable the prisoner to make his challenges, we take that to be sufficient; and if another interpretation should be made, it would render the trial in such cases liable to all the mischiefs in the world, and make it impracticable that any person should be tried; at least it would introduce a new method of proceedings that never was practised, nor ought to be introduced, unless this act of parliament by express words had appointed and constituted such a new method; and we suppose your lordship will never make any such construction, that the act intended a new method, unless expressly declared; for if it were, as they would have it, that the copy of the pannel was not to be delivered till after the return of the writ, then the prisoner cannot be tried upon the return of the writ; for upon the return of the writ, the jury must be brought to the bar, the prisoner must be brought to the bar, and adjourned over to a further time, that in the mean time a copy may be delivered to them. I believe that they can never shew any precedent that there was such an adjournment of a jury of life and death, over to another day, for a person to have a copy of the pannel, to enable him to make his challenges; and either that must be the consequence, or else the jury must not come upon the return of the Venire Facias, but there must go a Habeas Corpora, and the prisoner tried upon that Habeas Corpora: for first there must be the return of the writ, then the copy of the pannel delivered, then the Habeas Corpora returnable another day; and upon that the trial must be had: but I believe there can be no instance given of a trial for treason upon a Habeas Corpora. Now if the parliament had intended that they would not have the copy of the pannel delivered till after the return of the Venire Facias, they would certainly have expressed and provided how the method of trial should have been; that is, that either the jury should have been adjourned over till another day, or else brought to the bar upon a Habeas Corpora; which is the only way that can be thought of. Indeed, my lord, I do agree, that if the sheriff should give a copy of the pannel, and afterwards should vary that pannel, though but in one name, that would not answer the end of the act of parliament, because the prisoner is deprived of the opportunity of knowing the name of the person that he so altered, in order to his making his challenges against him: but if the sheriff do return the same persons that are in that copy delivered to the prisoner, then we do, to all intents and purposes, answer the end of the act of parliament, and avoid the absurd construction that they would make of this act for the changing the method of trials, and nobody can well tell what method should be pursued: but certainly if the act of parliament intended a new method should be pursued, they would have described and settled what it should be.

Sol. Gen. (sir John Hawles). If your lordship pleases to spare me a word of the same side; my lord, this is an objection that has been foreseen, and I think has been prevented; for, with submission, I take it, the act has been sufficiently answered both as to the words, and as to the intent of it, in the prisoner's having the copy of the pannel before the jury be returned; there must be such a thing as a pannel arrayed before the jury be summoned, and therefore it is sufficient that the prisoner have a copy of that pannel so many days before his trial; which was only intended for that particular reason, that he might be provided sufficiently to make his legal challenges. Certainly within the intent of the act of parliament it is well enough if he had but a copy of the pannel two days before the return of the writ, provided the jury was not altered that was arrayed, nor any other names put in but those that he had a copy of before: now, my lord, I think this act of parliament must be taken according to the intent and meaning of it, or else it will bear hard upon the prisoner, and harder sure than it was designed it should: this act says, he shall have a copy of his indictment so many days before his trial; now I would fain know whether they would have it construed, that the copy does not need to be delivered till after issue joined, which must be if their doctrine holds true, that the act is to be construed according to the strict letter of it, for that trial is the trial of the issue; what if the indictment be delivered five days before the trial, though after issue joined, it is well enough according to such an exposition, for the arraigning of the prisoner is no part of the trial, and yet it was the intent of the parliament that he should have a copy of the indictment five days before he was arraigned, and that for this reason, because he might have several pleas to plead, and objections to make before he pleaded the general issue; he might have pleas in abatement, which after plea pleaded of not guilty he could not have the advantage of, nor could he afterwards move to quash the indictment, which he might otherwise have good reason for, if he had the copy before he was put to plead, so that I take it the act is to be interpreted every where according to the intention of it, and the prisoner at the bar, according to the intention of the act, has had a copy of this indictment five or six days before his arraignment, and therefore we have acted according to the purpose and meaning of the parliament; and likewise he has had a copy of the pannel of the jurors that are to try him, which is duly returned by the sheriff, which is likewise according to the act of parliament. As for what they say that even a copy of the indictment before it be found would not be good according to this act; that is true, but the case is not the same, nor the reason of the case alike between that and the pannel of a jury, because it is sufficient in law to make it a good pannel if it be arrayed by the sheriff before the jury be summoned, for the sheriff must array and complete his pannel to let his bailiff know who must be summoned; but in the case of an indictment, though a bill be first formed by the clerk, yet it is not looked upon as a formal indictment in point of law, till it be found by the jury as their verdict, and preferred to the court; and it is not necessary that this indictment should be formed for the jury before they find it, for they are properly to make their own presentments themselves; and the ancient practice was, that they only presented the fact, and the matter was put into form afterwards by the court, and in many cases it is so at this day, as we have had some instances lately; but as to the arraying of a pannel it always was so, and always must be so arrayed by the sheriff before the jury summoned, and there is the difference between the giving a copy of an indictment and the copy of a pannel, the one is taken notice of in point of law to be necessary, the other is not. This giving a copy of the pannel, my lord, we say, is within the intent of the act, which was only to enable persons accused to make their just challenges, and that they may as well do when a copy is delivered after it is arrayed by the sheriff, as when it is returned by the sheriff, and being so done, with submission, it is well done within the words, and within the intent of this act of parliament.

Mr. Conyers. My lord, the words of this act of parliament are, That they shall have a copy of the pannel of the jurors who are to try them, duly returned by the sheriff, and delivered to them, and this, two days before the trial: my lord, that this is the pannel of the sheriff of the jurors that are to try them, as soon as it is arrayed, has been observed already; now it would be a forced construction to construe these words that follow, 'duly returned by the sheriff,' to be meant, that a copy should be delivered after the jury is returned, because that would be a delay of justice, and keeping off the trial longer than was intended by this act of parliament, and more than will answer the end of this law; for the end of it was to give the prisoner all benefit and advantage of exceptions against any of those that were to try him, and if he has this pannel two days before his trial, he has that benefit the law intended him. Now, my lord, as to what has been said of an indictment, which by this law, he is to have a copy of too, that is plainly quite another case; for it is not an indictment till it be found, and so answers not the words nor intention of the act till found by the grand jury; till then it is not a copy of his charge, and therefore by no construction can it be called a copy of the indictment. I think I need not trouble your lordship any further in this matter, because this objection was foreseen, and has been already considered of by the court upon the prisoner's arraignment.

Sir Barth. Shower. My lord, in answer to what Mr. Solicitor has said, that there is as much reason to expect that the copy of the indictment should not be delivered till after plea pleaded, as that the pannel should not be delivered till after the jury returned, because in the case of the indictment it is said so many days before the trial, and the trial cannot be till issue joined, there can be no weight in that objection at all; for the words of the act are quite differently penned in the case of the indictment from what they are in the case of the pannel; for though it be said it should be done five days before the trial, yet it is added, 'in order to the advising with counsel how to plead;' which must be before plea pleaded, and therefore it must be absolutely necessary to be done before the arraignment. My lord, I have proposed my doubt, it may have consequences on the one side and the other, we submit intirely unto your lordship's judgment; it is a new law, and never has received any opinion; the words of it are, 'duly returned by the sheiff,' and the question is, Whether a copy of the pannel upon the array before it be returned be a copy of the pannel duly returned, though the same pannel be afterwards duly returned.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, Mr. Attorney General owns, that the pannel after it is arrayed may be amended and altered by the sheriff; and it was never intended by this act of parliament, that any copy of the pannel should be delivered to the prisoner but of those men that were really returned; so that we take it, we ought to have it two days after the return and before the trial; for certainly it must be a copy of the men returned, which if the sheriff may alter at any time before the return, the intent of the act of parliament can never be answered by any copy but what is a true copy of the return. Mr. Conyers would answer the objection that I made about a copy of the indictment by this, that it is not an indictment till it be found by the jury; but I think it is no answer to our objection at all, though it be but a copy of the bill intended to be presented to the grand jury, yet if the grand jury afterwards find it, it is as true a copy of the indictment as this is a copy of the jury intended to be returned, and afterwards returned. As to what they say, that this will introduce a new method of trial, contrary to all form or proceedings, that can be no objection neither; for if it be so, we cannot tell how to help it, the parliament have thought fit to have it so, and we must submit to take it as the law has made it: if there be a necessity for a Habeas Corpora upon the provision made in this act, so it must be, for we must take the law as it is. We submit our objection to your lordship; we think we have not had the benefit of this law.

Mr. Cowper. Surely, my lord, what Mr. Phipps has now said has no weight in it; that because the sheriff had it in his power to alter the pannel before it was returned, therefore this is not now a true copy of the pannel of jurors who are to try the prisoner, duly returned by the sheriff; which are the words in the act. It is true, if the sheriff had in fact altered the pannel from what it was, and returned it so altered into court, no doubt of it, the prisoner would be very well intitled to make this objection, that he had not a copy of the pannel, or the names of the jurors that were summoned to try him; but now we can aver, that we have pursued this act of parliament literally; for in answer to their objection, we may ask this question of them upon the words of the act, Have you not had a true copy of the names of those that are to try you, and are duly returned by the sheriff for that purpose? and was not that copy delivered unto you above two days ago? They cannot say they have not had it so, and if they cannot say so, then both the words and meaning of the act of parliament are in every respect answered; if when the jury come to be called the prisoner finds the pannel to be altered, he has reason to object, and will have the benefit of the objection, that he has not that advantage which the law intended him, but till that prove to be the fact, we think here is a full compliance with this law.

Sol. Gen. Sir Barth. Shower mistakes my objections about the copy of the indictment; for we say, if the intent of the act of parliament be complied with, it is sufficient, especially where the words are any way doubtful; according to the words of this act of parliament a copy of the indictment need to be delivered but five days before the trial; but it appearing that the intention of these law-makers was, that he should have a copy of the indictment to enable him to plead to it if he had cause, therefore though the words be 'before the trial,' we have taken it that he should have a copy five days before his arraignment, and so we have complied with the meaning of the law in that point, as we have also in this, which was, we take it, only to enable the prisoner to make his challenges, and if that be done two days before his trial, with submission, it fully answers this law.

L. C. J. Have you done, gentlemen?

Couns. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Then look you, sir B. Shower, as to this point that you now insist upon, we have had it under consideration heretofore; we were here this day se'nnight, and then we did consider in what method we should proceed, so that the prisoner might have the benefit intended him by this act of parliament: the act of parliament does design, in the first place, that every prisoner that is to be tried for high-treason should have a copy of his indictment, at least five days before the trial; that, I think, was all the makers of this act of parliament intended at the first; but then there being subsequent words, which shew the reason why they gave him the copy so long before the trial; which is, that he might advise with his counsel what to plead; these words, we conceive, have given the prisoner a further time than what was originally intended, therefore we have thought it necessary that the prisoner should have a copy of his indictment five days before he be arraigned, which is five days before he was put to plead; and your client, the prisoner at the bar, has had the benefit of this act in that respect before we arraigned him; then after he has pleaded, the question was, when he was to have a copy of the pannel?

Now the design of this act of parliament was, That the prisoner should have a copy of the pannel two days before his trial, in order that he might consider of the persons that were to try him; that he might inform himself of their qualities, tempers, and dispositions; that so he might make use of the benefit the law gives him of challenging five and thirty, without shewing any cause, if he did not like the men, and as many more as he should think he had good cause to challenge: now in this case, the whole design of this act of parliament is answered, for he has had a copy of the pannel, as you yourselves acknowledge, two days before the day of his trial, so that he has the full benefit that the act of parliament intended; he is by this copy as well enabled to make his challenges as the law designed he should be, and has had the same time allowed him, that the act of parliament meant he should have; then supposing the design of this act of parliament be fully answered and complied with in the case, the next question is, Whether the words of the act are satisfied? For we would be very loth, in a case of this nature, where an act of parliament intends a favour to a prisoner that stands at the bar for his life, to abridge him of any part of that favour, which the very words of the act would allow him, though the intent of the act of parliament were answered otherwise: now in the first place it is observable, that the act of parliament does not say, that the prisoner shall have a copy of the return; nor does it say, he shall have a copy from the court, but he shall have a copy of the pannel of the jurors duly returned that are to try him; now if the sheriff array his pannel several days before the trial upon the Venire Facias, and does give him a copy of that very pannel, which pannel is afterwards returned in court, has not he then a copy of the pannel duly returned? Does not this answer all the words of the act? For you yourselves say that it is not said in the words of the act, that the copy shall be delivered after the pannel returned, nor does there need a copy of the very return. Surely we must not carry it farther than the words, if the meaning be complied with, and we think this answers both words and meaning: it is a copy of the pannel, and a copy of that pannel that is duly returned. Now to make another construction would indeed not only alter the usual course of trials, but be contradictory to the very process itself. We are by the course of law to award process to summon a jury to appear at a certain time, to try the issue joined between the king and the prisoner; and yet when we have done this, and the jury thereupon are summoned and do appear, they may go as they came; for the issue cannot be tried, because after the return, the prisoner must have a copy of the pannel two days before he can be tried. I do think the design of the act of parliament, and the very words of the act are fully satisfied in giving a copy of the pannel two days before the return. We had this matter under our consideration before, and upon debate among ourselves, we did think fit to award the precept returnable this day, and resolved to try the prisoner this day, unless better reasons were offered us to alter our opinion, and we are not satisfied that any such better reason has been given, but that this trial ought to go on, the prisoner having the full benefit that was designed him by this act of parliament. And the giving a copy of the pannel that is returned, though before the return, sufficiently satisfies the words of the act: no other construction can be made without great absurdities: this is my opinion.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, I hope we shall be excused for our client, we have another doubt to propose to the court.

L. C. J. You have had my opinion upon this point, if my lords and brothers are of another opinion, they will tell you.

Judges. No, my lord, we are all of the same opinion.

L. C. J. My Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and my brothers are all of the same opinion.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we say we have another doubt to propose upon this act of parliament: it is a new one, and never put in practice till now, and therefore we hope your lordship will please to excuse us, if we offer our objections, because there has yet never been a determination about it, and we are assigned of counsel by your lordship.

L. C. J. Never make apologies, sir Bartholomew, for it is as lawful for you to be of counsel in this case, as it is in any other case where the law allows counsel. It is expected you should do your best for those you are assigned for, as it is expected in any other case that you do your duty for your client.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, our exception is this, we say that this trial cannot go on at this time, upon this act of parliament, because we have no true copy of the whole indictment; it does not appear, in the copy we have delivered to us, before whom it was taken, or whether it was taken at all, or in what place it was taken; it says only 'Middlesex' in the margin, and then 'Juratores pro Domino Rege presentant:' that might be before the justices of the peace at the quarter sessions, or it might be at the monthly sessions at Hicks's-Hall, or it might be at the Sessions at the Old Bailey, or it might be before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, as perhaps it really was; but non constat where it was taken, nor how it comes hither: it might be before your lordship here, as we believe it was, but this copy not letting us know where and how it was taken, we think we have not the benefit of this law; for the party accused is by this act of parliament to have a copy to advise with counsel, that he may be enabled to plead. And that is the reason why the words of this act are so perped, that he shall have a copy of the whole indictment, which we cannot plead to, unless we know where it was taken, if we should have occasion to plead any special matter. And besides, my lord, there is another reason why we should have the whole indictment to enable us to plead, because if we had the Caption, it might perhaps appear, that the indictment was taken before the time of the fact alleged in the indictment, and then that would make it vicious; it might be before the 9th of February, when this treason is said to be committed, and then we ought not to be brought to trial. Now the design of this act of parliament, in giving the prisoner a copy of the indictment so long before the trial, was not only to enable him to make his defence upon the trial, but also to advise with counsel to plead; for so the words are, 'the better to enable him to plead.' Now we say, to answer this end, it is necessary we should have a copy of the whole indictment, as it stands before your lordship in court. And another reason is this, it is no indictment, unless it be presented by the jury, as their inquisition upon oath, unto some court that has jurisdiction of the matter: what we have delivered to us is only a copy of a bill as to be delivered to a grand jury to be found; non constat, that it is found. Now the intent of the act of parliament being to give the prisoner this advantage to enable him to plead, he may have several pleas, of which he might take a legal advantage if he had a copy of the whole, which he knows not how to come at now; and in truth it is very necessary, because if he be tried upon an indictment found in another county, then these commissioners have not a legal authority to try him; and if the trial should go on, and he be acquitted, he is subject to be indicted and tried again, and never can relieve himself by the acquittal upon such an indictment before persons that had no authority to try him. I doubt he can never plead the acquittal, because he cannot make out, that he was duly tried and acquitted: and for these reasons we humbly submit it to your lordship, whether we have had the benefit of this law, in having a copy of the whole indictment to enable us to plead; and if we have not, till we have that benefit, we humbly conceive this trial ought not to go on.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, the question is, Whether the style of the court, the persons before whom it was taken, and to whom the presentment is made, the time when it was taken, and the place where, ought not to appear in the indictment? this law requiring that the prisoner should have a copy of the whole indictment to enable him to plead; for if it should happen, that the indictment was taken before persons that had no jurisdiction, then I believe it will not be denied but that the prisoner might plead to the jurisdiction, and there might be several other pleas that he might take advantage of. I would desire to know of the king's counsel, whether ever they saw a copy of an indictment given in evidence, or pleaded without the Caption. It is not a true copy without it; there ought to be the time, the place, and the style of the court before whom it is taken.

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, I think I need say no more to this objection, than it does not come at a proper time; for, with submission, if the prisoner will upon this act say he has not had a copy of his indictment to enable him to plead, he ought to have taken the advantage of it before he did plead; that is the proper time for him to object this matter to the court; for if, after he has had such a copy as this prisoner has had, he does submit to plead, with submission it is too late to come at his trial and make this objection, he cannot be received to make it after.

L. C. J. That is a full answer, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Gen. I think it is, my lord, with submission, not that we would waive giving other answer to it, if it were in a proper time; but the method of proceeding must be, and we think we have no occasion at this time to say any thing more to this objection.

L. C. J. No, no, that is a full answer in this point: for look ye, you that are of counsel for the prisoner, when once you have pleaded, you admit you have had a copy; for the copy was given you to enable you to plead, and when you have pleaded, you have passed by all advantage that you could have from the copy, as to any plea that you can make: for it is taken for granted ye had a copy to enable you to plead, and to advise with your counsel about it; since you did plead, and did not insist upon it at the time of your arraignment that you had not such copy.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we have proposed one doubt; we humbly submit it to the court.

Sol. Gen. It was their own fault, that this objection was not made in time.

L. C. J. That doubt of yours may serve at another time, but now certainly it is quite out of time.

Sol. Gen. Nay, my lord, even upon the arraignment that would not serve their turn neither.

L. C. J. We will not enter upon that now, pray go on to swear the jury.

Cl. of Ar. You, the prisoner, look to your challenges, as I told you before. Cryer, call sir Jeremy Sambrook.

Cryer. Vous avez.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Rookwood, you are to make your own challenges.

Rookwood. I do not challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. Then hold sir Jeremy the book.

Sir Jer. Sambrook. My lord, I am incapable of serving upon this jury, for I have been deaf these several years, these dozen years; I cannot hear what is said in court, though I am now so near the court; I could not hear what your lordship said, nor what was said at the bar. I have a certificate here, if your lordship please to have it read; and most of the persons of quality about the court know it to be true.

Att. Gen. My lord, I am afraid it is so.

L. C. J. Nay, if it be so, it is not fitting that he should be upon the jury, when he cannot hear what is said: you must excuse sir Jeremy Sambrook. Go on to the next.

Cl. of Ar. George Ford.—Cryer. Vous avez.

Cl. of Ar. Look upon the prisoner.

Rookwood, I challenge him.

L. C. J. Mr. Ford, you must not go away, for you are upon another pannel, wherein you may be employed, though you are now challenged.

Cl. of Ar. Samuel Hooper. (He did not answer.)

L. C. J. Did Mr. Hooper appear?

Cl. of Ar. Yes, my lord; he is marked as appearing.

L. C. J. Then you ought to call him again, and set a fine upon his head.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, call Samuel Hooper.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, count them. Samuel Powell, —

Cryer. One, &c.

Cl. of Ar. Benjamin Noble.

Cryer. Twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your evidence.

The names of the twelve sworn were these: Samuel Powell, Arthur Bailey, John Webber, George Tredway, Timothy Lennoy, John Harris, George Carter, William Atley, John Marsh, Samuel Freebody, Daniel Byfield, and Benjamin Noble.

L. C. J. Look ye, Mr. Phipps, your objection upon the indictment slipt me, and therefore I would speak to it now: You said it might be as well a copy of the indictment before it be found, as well as this a copy of the pannel before it be returned. Now that cannot be, for an indictment is not an indictment till it be found, it is only a writing prepared for the ease of the jury, and for expedition; it is nothing till it is found, for the jury make it an indictment by finding it, they may alter what they please, or refuse it absolutely. And if the jury, upon examining the witnesses, would only present a matter of fact with time and place, the court might cause it to be drawn up into form, without carrying it to the jury: again, there needs no Billa vera; for that is only the jury's owning that which the court has prepared and drawn up for them: but a pannel is a pannel when it is arrayed, before it be returned, and a copy of the pannel given before it be returned, is a copy of the pannel returned, if it be afterwards returned, as it must.

Sir B. Shower. But, my lord, that notion strengthens our objection that we last made, that makes it necessary that we should have a copy of the Caption, as well as the other part, to make it a true copy of the whole indictment.

L. C. J. That is another thing, we will talk of that another time; but I speak of this only as to his objection, which slipt my memory, because I would have nothing remain unanswered.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, when the Bill is found, the copy that we delivered before is as much a true copy of the indictment as our copy of the pannel is a copy of the jury returned.

L. C. J. A pannel is a pannel, when it is arrayed, but a bill is not an indictment till it be found; one cannot say a man indictatus existit, till it be found; all that we say of it before it be found is, that there was quedam Billa preferred to the grand jury, and if the jury bring it in Ignoramus, whereby they disown the presentment, it is cancelled, and there is no record of it, nor nothing, only a memorandum in the clerk's book perhaps, that such a thing was. Well go on.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make Proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, If any one can inform my lords, the king's justices of Oyer and Terminer, the king's serjeant, the king's attorney general, before this inquest to be taken, of the high-treason whereof Ambrose Rookwood, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance, and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance.

Cl. of Ar. Ambrose Rookwood, hold up thy hand, (which he did). You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of Ambrose Rookwood, of the parish of St. Paul, Covent-garden, in the county of Middlesex, gent. for that he, together with Christopher Knightley, not yet taken, Robert Lowick, and Charles Cranburne, and divers others, false traitors, &c.—prout in the indictment, mutatis mutandis, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and upon his arraignment hath pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are; your charge is to enquire, whether he be guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty; if you find him guilty, you are to inquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since: if you find him not guilty, ye are to inquire whether he fled for it; if you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty: if you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so and no more: and hear your evidence.

Mr. Mountague. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of this jury, this indictment that has been read to you, does charge the prisoner with high-treason for compassing and imagining the death of the king, for endeavouring to subvert the government, and to subject the people of England to the slavery of Lewis the French king; and for this end the indictment sets forth, that the prisoner at the bar did privately meet with several false traitors, to consult how they might compass the death of the king, and commit those other treasons; and that the 10th of February, at Covent-garden, in this county, it was agreed among them, that they should get together forty horsemen, whereof the prisoner at the bar was to be one, and they were to lie in ambush, and set upon the king in his coach upon his return from going abroad; some were to attack the coach, others to attack the guards, and there were some to kill the king in the coach: and the indictment does likewise charge the prisoner with gathering together horses, and providing arms for this purpose. To this indictment, gentlemen, he hath pleaded not guilty; we shall call our witnesses, and prove the fact, and when we have so done, we do not at all doubt but you will do your duty.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, before the witnesses are called we have a doubt to propose to your lordship upon this act of parliament, and that is, whether we are to take our exceptions to this indictment before the evidence be opened or given?

L. C. J. It should properly be before the jury is sworn.

Sir B. Shower. The words of the act, my lord, are "before the evidence given."

L. C. J. That act provides, That if you do not take the advantage of it before the evidence given, you shall not move that in arrest of Judgment.

Sir B. Shower. It only says before evidence given, and no evidence has yet been given.

L. C. J. But you are certainly very irregular in point of practice, nobody ever took exceptions to an indictment after the jury was sworn.

Sir B. Shower. If your lordship pleases to let the words be read of the act of parliament, they are these: That no indictment shall be quashed, unless exception be taken in the court where the trial shall be, before any evidence given in court upon that indictment. Which, we say, strongly implies, that the law-makers thought it might be done at any time before the evidence was given in open court, besides that the law takes notice that after conviction it should be of no avail; it would have been a very improper expression before evidence given in open court, if it had meant before the jury were sworn and charged; for the word evidence supposes the trial commenced; if they had intended it otherwise, that is, that it should be before the jury is sworn, they would have expressed it to be done at the arraignment: but mentioning it to be done in the court where the trial is to be, before evidence given, that supposes the indictment to be at issue before the party needs to make his exceptions. Therefore, my lord, we hope we are regular in offering our exceptions now.

L. C. J. Pray, what say you to it, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, I think they are no way regular; for, by submission, I take it, that though this Act of Parliament has indulged them with several things which were not allowable by law before, yet as to this part they are not allowed to take exceptions to the indictment, otherwise than they could before this act was passed: nay, so far from that, that if your lordship looks into the act, you find they are restrained in this point from an advantage that they had before, that is, they shall not move any such things as are there mentioned, after verdict in arrest of judgment: so that this part is restrictive to the prisoner, and takes away some advantage that he had before; which was, moving in arrest of judgment after verdict; but it leaves the making exceptions as to any time before the verdict as it was before, which was before plea pleaded, but not after the jury sworn: for it cannot be denied that in point of practice, such a thing as this that is now offered could not have been done before the act. I would be glad to know whether they can shew any precedent of any such thing as they now contend for. They say, the words of the act are, exception must be taken before evidence given; but that must be taken at such a time as they might by the course of law do it before: for when the jury is sworn, they must give a verdict, and I do not know how they can be discharged without giving a verdict; therefore unless the act had given directions for a particular manner of proceeding in this matter, which it has not done, your lordship will not, I presume, do it in any other manner than as it was before the act made; and if there be no precedent to be shown of any such thing as this, of taking exception to an indictment after the jury sworn and charged with the prisoner; then there is no power in this Act of Parliament, given to them to take exceptions to this indictment at this time; we take it the motion is very irregular upon all accounts.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we first say, that it is not proper for them to make any such motion as this upon this Act of Parliament, till they tell us what their exception is, that we may see whether it be within the words and meaning of this Act of Parliament. The only thing now that is proper for us to consider, is the issue joined, and the inquiry whether the prisoner at the bar is guilty of the high-treason of which he is indicted, to which indictment he has pleaded Not Guilty: that is the thing that is now before your lordship to be tried, they have room for exceptions to the indictment afterwards, for some exceptions I mean, (I do not know what their exceptions are) but if they be such as may be taken after the verdict, then I am sure they are irregular now in their motion, and they can shew no precedent, when it was done after plea pleaded and issue joined, as it is in this case.

Mr. Conyers. The advantage that the act gives the prisoner, of having a copy of his indictment so long before trial, is to enable him to plead, or to take exceptions to quash it; but I never heard a motion to quash an indictment after a jury is charged to hear the evidence. Certainly they ought to do it before plea pleaded, and not now to come to make a motion to quash the indictment, after they have pleaded, and the jury sworn; therefore we submit it, upon the constant practice in like cases, to the judgment of the court.

Sir B. Shower. In answer to that which Mr. Attorney hath said, that it is an improper time; I thought truly I had moved it for the advantage and ease of the king's counsel, that they might not proceed upon this trial, when perhaps after all their trouble, the foundation, which is the indictment, may fail. I have a great many exceptions to the indictment; they say we should name what our exceptions are: I will acquaint them with them as fast as I can; if your lordship please, the indictment is very loose and uncertain.

L. C. J. Certainly the motion is irregular in point of practice.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we were afraid, we should be excluded from taking these exceptions after the evidence given.

L. C. J. So you are by the express words of the act.

Sir B. Shower. Then certainly we may do it before the evidence given.

L. C. J. But the act does not say, ye shall do it any time before the evidence given, especially in such an irregular manner, after issue joined and the jury sworn. Suppose Mr. Attorney had given some evidence.

Sir B. Shower. Then, my lord, I agree we had been without the words; therefore I now move it before the evidence, because the Act of Parliament has given me liberty to do it before the evidence given: for the law having given this liberty to the prisoner, to make such exceptions within such a time, your lordship will not restrain us from making use of that liberty further than the law has restrained, but we may make use of our exceptions before the evidence given, either to induce your lordship to quash the indictment, or the jury to find us Not Guilty, as we hope your lordship will direct them to do: for what is more common upon indictments after the jury are sworn, than if facts appear upon the record not to be sufficiently alleged, the court will direct the jury to find the party Not Guilty. We think this act does give us this liberty, otherwise I know not to what purpose it was made; the very meaning seems to be, that the exceptions of the counsel for the prisoner might be of prejudice to the king; and therefore it says after the king's evidence given, and the fact discovered, no such exceptions shall be made: therefore we must make it before the evidence given, otherwise this Act of parliament, that was designed in favour of the prisoner, will prove a very great hardship upon him, especially in case of an imperfect indictment, as we apprehend this is, and he will be in a worse condition than ever he was; he must take his exceptions now or not at all. The act says, he is not to take it after evidence given; and by construction the king's counsel would have it, that he should not give it before: and consequently he has no time at all to give it.

L. C. J. Have not you had time to do it before now, sir Bartholomew Shower? Certainly you had. You had time this day seven night, when you were arraigned; you have had your opportunity if you would have taken it; the jury are now charged, the indictment is opened, they have been told what they are to enquire of, and now you would break in and take exceptions to the indictment.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, this is a new act of parliament; it says we shall take our exceptions before the evidence given; which we take it, is any time before the evidence given; and if your lordship will not allow us to do it now, it may be, we may lose the benefit of it absolutely.

L. C. J. It is one question whether we shall allow it or no; and another question whether you can claim it or no: certainly it is an irregular motion, and the like of it was never offered in any case before, be it criminal or civil: for if it be a criminal case that is not felony or treason, when the issue comes to trial upon an indictment, did you ever know any exception taken to the indictment after the jury were charged? Certainly it is contrary to all practice; and it is not fair, the court is not well dealt with; you have had an opportunity before, and will you now put the court and the jury to so great deal of trouble, to stay till the jury be called over? The prisoner called to his challenges, he has challenged thirty-four, the jury is sworn, the indictment is read to them, the charge given them, the counsel have opened the indictment; and now when the business is only to try the issue with which the jury are charged, you come to turn us quite round, by taking exceptions to the indictment.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, we take it the act gives us this time to do it in.

L. C. J. You know you had another time more proper to do it in.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, if we have not time now; then this clause with humble submission, signifies nothing at all.

L. C. J. The clause was made in this respect, to your disadvantage, because you should have a copy of the indictment, whereby you might have an opportunity to advise with counsel, that they might instruct you how to plead, and to take any manner of exception before plea pleaded, it ought to be before the trial, and now because of this advantage, it provides that you shall take your exceptions before the trial, and not move them in arrest of judgment, that is the meaning of the act.

Mr. Phipps. Then, my lord, there needed no time at all to be mentioned in the act, but have left it as it was at common law.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, there did need a time to be limited; for this clause was made I say in your disadvantage, in depriving the prisoner of the benefit of such kind of exceptions in arrest of judgment, because of the advantage that was given in the former part of the act, where you had time given you to make your exceptions, for which end you are to have a copy of the indictment five days before you are called to plead.

Sir B. Shower. We could not come before, my lord, as we apprehend, because the words of the act are "before evidence given."

L. C. J. But I tell you, this clause was not for your benefit, but for your disadvantage.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, what we press arises from the very words of the act of parliament, if the meaning of the law-makers was as the king's counsel now contend to have it; they would never have used those words "before evidence given in open court," but have said they should have had no advantage of the exception, unless it were before plea pleaded; it does not say it shall be after the verdict, or before the verdict, but before the evidence given now if they had meant what these gentlemen say, they would have appointed it to be before the verdict, which would have included the trial; because then it had been like the penning of other acts of parliament, the statutes of Jeoffailes and the like, which say, that after a verdict, such and such exceptions shall not arrest a judgment: but if they can shew me any statute that is penned like this, they give me an answer: all those statutes are, that no judgment shall be arrested or delayed upon such or such exceptions after a verdict: but here it says they shall not arrest judgment, unless the exception be taken before evidence given in open court. My lord, we submit it to you, we think the law-makers did intend somewhat by that particular way of expression, different from all other acts of parliament; and truly if it be not as we offer to your lordship, we think it can have no meaning at all.

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, we think it is very plain what the parliament meant, by this clause in this act; the design was, to restrain the prisoner from moving in arrest of judgment, for mis-spelling, or false Latin, or little matters of form, if he did not move it in a proper time, having such a liberty allowed him, as to have a copy of the indictment so many days before he was compelled to plead: they insist upon it, that the words are, before evidence given; it is so: but what can be the meaning of that? 'It must be at such time as the law allows; it is not making a new method of trial; you shall take exception before the evidence, that is, before the trial, for it can never be intended, that they meant to alter the course, and let the counsel break in between the time of the jury's being sworn, and the evidence given; that by no law could ever have been done before.'

Sir B. Shower. Pray, Mr. Attorney, when would you have us do it?

Att. Gen. Regularly before plea pleaded, at least-wise before the jury be sworn.

L. C. J. Undoubtedly this is not regular, it is contrary to all the course of practice, it is not fair dealing with the court. But then there is another consideration in the case, that I would have you think upon: if so be this had been at a trial by Nisi Prius, then the judge of Nisi Prius is only to try the issue; but now here the very record is before us, and we are judges of the record, as well as we are to assist the jury in trying the issue. Now take it in any other case of the like nature; suppose a trial at the bar in any civil cause, though this be contrary to practice, and the court not fairly dealt with, yet when we have the record before us, and find an error in the record, cannot we quash the indictment and discharge the jury? That is the question, Mr. Attorney, though I must confess, I do not know that it has been practicable.

Att. Gen. No, my lord, in a case of treason, where the jury are once charged, they are to give a verdict, they must either acquit or convict.

Sir B. Shower. It was done in Whitebread's case.*

See Vol. 7. p. 311. of this Collection.

Att. Gen. But I know what has been usually thought in that case, and I believe they cannot shew me another.

L. C. J. Nay, that this is a very irregular motion, is very plain.

Sol. Gen. Certainly, my lord, you must take it as the law was before this act, for this clause does nothing for the prisoner, but is against him.

L. C. J. I know it is not for the advantage of the prisoner, therefore I put it as a case in an action, or an indictment, as the law was before, whether this being a trial in the same court where the indictment was found, and we find an insufficiency in the record before us, whether we cannot quash the indictment?

Sol. Gen. Your lordship mentions civil actions; with submission, nothing of that kind could be done after once the cause came to trial, but in criminal causes according to the course of practice, which will always be the law till particularly altered; I believe nobody can pretend that after issue joined, and a jury charged, any one can move to quash the indictment. I think I have heard it often said in this court, that in capital cases, as high-treason, you may put in a plea in abatement of, but not a motion to quash an indictment; I am sure it was disallowed where I moved to quash an indictment of murder, let them but show any precedent of this nature.

Sir B. Shower. We will show you, though this is the first case upon this act of parliament, therefore to show any practice upon it would be very hard to require of us.

L. C. J. But can you show it before this clause in this act of parliament? which, as I told you, is not for your advantage; it does not give that liberty that you desire.

Sir B. Shower. All the clauses in this act of parliament showed their intention was this, that the sense of the law-makers was, that we should have this liberty at any time before evidence given, for if there be such words as showed they thought it might be quashed at any time, though they were mistaken in the practice, yet we shall have the liberty that they intended us; and the wording of this act shows, that the parliament thought it might be done after the trial begun, before evidence given, because they restrain us from taking those exceptions after the evidence given; and it is no prejudice to the king at all really, it is rather for the advantage of the prosecution, because there is none of the evidence disclosed, and therefore if the indictment should be found faulty, still the evidence remains undiscovered upon another indictment; and I have often heard it said at this bar in cases of indictments for felony or treason, as murder, or the like; if any one did come as amicus curia, and acquainted the court, that they were going to proceed upon an erroneous record, or give an erroneous judgment, or do any other erroneous act, he ought to be received with kindness, because he would prevent a wrong doing.

L. C. J. That is in the proper time, not to interrupt the trial when the jury is once sworn.

Sir B. Shower. We are ready to offer our exceptions, and we hope it is no prejudice at all to the king before the evidence of the fact is given.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, I perceive that this clause, as they would have it, is intended to prevent us from moving that in arrest of judgment, which we could have moved before, and ties us up to do it before evidence given; now I would fain know, if we could not before this act move in arrest of judgment for mis-spelling, or false Latin, or improper Latin.

Att. Gen. You might, no doubt of it.

Mr. Phipps. They say we might; why then, if we could have a time to move it after the verdict, and that time is abridged by the act of parliament, which directs that it shall be before evidence given in open court, sure we may take any time before the evidence given, and shall not be restrained further than the letter of the law has restrained us; for this act was intended for the benefit of the subject, and ought to be construed as much in their favour as the letter of it will permit.

Att. Gen. No doubt of it, it is to be done before evidence given; but the question is, at what time it must be before the evidence given, whether it must not be at such time as by the course of practice and usage of the law it should have been done before; if you will satisfy my lord and the court that ever such an exception was taken, or an indictment quashed between the swearing of the jury and the giving the evidence, ye say something; but I believe not one instance of that nature can be given, and therefore it is very irregular for them to do it.

L. C. J. They do not pretend to it, for aught I hear, for I would put them upon it, to show me whether they could do it before.

Sir B. Shower. I do not question, my lord, but it might be, with submission.

Mr. Conyers. Did you ever know it before that any one undertook to inform the court as amicus curiæ, but it was to prevent a wrong judgment? And for that you have your proper time either before plea pleaded by motion to quash the indictment, or after verdict to arrest a judgment; this act of parliament has restrained you in particular instances that are mentioned from doing it after verdict in arrest of judgment; but having given you a copy of the indictment before you pleaded, you have had a proper time to make these exceptions; and if you have lapsed your time you come too late to do it now, for sure nobody ever made a motion to quash an indictment after issue joined, and the jury sworn.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I would only mention one case, and that was of sir Richard Mansell, upon an indictment of murder, for killing the apothecary in Holborn; I did myself move to quash the indictment, because it was not expressed in what year of the king the fact was done: but the court was of opinion we could not move to quash an indictment for that, or any such notorious crime, till after the fact determined.

L. C. J. No, we were always of that opinion, never to allow motions to quash indictments for perjury, murder, or any great offence, but it must be moved in arrest of judgment afterwards.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, these gentlemen seem to beg the question upon this act of parliament, as if it had appointed this to be the time of making exceptions to the indictment; the act of parliament does not say you shall make your exception immediately before the evidence given in open court, as if it had pointed out and directed to them that particular time, that then they should take their exception and no other time: The act has only set a bound, that they shall not do it afterwards; but as to the particular time, it is left as it was before to the regular course and method of proceedings, which is before plea pleaded.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, they do not answer my objection; it is, it seems, a restriction of a liberty that we had before of moving in arrest of judgment; if so, we ought not to be restrained further than we are by the words of the act of parliament, which say, before evidence given, that is, at any time before evidence given, as well after as before plea pleaded.

Sir B. Shower. I would ask these gentlemen, whether the law-makers intended that we should have no advantage of excepting against false spelling and improper Latin?

Mr. Conyers. Yes, they did, but that you should do in your proper time.

Sir B. Shower. Then the time for doing it must be that which the words of the law say, before the evidence given in open court, and that is now.

Mr. Conyers. No, you might have come at the day of arraignment, and have taken the advantage of it then before you had pleaded.

L. C. J. Ye have had my opinion what I think of it, my lords and brothers, I suppose, will tell you theirs.

L. C. J. Treby. My Lord Chief Justice has delivered his opinion in this matter, and he thinks fit that we should deliver ours. I think this motion of the prisoner's counsel to quash this indictment after the jury sworn, is irregular and quite out of season; the intent of this clause in this act of parliament, certainly was not in favour of the prisoner; it abridgeth him of a liberty he had before, but gives him nothing: for the law-makers did think they had given the prisoner an extraordinary favour in the foregoing part of the act, in giving him a copy of the indictment five days before he should plead, and a copy of the panel two days before he should be tried, and allowing him counsel: and all these advantages were to enable him to quash the indictment, or the process returned, for the clause extends to both; the words are, "That no indictment nor process or return thereupon, shall be quashed on the motion of the prisoner or his counsel for mis-writing, mis-spelling, false or improper latin, unless exception concerning the same be taken and made in the respective court where such trial shall be by the prisoner or his counsel assigned before any evidence given in open court upon such indictment, nor shall any such mis-writing, &c. after conviction be any cause to stay judgment." Therefore they made this extraordinary provision to restrain the prisoner, in part, by this clause; as much as to say you have an advantage of the copy of the indictment, and you may make use of that to quash it by motion, if you think fit, as you may also the process, but it shall be 'before evidence given.' It is true, those are the words, but the using that term, viz. 'quashing' such indictment or process, shows it must be done in such a way and time as is proper for quashing; and the very words are, that it shall be upon motion. Now we are to expound those words. And I say, a motion to quash an indictment, must be understood a motion in the proper season, which I think is before plea pleaded; but at least before the jury is sworn. There were three times when the prisoner might have had the advantage of a fault in the indictment before this act. 1. By motion to quash it before plea pleaded. 2. Then afterwards in arrest of judgment: and 3. After that by writ of error. Now this clause of this act takes away the privilege of moving in arrest of judgment for mis-writing, &c. but saves the advantage upon a writ of error, and upon a motion to quash the indictment. We are to consider what is a proper time for a motion to quash an indictment; the motion is to be made to the court and to them alone. It is not to be made to the court and the jury. When the jury is sworn all application is to be made to the court as having a jury present which they are to assist in the trial and determination of the fact only. What use then is there of the jury, when you make this motion, which consists only in points of law? They must stand by and be out of office all the while this motion is making: and it is not reasonable, nor certainly ever was intended, that after a jury is sworn to try a matter of fact, they should stand idle while you move a thing which you should have moved before they came to the bar: suppose you should now move some exception to the Verdict, and the return thereupon, should we, when we and you also have admitted the jury to be sworn, quash the process whereby they are returned? And yet we may as well do that as this. For, the act provides in the very same words concerning quashing process and indictments. But when the jury is sworn, and ready to receive their evidence, sure, then it is out of all season to make such a motion; therefore I do not think the parliament intended by this clause (which was a kind of exception to the favour the prisoner received by having the copy of the indictment) to institute a new method of proceedings for motions to quash indictments, even when a jury is at the bar and sworn to try the issue, and there is nothing proper to be proceeded upon, but only to hear the evidence produced for the proof of that issue, till the jury is discharged. But still this I would say, this is a new case, and upon a new statute. I am truly of opinion, that the motion is altogether unreasonable and irregular, and it should have been made before, and you had a full opportunity to make it this day seven-night before plea pleaded, and you might likewise to day before the jury was sworn; therefore when the jury are now at the bar actually entered into, and employed upon the service, the court ought not to be interrupted by such a motion. Yet nevertheless I would propound this, that, seeing it is a new case and upon a new statute, the court would forgive the irregularity, (for I think it does need forgiveness) and if the king's counsel will consent to it (to prevent any error or any pretence of hardship upon a new law) that we should hear their exceptions.

L. C. Baron. (Sir Edward Ward). This act of parliament, as it has given a benefit to the prisoner that he had not before, in allowing him a copy of his indictment, in order to his making exceptions; so it has restrained him as to the time of making those exceptions: that he should have time, there is no doubt: the time limited for it, as this act says, must be before evidence given, because they thought it unreasonable that there should be any quashing of the indictment after such time as the king had given any evidence whatsoever in the case; for that would be a discovery of the king's evidence, and great inconveniences would ensue thereupon; but the question is at what time this is to be done; whether it may be at any time before evidence given or no; it did intend surely that the motion to quash the indictment and the exceptions to it might have their proper effect, and that must be before the trial; for it was not the intent of the act to alter the method of proceedings, and it is to no purpose after the jury is sworn, for then their proper office is to determine the fact; now if before this act of parliament it never was allowed to take any such exception as this after the jury sworn, it will be consistent with the words of the act of parliament, which are, 'That it shall be done before evidence given': if then it be in the regular time for motions, which is before plea pleaded or jury sworn, that is, before evidence given; for it is not said, as Mr. Cowper observed, that it should be immediately before the evidence given, I think sure such an exposition as was formerly made ought to be made in this case, the time not being precisely fixed by this act; if there were a certain time determined when men should take their exceptions, as we know it has been in practice before issue joined, then after the jury is sworn it is an improper time then, I think, to make such exceptions: I do not suppose this act, as to the method of proceedings—, than it was before, but this exception ought to be taken before plea pleaded: truly it is a new act of parliament, and this is so far within the words of the act that it is before evidence given, as the counsel for the prisoner say. If this can be governed and ruled by proceedings and practice in former times in cases not of felony or treason, but only in criminal cases: If nobody should suffer by any interpretation, I should think it ought to bear a conformable construction to what the practice was before. I take it you have lost the regular time for making your exception, and you invert the whole method of proceedings upon trials: for to what purpose is it to take exceptions to quash the indictment when the jury are once charged with it? If it be an indictment that ought to be quashed, the jury ought not to be charged, you have had two times, and they are both of them elapsed, for this matter, that is, at the arraignment, and before the jury sworn; yet I would propose it to the king's counsel as my lord chief justice of the common pleas has done, it being a new case, that it should be better considered of and agreed upon, that in these cases we may go on upon a certain rule that it may be established for all time to come.

Just. Neville. I would begin with the proposal, because, I believe, I may not be so clear in my opinion, otherwise I must deliver my thoughts according to my judgment, but I would have the king's counsel consider of the proposal.

Att. Gen. My lord, for us to consent to that in such a case as this, where the court thinks it not regular, would be pretty hard to desire of us; if any thing of advantage should happen on the other side, I verily think the counsel for the prisoner will not be so ready to consent to waive any such advantage, nor am I for asking them to do it; this clause goes only to some faults in the indictment; mis-spelling, mis-writing, false and improper Latin, that is all that they are restrained from moving in arrest of judgment; any thing else, any uncertainty or other matter, that is not comprehended under these particulars, they may take advantage of to move in stay of judgment after a verdict; this clause does only abridge them from moving in arrest of judgment for mis-writing, mis-spelling, false or improper Latin; therefore if your lordship should think it reasonable we should consent to let them in to make any exception now, it must be confined to those particular objections of false and improper Latin, there can be no colour to make the liberty larger, because for any thing else they are not restrained from moving in arrest of judgment, for there can be no hardship in that case, as I think, they have no reason to complain that there has been in any other part of the case; but for those particulars that there may be no complaint of hardship, if your lordship thinks it reasonable we should consent, it may be we may be prevailed upon to do it, though whatever hardship does happen it is their own fault, and the prisoner may thank his own counsel for that hardship: if we assist them now to let them go, it ought to be taken as a great kindness; and truly, my lord, I am unwilling to do any thing that your lordship and the court should think hard upon the prisoner. Certainly it is the fault of their own counsel, now the law has allowed the prisoner counsel, not to take the proper time, and pursue the usual methods; and it is a strain beyond what is usual, that we must help their faults by our consent; however, if the court think it reasonable, I shall not be against it, but then I am sure the court will take care they shall be confined to those particulars that are mentioned in the act.

L. C. J. No doubt of it: Therefore sir Bartholomew Shower, are your exceptions for mis-spelling, mis-writing, or false or improper Latin? for if they be such things as you may move in arrest of judgment and have that advantage, then there is no colour that we should break through all the rules of proceedings to admit such an irregular motion as this.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, in the case of the life of a man I will not take upon me to say what is mis-spelling, mis-writing, or false or improper Latin, or what is substantial; but all that I say is, I have five exceptions, every one of them imports a doubt, as I take it, worthy the consideration of the court, and some of them effectual enough to quash the indictment; but for me, when a man's life is at stake, and it partly depends upon me as his counsel, to say what is proper or improper Latin, or to admit it to be matter of substance, and then to-morrow to have it come, and told me, you should have moved this to-day, then I am sure they would have reason to say, it was the fault of the prisoner's counsel; for he would have chosen very ill counsel, in me, I confess, if I should consent to put any such disadvantage upon him. I beg the favour that I may have the liberty to propose my objections, which I think are worth considering of; it is for the advantage of the king for us to take our exceptions all together, because, else, if any of them prove material, the trouble of the trial will be but mispence of time.

L. C. J. No, we cannot hear all your objections, but those that are mentioned particularly in the act of parliament! for such as are not mentioned in the clause, you have a proper time to move them in arrest of judgment.

Sir B. Shower. Then we will put those that are within the act.

Att. Gen. If we do any thing by way of consent in this matter, we must insist upon it, that they be confined to the particulars in the Act; we desire they may open their objections to the court, and if the court shall think they are properly under those heads, then they will consider of them, if the court be of another mind, then they must be reserved till the proper time.

L. C. J. Do you consent then, Mr. Attorney, that they shall now take those exceptions that are mentioned in the act of parliament?

Att. Gen. If the court think it reasonable upon those terms, I do.

Just. Powys. Let them open them if your lordship please, and let us keep the power in our own hands to do, as our discretions shall direct.

L. C. J. Truly I do not know whether we can do any thing in this matter, I question much whether it be discretionary in us to break through all the common method of proceeding, and admit of such irregularities.

L. C. J. Treby. I have a great inclination to hear them, that we may get rid of these pretended exceptions, which I am apt to think will, when opened, disappoint the expectations that may be raised by this mentioning them in general; for, I have that opinion of the ability and circumspection of the counsel, that I believe if they had had exceptions sufficient to quash the indictment, we should have heard of them at a time more proper than this now between the swearing the jury and giving evidence to them. But, possibly, the counsel may think fit to make an essay, and try what can be got out of this unusual expression in this new act.

L. C. J. No, no, I know this is a piece of art, and the court is not well dealt with in it.

L. C. J. Treby. Indeed I am very willing to hear them for that reason.

L. C. J. I look upon it only as mere trick, and a piece of art to take the opinion of the court.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, it was my mistake then; for I take it, if the act of parliament had intended otherwise, they would have expressed it otherwise.

L. C. J. Does the act of parliament give you another liberty, and a greater than you had before? does it not design to abridge you of a liberty that you had before? Certainly it never intended that the court should admit of any irregular proceedings.

Just. Powell. You should have timed your motion better; for certainly now the jury is charged they must give a verdict either of acquittal or conviction; and if you move to quash the indictment, and your exceptions are material, the jury cannot proceed; you see what a pass your motion has brought it to, 'tis certainly a mighty irregular motion.

L. C. J. Treby. What judgment would you have us give? I would ask you that: if any exception were moved before the jury were sworn, and it proved material, the proper judgment were, that the indictment be quashed; but now they are sworn, what judgment must we give? Must we not expect the verdict of the jury first upon the fact? And must we then give judgment upon your exception?

Sir B. Shower. I know not whether your lordship may not give judgment first to quash the indictment, and then discharge the Jury.

L. C. J. Treby. And what if we do not find cause to quash it, then you will say, we must go on with the evidence, as we were going before this interfering? Are we to be doing two things at once? I am pretty certain you can show me no precedent for any like proceedings in any case: it is confounding the offices of the judge and jury.

Mr. Phipps. If your lordships tried the validity of our exceptions, and find occasion to quash the indictment, there will be no need of a Jury.

L. C. J. Upon the statute of Jeofailes in a civil cause, suppose at a trial at bar, it appears upon the face of the declaration, that there is such a mistake as will be cured by the verdict; but if the party had demurred, and shown it for cause, it would have been fatal. Do you think, when he has waved the benefit of demurrer and pleaded to issue, that you shall move this and help yourself by such a motion, because it will be helped after a verdict?

Sir B. Shower. If this act had been worded as that Statute of Jeofailes is, it may be we might not.

L. C. J. Why, it is not said, in the Statute of Jeofailes, that it shall be good after issue joined, before the jury is charged or sworn, but that it shall not be good after the verdict.

Sir B. Shower. It is before the evidence given.

L. C. J. Could he do so in any case before this act, and does the act enlarge your liberty, or abridge it?

L. C. J. Treby. Sir Bartholomew Shower, you insist upon part of the words of the act of parliament; it says, No indictment or process shall be quashed upon the motion of the prisoner or his counsel, unless it be made before any evidence, &c. Now, I suppose, the parliament use that expression, 'upon the motion,' in the same sense as it is used in law, viz. for such a one as should be in the time when motions for quashing the indictments are properly to be made; now, when is that? It is plain, it was always before the jury come to the bar, nay before the plea of the party. If that be the proper time to make such a motion, then that expression in this act of a 'motion to quash the indictment' will very well help to construe the other part of the clause that you insist upon: For if the motion be made before plea pleaded, it is certainly before the 'evidence given' in your sense. And I conceive, that under that expression [evidence given] which signifies the main part, the parliament intended to comprehend the whole proceeding to trial, beginning, if not from the pleading Not Guilty, at least, from the swearing the jury. 'Before evidence given in court,' may reasonably be expounded, 'Before the prisoner hath fully entered into that contestation of the fact, which is to be determined only by evidence in court.' I attended the court of King's Bench a long time, and I believe that I have heard it said a hundred times, upon motions to quash indictments of great or odious offences: No, try it, says the Court, we will not quash it, plead to it, let the fact be tried, you may then move it in arrest of judgment. Those expressions shewed that the proper time for a motion to quash an indictment was before plea, though they, in their discretion, would not grant a motion to quash, in cases of such great offences. But sure they did not think that when a jury came to the bar, it was a tolerable time to move to quash an indictment; there was no expectation of hearing of such a motion then? And certainly this clause which is made wholly against the prisoner, should not be construed to help him to such a new extraordinary and absurd liberty.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, with submission, that practice goes upon another reason, the court would not quash it at all upon a motion; this act of parliament supposes that you will quash upon a motion at any time before evidence given: We never heard of a motion to quash an indictment for felony or treason, but still the court would always say, demur, or plead, or move in arrest of judgment; but by this law it seems the sense of the parliament was, that it might be quashed upon a motion.

Sol. Gen. Sir B. Shower is come to what I said, that in truth there is no such thing as quashing an indictment for treason or felony, as I mentioned in sir Rich. Mansel's case, and I think the rule that was given in that case will serve now in this case; I am for consenting, if they be kept within the limits of the act of parliament; but I must desire the opinion of the court before we do consent.

L. C. J. Holt. Aye, aye, Go on, brother Neville.

Just. Neville. I must confess I cannot but doubt, as this act is, there were two times that they had liberty of taking these exceptions to indictments; but indeed, in murder and treason they were seldom admitted, till they came to move in arrest of judgment; but still there was always a privilege, and a time given to the prisoner, be the crime what it would, to take that advantage which the law gave him, to prevent judgment against him. Now I agree, it is irregular and unseasonable to offer it now, and quite different from all former practice; you might have done it before now, the act says expressly it must be done before evidence; but you might have taken advantage before the jury was sworn, nay before you had pleaded, but you have lapsed your time. Yet truly, notwithstanding you have lapsed your time, I cannot satisfy myself to take away the liberty that the law has given the prisoner sometime or other, to except against the indictment. It is plain that before this act, after verdict he might have moved in arrest of judgment, now he cannot do so; whether the fault be in the counsel I cannot tell, but the great prejudice is to the person that is to be tried, who will now be wholly precluded from making any advantage of the exceptions he has to the indictment, because by the act he cannot move in arrest of judgment. This seems a strong implication that the parliament intended he must have some time or other, but before evidence given, to offer his exceptions. I say this only to those particular things that are mentioned in the act, mis-writing, mis-spelling, false or improper Latin; as to these four particular things which the party is barred from moving in arrest of judgment, I cannot satisfy myself but that he should have one time or another to take this advantage before the evidence given, and therefore I think he should have it now: It is true, it is altogether irregular, the jury being sworn, and it ought to have been done before; but I hope if it be admitted now, it will be with such observation, that nobody will ever offer at it for time to come. As this case is before us, and the act of parliament, which perhaps may have led the counsel into that mistake, that it might be any time before evidence given, though they know the proper time, and the regular method in other cases; yet I doubt it is hard to put such a construction upon this act on the sudden, quite to debar the prisoner of the benefit of his exceptions to the indictment.

Just. Powell. I have already declared my opinion, that the prisoner has had his proper time for making his exceptions, but he has lapsed that time; but I am not against that motion in a case of life, upon an indictment for so great a crime as treason is; and where the consequence is so great, if it may consist with the rules of law, and it be the sense of the court, and the king's counsel consent to let them be heard, I submit to it, nay I would second or third that motion that they may be heard.

Just. Eyres. Truly I am of the same opinion, I think we ought not to alter the ancient course of law by words of implication, nor go any further than the act of parliament does express. The act appoints that a copy of the indictment should be delivered to the prisoner so many days before, to enable him to make his exceptions, and therefore deprives him of the benefit of those exceptions after conviction in arrest of judgment. I see no words in the act of parliament that do alter the course of proceedings as to this matter, from what it was in all civil and criminal causes before; persons must take their advantage of excepting in their proper time, but when it comes to issue, the next thing to be done is the trial; and truly I must needs say the counsel are to blame, that knew this so very well, that if they have any advantage of excepting, they did not take that advantage sooner, it is their fault; but seeing it is so, I am of opinion not to foreclose the prisoner, as the case stands. I would be tender of life, but at the same time I declare my opinion upon this act of parliament as the rest of my brothers have done, to prevent the objection for the time to come; yet seeing there is this misfortune, and there would be a hardship upon the prisoner by the default and neglect of his counsel in the case of a man's life, I would be so tender as to indulge them to make their objections now.

Mr. Baron Powys. I am of the same opinion the prisoner has lapsed his time, for I take it this clause of this act of parliament has not altered the common course of proceedings; nay, I take it, it signifies very little in this case; for certainly it was intended to disable the prisoner, and not enable him at all; and therefore, as the case is, I think it very irregular and impracticable to introduce so great a novelty, as to admit the motion for quashing the indictment, when the jury is sworn, and when the fact is the only single point to be determined, and every thing else ought in legal course to come before or after; but for us to confound time, one time for pleading, another time for trial, and another for arrest of judgment, all at once, and to have a jury attending merely to hear counsel at the bar moot points of law, which might be determined either before or after the trial, is so very irregular, that it really introduces nothing but confusion, which courts of justice ought to avoid above all things, and ought to keep to the proper seasons that the law allows. Therefore, truly, I think in strictness of law we ought not to allow it; but it being in a case of life, and it being a new case upon a new act of parliament, if the king's counsel thinks fit to consent, I shall be for it; if not, I think in strictness of law we cannot allow it.

Att. Gen. My lord, I am very unwilling to deny the prisoner any advantage that he might have had by this act of parliament, though his counsel have slipt the proper time; if sir Bartholomew Shower will say his exceptions are to any of the four particular heads mentioned in this clause of the act of parliament, for we must confine them to that, then we do consent that he should make them now.

L. C. J. Truly, Mr. Attorney, if you do consent that they take their exceptions now, we may consider of it whether it can be; but I know not how we could admit them to that liberty otherwise, for if there be any thing material, they may move it in arrest of judgment.

Att. Gen. And I believe they won't say their objections are so slight, as to be only matter of form; they say they are substantial, and then your lordship will hear them in a proper time.

Sir B. Shower. I do not know whether I am mistaken in the law, I am sure you are mistaken in the indictment.

L. C. J. Well, do you consent to let them make their objections, as to those four heads in the act of parliament?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord; if it be any matter of substance, that is out of the case at present, for the provision of the act of parliament is only for mere matter of form, and I should be very unwilling in any point that is material, to make a precedent in such a case as this.

L. C. J. I confess if you had consented farther, I do not know how we should have admitted of it.

L. C. J. Truly. I tell you how I thought it might be done; you might have committed an irregularity, for which in a case of life, and upon a new law, I believe and hope we should have been forgiven.

L. C. J. Well, for my part I will not commit any irregularity upon any account whatsoever; I cannot see how by law they can take any exceptions to the indictment; Mr. Attorney cannot consent, and if he did, I think it could not be, unless he did also consent to discharge the jury; but I see they will not offer any objections according to your consent, Mr. Attorney, and therefore pray go on to open the evidence.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar, Ambrose Rookwood, stands indicted for high-treason, in compassing and imagining the death of his majesty. Gentlemen, the overt-acts that are laid in the indictment to prove this treason, are; that he, together with diverse others, had frequent meetings and consultations in order to assassinating his majesty's royal person, and did provide horses and arms for that purpose.

Gentlemen, the evidence that you will hear, to prove these facts that are thus laid, will be of this nature; you will hear by the witness, that there has been for some years a design carried on to murder the king's person; that this was discoursed of, and several debates and consultations were had about it the last year, some time before the king went to Flanders; there was several meetings, where were sir William Parkyns, captain Porter, and Char-nock that was executed, and several others, and there they did consider in what way to take off the king at that time; and you will hear they did expect a commission to authorize it from the late king James; but then the commission did not come, they had not any such at that time; but they did think fit to put it in execution without any such order and authority, and therefore they endeavoured to have got a vessel to have carried them off after they had executed this bloody conspiracy; but it happened his majesty went to Flanders sooner than they thought, and they could not provide themselves of a security for a retreat, and so at that time the design was laid aside.

But, gentlemen, you will hear this conspiracy was renewed, and set on foot this winter; and in order to the accomplishment of it you will hear, that about Christmas last there were several persons sent from France by the late king James, on purpose to put this horrible design in execution. Sir George Barclay was to be at the head of it; he was a lieutenant in one of the late king James's troops of guards in France, he was sent over with a commission, and Mr. Rookwood, the prisoner at the bar, was a brigadier in the guards there; these came over, and several other troopers of the late king James's guards, by two or three at a time, that they might not be observed; particularly you will hear, that when sir George Barclay was come over, several troopers were sent by king James himself to come to him at St. Germain's: and there he told them he had a piece of service for them to do in England, and that they should observe sir George Barclay's orders and directions. More particularly there was one Harris and Hare, two troopers in the guards, were sent for by the late king James into the late queen's bed-chamber at St. Germain's, where colonel Parker was present; they were told by the late king, he was sensible they had served him faithfully, and he would advance them; and he had now a piece of service for them to do, which would enable him to do it. He told them they must go over into England, and be sure to obey sir George Barclay's directions; and they were ordered to endeavour to find out sir George Barclay when they came into England; and were told by him, that they would meet sir George Barclay twice a week in Covent-garden-square, in the evening, and the token by which they should know him was, he would wear a white handkerchief out of his pocket; this they were told by the late king, when he sent them upon this errand. Colonel Parker was by at the same time, and being there, he was ordered to go to Mr. Carol, secretary to the late queen, who had order to furnish them with money to bear the charges of their journey into England; and if they were detained by contrary winds, they had letters of recommendation to Monsieur Latour the French king's president at Calais, to furnish them with money to bear their charges over into England; and accordingly they went; but being detained at Calais for want of wind, they were furnished by the French president; and by the beginning of February they came over.

But I omitted one thing, gentlemen: Before they came over, the late king when they were with him took a list out of his pocket of names, and told these two, Harris and Hare, what names they should go by in England; Harris was to go by the name of Jenkins, and Hare by the name of Guiny; and accordingly they came over in a boat, and landed in Kent; and when they came to town, they endeavoured to find out sir George Barclay: The first time I think they did not find him; but the second time they did find him; and he saluted them, and told them he was glad to see them come over, and he would furnish them with money; and he sent major Holmes to them; and according he did come, and give them subsistence-money.

Now, gentlemen, you will hear that sir George Barclay being come over with these troopers, and many others, to the number of sixteen, that at several times were sent upon this conspiracy; I say, after they were come, sir George Barclay had frequent meetings and consultations with several other persons that were to be engaged in the same design; and they met at several places, sometimes at captain Porter's, sometimes at the Nag's-head in Covent-garden, at another time at the Swan tavern in the Strand; and you will find by the evidence, that the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Rookwood, was present at most of those meetings; and there they did consult of the best ways and methods for putting this conspiracy in execution; sometimes they thought of doing it by an ambush laid on the other side of the water, by persons on foot, in a little wood there near Richmond, where the king was to pass by, whilst others on horseback were to take notice of their firing, and then to attack the guards. This was proposed: but there was another proposal to do it on this side the water; and therefore to settle the matter one of the conspirators, King, was sent to view the ground on the other side of the water; and he did glory that he had found a very proper place, and thought it a very convenient method; but yet they were not all satisfied; and at the Nag's-head-tavern in Covent-garden they did debate the matter again, and it was resolved to have the ground viewed again; and Porter, and Knightley, and King that was executed, went to view the ground on both sides the water, to see which was the most convenient place; this was about the 12th of February they did take an account of the most convenient places on either side; and when they had done it, they came back in the evening to give an account what they had done, to several others of the conspirators who met for that purpose; and I think the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Rookwood, was present there at this meeting; and you will hear, the place agreed upon was the lane that leads from Turnham-green to Brentford; that they thought the most convenient place, because there were several inns in and about Turnham-green and Brentford, where they might place their men by two or three in an inn, that they might not be liable to observation: This was the place that was approved of.

Then next, the manner of doing it was to be considered and adjusted, and that was thus: that the whole number should be divided into three parties; one party to be commanded by sir George Barclay to attack the coach and kill the king and all that were in it, while at the same time the two other parties, to be commanded by captain Porter, and Mr. Rookwood the prisoner at the bar, were to set upon the guards; and the time agreed upon to put it in execution was the 15th of February on Saturday, that being the usual day the king went to Richmond a-hunting; and you will find, that on Saturday morning they met in several parties, not all together, but under the several heads of the parties, in order to be ready, if the king had gone out that morning, to have assassinated him.

Gentlemen, I say, you will hear of several meetings that day; there was one meeting at Mr. Charnock's, where were present Mr. Porter, sir William Parkyns, and several others; and another meeting you will hear of, where the prisoner at the bar was present, at the lodgings of one Counter, another of king James's friends, that came over for this purpose; and there was sir George Barclay, and there was the prisoner at the bar; and those that were to be under sir George's command met that Saturday morning, in order to make ready, in case the king had gone abroad, to have attacked him: you will find by the evidence, that the prisoner was there; and Harris, that was one of the troopers sent over from France, was sent for, and came in and found them in a great hurry; for Harris was not ac-acquainted at St. Germain's with the immediate design of assassinating the king; but finding them in a great hurry, he asked them what was the matter? And they told him they were to make ready immediately upon the design. He wondered at it, and asked what it was; and then they told him they were to go to attack the Prince of Orange to assassinate him; and Rookwood the prisoner at the bar told him, if he would go to Counter, he should have particular orders and instructions from him what to do. Accordingly Harris went to Counter; he told him where his horse, and Hare's horse and Hungate's horse were; and their horses happened to be placed in Somerset-house, by Mr. Lewis, in a stable there, recommended by him, to the care of my lord Feversham's servants, who were to take care of them, and of two or three more that were placed there; in all, six of these conspirators horses by the recommendation of Mr. Lewis were lodged in that stable in Somerset-house, and looked after by my lord Feversham's men; and thither Harris, Hare, and Hungate were directed by Counter to go for their horses.

But it happened by very good providence, that his majesty did not go abroad that day; and Durance, one of the orderly men that lodged at Kensington to give intelligence, came from thence and acquainted them that the king did not go out that morning, so there was nothing more done; but Harris was told that he should have his horse at that time, and take it away; and in the mean time, till they were to go upon their design, they were to ride out upon their horses, as they had opportunity, to make them fit for service; or else it would be thought the rider's fault, if, at the time of the attack, they did not come up in good time and order to join with the rest, and it would be thought want of courage in the rider; and accordingly major Holmes, another of those conspirators, went with Harris and Hare to Somerset-house to take away their horses, and they carried them to a stable in Soho; but for several nights they had been kept at Somerset-house.

You will find, gentlemen, that Mr. Rookwood, the prisoner at the bar, was concerned in all these consultations and meetings, in making preparations for the assassination; they intended, as I said, to do it on the 15th of February; but that not taking effect at that day, between that and the Saturday following, Mr. Harris was frequently in the company of Mr. Rookwood, and Mr. Lowick, and others, where they did discourse of this assassination, and they did think it a very barbarous thing; but however, they resolved they would do it, for they had orders to obey sir George Barclay: and this was expressly declared by Lowick and the prisoner, that they had directions to obey sir George, and what he would have them to do they would do: they must and would obey orders; that was their resolution, even upon discoursing of the heinousness of so bloody and barbarous a design.

You will likewise hear, Gentlemen, by the evidence, that the next Saturday, being the two-and-twentieth of February, they resolved to put it in execution again; and accordingly there was a meeting on the Friday before at the Sun tavern, where were present sir George Barclay, Mr. Porter, and others; and there they did resolve upon it, though they had at first some apprehension the thing was discovered; but they were soon satisfied there was no such thing, because, they said among themselves, that if it had been so, they should have been taken up, and not have been permitted to meet there: therefore they resolved the next day to put it in execution; and accordingly they met at several places, and got ready in the morning, in case the king had gone abroad. The prisoner met that morning at Porter's lodging, with several other troopers, to make ready for the enterprize: and there the prisoner at the bar did, at that time, give a list of the names that he was to command; for he was to have one party of those that were to attack the guards, of whom Harris was one and Hare was another, and Richardson was another, and Blackburne was another, and his own name was chief; and he ordered Harris to go and see to get them ready, for they must go out that morning: accordingly Harris did go and got them ready, and came back and gave an account of it. His majesty did not go abroad that day, as it happened very fortunately, by reason of the happy discovery; so that news being brought back again, though they had made all things ready, those preparations were put off, and they did nothing that day; and quickly after the discovery was fully made, and made public by the apprehension of the conspirators.

Gentlemen, you will have this matter fully proved to you by several witnesses, that I think there can be no room to doubt the truth of it, that there was such a conspiracy, and that the prisoner was as highly concerned in it as those who suffered the just punishment of the law. We will call our witnesses to prove this; and I believe they will be able to give you an account of the whole affair better and more fully than I can do, or can pretend to open it.

Sol. Gen. Call Mr. Harris and Mr. Porter.

Sir B. Shower. We oppose the swearing Mr. Porter: I must beg the favour of the court to hear us in it; if my instructions be true, we insist upon it, that he is not capable of being a witness; he stands convicted of felony: there we have the record, and we desire it may be read.

Capt. Porter. I know nothing of the matter, that there is any such thing standing out against me.

Sir B. Shower. Then sure we are mistaken in the man. Pray let us hear it read.

Cl. of Ar. (Reads the Record.) This is an indictment of murder against George Porter, for the killing of sir James Hacket, knight.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing of this, Mr. Porter?

Porter. I came off with manslaughter, and pleaded the king's pardon in court.

Att. Gen. Pray read what was done upon it.

Cl. of the Crown. Here's the jury's verdict: 'Quod predictus Georgius Porter est culpabilis de felonica interfectione predicti Jacobi Hacket, et non culp.' as to the murder. 'Here is: Curia advisare vult,' and I suppose there was a pardon afterwards.

Just. Powell. Was he not burnt in the hand.

Porter. No; I pleaded the king's pardon.

L. C. J. And there are several acts of pardon since.

Mr. Comper. See the time when the indictment was.

Cl. of Ar. It is the 8th of December, in the 26th year of king Charles the 2nd.

Sir B. Shower. We agree that he did plead the king's pardon; and then the case is no more than this, a man is convicted of manslaughter, and the king pardons him, he still remains unqualified to be a witness; we say, this has been the case that has been much debated in Westminster-Hall, and upon debate it has been resolved.

Just. Powell. It has been so, but always against you.

Sir B. Shower. It was in the case of my lord Castlemaine* at this bar; one of my lords the Judges went to the court of Common-Pleas to ask their opinion, and these cases were put † In case a man be outlawed of felony and pardoned; in case a man be convicted of felony and had the benefit of his clergy; and in case a man was convicted and not attainted, but pardoned upon the second case; they were of opinion, that the receiving the punishment of burning in the hand had purged the very guilt, and did set him upright by the statute of the 15th of queen Elizabeth, they thought it did operate to that purpose; but in the case of a pardon of a man attainted or convicted, it was agreed he was not qualified to be a witness; and Dangerfield, against whom the objection was made, being burnt in the hand, was received to be a witness; and it was only made use of against him to take off his credit. The record of that case is in this court, and I looked upon the print of the trial this day. We say, that there is a case in 1 Brownlow 47. a man attainted of felony cannot be of an inquest, though pardoned; and we think, he that cannot be a jurymen, sure cannot be a witness; there is the same exception to his being a witness as there is in the case of a jurymen; for the one ought to appear as free, and stand as clear and unsuspected, in respect of his probity and verity, as the other, as the one is sworn to try and determine upon oath, so the other is sworn, and his oath is to sway and determine the jury, and in consequence it is all one; and upon these reasons we hope he is not a good witness.

L. C. J. Where is that case in Brownlow?

Sir B. Shower. It is 1 Brownlow 47. and then there is 11 H. 4. 41. 2 Bulst. 164. there my lord Cook says, if a man be convicted of felony, and pardoned, he cannot be a jurymen; for though the punishment is pardoned, the guilt remains, so that he is not 'probus et legalis Homo'; and every particular person has an interest in it, that they have free and clear persons to be jurymen and witnesses.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, that is the distinction we go upon, which was taken in Dangerfield's case, upon the trial of my lord Castlemaine, where the whole court were of opinion, that a pardon from the king only, would not make him a good witness; but if he were burnt in the hand, that by the statute of decimo octavo Elizabethæ, amounted to a statute pardon, and set him right to all intents and purposes: and there they did take notice of that book that sir Bartholomew Shower cited of 11 of Hen. 4. that a man attainted could not be a jurymen, though pardoned by the king: it was objected he might be a witness; but Mr. Justice Jones said, it was the same reason if he be not fit for a jurymen, he is not fit for a witness; they ought to be both 'probi et legales Homines,' thus the case stood there. And that other book of Bulstrode is the same; it was in the case of a prohibition for a Modus Decimandi, where the suggestion is to be proved by two witnesses, it was objected he had not proved it by two witnesses, because they were both attainted of felony, and though they were pardoned, yet that did not make them good witnesses in the opinion of the court.

L. C. J. This is quite another case, it does not come up to your point; here is no attainer, and here is pardon upon pardon, by act of parliament.

Mr. Phipps. As to that, we think the parliamentary pardon is out of the case; for if the pardon from the king be a good pardon, there is no guilt for the act of pardon to work upon.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, this we think to be a good distinction as to that matter, a man that is actually pardoned the punishment by the king's pardon, and afterwards an act of pardon comes and pardons all offences, that we say does nothing, for he is not a subject of pardon, for he was discharged of his punishment before.

Att. Gen. Sure these gentlemen are not in earnest when they make this objection.

Sir B. Shower. When the king has once pardoned him, he is not an offender within the meaning of the act of parliament, and therefore the act works nothing as to him, and so he stands as much disabled from being a witness, as he was before.

Just. Powell. In the case of Cuttington in Hobbard, there it is said the pardon takes away 'tam Reatum quam Pœnam, &c.' An action being brought for calling a man thief, who had been indicted for felony, and convicted, and pardoned, the court adjudged, that he ought not to be called so; for he was no thief, for the pardon had washed him entirely clean, and he was discharged both of the guilt and punishment, and all the consequences of it.

* See his Case in this Collection, vol. 7, p. 1837.

† See vol. 7, p. 1088.

L. C. J. Those cases that have been put are no authorities at all in this matter ; for where there is a conviction of manslaughter, and the party is pardoned, we think that pardon of the king works in a way of discharge as much as the burning in the hand. I take it, it is the same thing : they admit, that will discharge him to all intents and purposes, and so we think does this as effectually ; for having his clergy, and being burnt in the hand, works by way of statute pardon : for the case of a jury-man, I take it not to be the same with this case ; but even in that case, I do not think that the party convicted, after the king hath pardoned him, is disabled from being of a jury ; but supposing that to be so, yet there are many cases wherein a man may be a witness, that cannot be a jury-man. It is true, the credit of such a witness is left to the jury, but it is no objection against his being a legal witness ; and it is a very strange argument to me, that because he was pardoned by the king, if that should be deficient, that therefore the act of pardon should have no effect. Truly, that is to say, that the king's pardon works so, as to have nothing left for the parliament pardon to work upon, and certainly it sets him so right, that to all intents and purposes, he is as good a witness as ever he was ; and if any thing remained to be done, the act of parliament has done it, and supplied the defect ; but I think the king's pardon is sufficient.

Att. Gen. My lord, I suppose, they do not insist upon it, as thinking there is any great weight in it, but only for objection sake ; but we hope that notwithstanding this objection Mr. Porter shall be sworn.

Sol. Gen. My lord, they take this exception at an improper time, for they speak to his credibility.

L. C. J. No ; they except to his being a witness.

Sol. Gen. If so, your lordship remembers a case that was before your lordship not long since, but in Easter term last, when one was tried at this bar for treason, and Aaron Smith was produced as a witness, and the prisoner took exception against him as no good witness, because he had stood in the pillory ; and your lordship and the court did say, that the act of pardon did restore him to all intents and purposes ad liberam legem.

Mr. Conyers. In the case of the Earl of Castlemaine, both the courts of King's-bench and Common-Pleas held Dangerfield a legal witness, though burned in the hand for felony, and so was the opinion of Rolls : in Stiles reports 388, one that hath been burned in the hand for felony, may notwithstanding be a witness.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, in answer to that case that was put, that after the king's pardon for one convicted of felony, another man has not the liberty to call him thief, that was an objection in my lord Castlemaine's case, that may stand as good, and our notion that we contend for, be good too ; he cannot be impeached, or have guilt imputed to him, when once the king has forgiven him, and yet that may not restore him to his entire credit, as was my lord chief justice Scroggs' distinction in the case of Dangerfield ; and as to the case of Aaron Smith, that was very different : the reason in that case was, because the crime for which Mr. Smith was indicted, did not import any such scandalous offence for which his credit could be impeached.

L. C. J. No, no, we did not meddle with that, we went upon the pardon.

Sir B. Shower. But in that case, they did not insist upon it that he had a pardon antecedent to the Act of Pardon, so that he was subjectum capax, for the act to work upon, he was an offender that needed a pardon ; whereas Mr. Porter being pardoned before, could not be an offender needing a pardon, and consequently not within the first words of the Act of Indemnity, because he was pardoned by the king before ; but he was not by that pardon, say we, restored to his credit to make him a good witness, and the act of parliament did not affect him, he being not subjectum materie, as not being an offender.

Mr. Phipps. As to Mr. Solicitor's case of Aaron Smith, we agree the act of parliament did restore him, because he never was pardoned before by the king, so there remained an offence for the parliament pardon to work upon.

L. C. J. Do you agree that, then you may agree the other ; for the act of parliament pardons none but those that the king can pardon generally.

Mr. Phipps. It is true, my lord ; but we say that an act of parliament pardon removes those disabilities which the king's pardon does not ; for every one is in law a party to an act of parliament, and therefore no person shall be permitted to alledge in disability of another, any crime which he himself hath pardoned, for that is to aver against his own act ; but it is otherwise in the case of the king's pardon.

L. C. J. Why the very parliament pardon comes from the king ; the king has a full power of pardoning, and where he does pardon under the great seal, it has the full effect of the parliament pardon. A pardon, before attainder, prevents all corruption of blood, so that though a man forfeits his goods by conviction, yet after a pardon he is capable of having new goods, and shall hold them without any forfeiture whatsoever ; for the pardon restores him to his former capacity, and prevents any further forfeiture. Indeed, if he had been attainted, whereby his blood was corrupted, no pardon, whether it were by the king or by the parliament, could purge his blood without reversal of the attainder, by writ of error, or act of parliament, or express words in the act to restore blood ; but either pardon makes him a new creature, gives him new capacity, and makes him to all intents and purposes, from the time of the pardon, to be 'probus et legalis homo,' and a good witness. Indeed this crime might be objected against his credit ; but it is not to be urged against the sufficiency of his evidence, that is, his being a witness.*

Att. Gen. My lord, we desire he may be sworn. (Which was done.)

Sol. Gen. Now, Mr. Porter, do you give my lord and the jury an account what you know of this intended assassination, how it came to your knowledge, and what share the prisoner at the bar had in it.

Porter. My lord, the first account that I had of this assassination was from Mr. Charnock, who brought to me sir George Barclay and major Holmes to my lodging in Norfolk-street, where I was sick of the gout. Sir George Barclay did not then particularly acquaint me with the business, but said, he would leave it to Mr. Charnock to tell me what it was.

L. C. J. Who told you so?

Porter. Sir George Barclay; and after that we had several meetings, at which the prisoner at the bar was present, particularly at the Globe-tavern in Hatton-Garden, where it was consulted of the best ways and means to assassinate the king as he came from Richmond: some were of opinion that it was best to be done on the other side of the water; others were of opinion that it should be done on this side, by a party of men on horseback: upon this difference of opinion, there were persons appointed to go and view both places; I was appointed for one to go with captain Knightley, and Mr. King went along with me, and we did view the ground on both sides, and when we came back, we gave an account to sir George Barclay, and those that sent us; and upon our report, sir George Barclay's mind was changed, who was for the other side of the water before. And he agreed to do it in the lane that leads from Turnham-Green to Brentford. Afterwards there was a meeting at the Globe-Tavern in Hatton-Garden, and there it was agreed that the king should be attacked on Saturday the 15th of February, by sir George Barclay and his party; and Mr. Rookwood, the prisoner at the bar, was to command a party of men that came over from France, who were to assault the guards on one side, and I and Mr. Charnock were to set upon the guards on the other side. Sir George Barclay, with four men out of each party, was to attack the king in his coach, and to kill him and all that were there in it.

L. C. J. Who were at that meeting?

Porter. There were sir G^t Barclay, capt. Charnock, sir Wm. Parkyns, myself, major Holmes, capt. Rookwood, and capt. King.

* As to the operation of the King's pardon in giving credit, see Mr. Hargrave's very learned Discourse on the effect of the King's Pardon of Perjury, as referred to at vol. 7, pp. 1059. 1090. See, too, Peake's Law of Evidence, ch. 3, s. 2, art. Witnesses restored to Credit by Pardon; and in this Collection the Cases of Reading, vol. 7, p. 296, of Collier, vol. 7, p. 1045, of Lord Castlemaine, vol. 7, p. 1067, and of Crosby, vol. 12, p. 1291.

L. C. J. Where was this?

Porter. At the Globe-Tavern in Hatton-Garden, upon Saturday morning the 15th, we having two orderly men that lay at Kensington to give intelligence, had notice brought us first that the king would go out; Durance, who was one of them, used to go every morning to court to get us what intelligence he could, and sir George Barclay told me upon the Friday, that he should give me an account as soon as ever he could, the next morning; and the next morning at my lodging in Little Ryder-street in St. James's, he came to me, and told me, the advance guards were gone out, and the king's kitchen was gone, and all was preparing for the king's going abroad, and there went a great many noblemen and gentlemen a-horse-back with him, and therefore he thought there would be no opportunity of effecting the thing: Said I, that's no objection at all, nor any reason for putting it off, because when the sport is over, all the company goes away, and the king comes only in his coach with the guards; he said, he would give sir George Barclay an account of it, and he came back with sir George Barclay and Mr. Rookwood to my lodging, and upon repeating that objection, and my giving the same answer, it was agreed, if the king had gone out that day to have put the design in execution.

Att. Gen. Was the prisoner at the bar there at that time when that was agreed upon?

Porter. Yes, he was.

L. C. J. Where do you say was that meeting?

Porter. At my lodging in Little Rider-street.

L. C. J. Had you that discourse with sir George Barclay in the presence of the prisoner?

Porter. Yes; sir George said, he doubted we could not do it, because there would go so many with the king, but I objected against that, that after the sport was over, all the company went away, and the king came back in his coach: then it was agreed to go on; there was sir George Barclay, Durance, and the prisoner at the bar, and myself in the room.

L. C. J. This you say was Saturday the 15th, in the morning?

Porter. Yes, my lord; but I cannot say I saw the prisoner at the bar at any meeting after that.

Att. Gen. Pray, tell my lord and the jury, what method you were to take in putting this design in execution.

Porter. There were to be so many horsemen armed and prepared for that purpose. Sir George Barclay told me, we should be about 40 or 45 horsemen, and they were to be divided into two parties, and sir George Barclay was to have four men out of each party, and his business was to attack the king, and all that were with him in the coach. Captain Rookwood was to command those that were come out of France to serve under sir George Barclay, and captain Charnock and I were to command the other party, and both parties were to set upon the guards at the same time that sir George Barclay attacked the king's coach.

Att. Gen. If the prisoner will ask him any questions, let him.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, captain Porter, when was that first meeting at the Globe-Tavern?

Porter. It was one day in the week before the 15th.

Sir B. Shower. Was Mr. Rookwood, the prisoner at the bar, there that day?

Porter. Yes, he was.

Sir B. Shower. How long before the 15th?

Porter. One day that week, but I cannot tell what day.

Sir B. Shower. He says it was agreed so, and so I desire to know what words Mr. Rookwood uttered at that time?

Porter. It was discoursed by every one round, which was the best way and method. I heard Mr. Rookwood say, indeed, he believed it a very desperate thing, and he was not very willing to engage in it; but when sir George Barclay told him he should command his party, he replied in French—

Sol. Gen. What is the meaning of that?

Porter. There is an end of it.

Att. Gen. You say the prisoner was at your lodging Saturday the 15th, in the morning, What discourse had you there?

Porter. He was there upon Saturday in the morning, the 15th of February, and Durance brought an account that the king's first guards were gone, and the king's kitchen was gone before, and it was expected that the king would go about eleven a clock; but it was said, that there were a great many preparing to go with him, and therefore it would not be convenient to do it that day: Said I, that is no objection at all, for the nobility and gentry go out of the field as soon as the sport is over, and the king used to go with a few people to Mr. — house at Richmond, and therefore it might be as well done at that time as any time: Durance made that objection at first himself; and when I made him that answer, he went to sir George Barclay, and he came back with sir George Barclay, and the prisoner was there by at the same time, and sir George Barclay made the same objection; it was at my lodging in Little Ryder-street, and when I told them my reason against the objection, as I had done before, they all agreed to do it that day.

Mr. Phipps. At that second meeting, did Mr. Rookwood make any proposal there?

Porter. I only say, he came with sir George Barclay, and what I heard; I tell you sir George Barclay made that objection, and I gave it that answer.

Mr. Phipps. But what did he say?

Porter. I cannot say that I heard Mr. Rookwood say any thing in particular; but they all agreed to do the thing that day.

Sir B. Shower. You remember nothing that he said?

Porter. Sir George Barclay said, we will go and prepare; and he went away with him.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, when did sir George Barclay come into England?

Porter. Truly, Sir, I don't know that; the first time that I saw him after he came, Mr. Charnock brought him to my lodging in Norfolk-street; but before that, Mr. Charnock told me he was come into England.

L. C. J. Hark you, Mr. Porter, when you came back from viewing the ground before the first Saturday, and you said you made your report, and then it was agreed that it should be done at such a place; do you say the prisoner was there?

Att. Gen. No, my lord, he does not say so. Do you say Mr. Rookwood was there at that time?—Porter. No, my lord, I do not say so.

Sir B. Shower. I am sure he did not say so before; and besides, your lordship will observe there is no such overt-act as that laid in the indictment against the prisoner, that Mr. Porter made his report upon the view; that only concerns Mr. Knightley.

L. C. J. No, that is not an overt-act, I agree it; but I only ask the question, whether the prisoner was there?

L. C. J. Treby. If it were an overt-act laid in the indictment, it would not affect the prisoner, because the viewing of the ground, and making the report, is captain Porter's act, and it must be the consulting and debating afterwards that must affect the prisoner, if he be concerned.

Mr. Conyers. The meetings and consultations that are laid in the indictment are the overt-acts.

Sol. Gen. Well, if they have done with captain Porter, we desire Mr. George Harris may be sworn.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we beg leave to oppose Mr. Harris's being sworn; here was a proclamation that did take notice of this barbarous conspiracy to assassinate the king, and the proclamation did signify, That the king had received information of several persons concerned in that conspiracy; and for the encouragement of taking those so accused, he did promise a thousand pounds reward for the taking of any of the conspirators; and in the conclusion of the proclamation there is a clause, 'That if any of the conspirators should discover or apprehend any of the other persons that were therein named, so as that they should be brought to condign punishment, such conspirator so discovering should receive a thousand pounds reward for any of the other persons apprehended, and his own pardon.' My lord, we have a witness here ready to prove that this was Mr. Harris's case; he was himself in the proclamation, he did actually discover Mr. Rookwood, the prisoner at the bar, and was instrumental in the taking of him; and consequently upon this clause of the proclamation, if he be brought to justice, then is Mr. Harris intitled to this reward and his pardon; and consequently he has such an interest and advantage to himself as will prevent his being a witness. It is true, indeed, where it is at the king's suit, in a capital case, it is pretty hard to say that a man has an interest; but we think, as this case is circumstantiated upon this proclamation, that the same objection lies against him as would do if this were a civil cause; if we shew how he is to have an advantage by the event of this cause, then he is not to be admitted a witness.

L. C. J. Did he apprehend any body upon the proclamation?

Sir B. Shower. Yes; he apprehended Mr. Rookwood himself, or was the cause of it, and thereby is intitled to the reward and his pardon.

Mr. Phipps. That upon which we ground our objection is the different penning of the proclamation; for if any one that is not a conspirator do but discover and apprehend any of the persons named in the proclamation, he is intitled to the thousand pounds; but the conspirators themselves must go further; for a bare discovery and apprehending any of their accomplices will not entitle them to the reward mentioned in the proclamation, but they must discover and apprehend their accomplices so as they be brought to justice, before they can be entitled to the reward: And to be brought to justice for any crime, is in common understanding to be brought to such punishment as the law inflicts for the offence. Now, Mr. Harris's case is this: He discovered Mr. Rookwood, and went with the guards to the Compter and seized him: And if Mr. Rookwood ben't convicted, Mr. Harris is not to have any thing for his pains; but if he be convicted, Mr. Harris is intitled to the thousand pounds and his pardon. And therefore, surely, Mr. Harris cannot be admitted an evidence against Mr. Rookwood, since he is to receive so great a benefit by his conviction. Upon an indictment for an usurious contract, the person whose deed it is cannot be a witness, because it is to avoid his own act: So in an indictment for perjury, on the stat. 5 Eliz. the party injured by the perjury cannot be a witness, because he is to have half the forfeitures.

Att. Gen. I suppose they will make out their objection before they expect an answer from us.

Sir B. Shower. I hope your lordship will not put us to prove a copy of the proclamation from the inrolment, but that we may have the same favour as in the case of the statute book, that the print of it may be allowed for evidence.

Att. Gen. My lord, we will not stand with them for that, we know they are mistaken throughout, we consent the proclamation should be read.

Cl. of Arr. reads:

By the King a Proclamation.

WILLIAM R.

Whereas his majesty has received information upon oath, that the persons herein named have, with divers other wicked and notorious persons, entered into a horrid and detestable conspiracy to assassinate and murder his majesty's sacred person, for which cause several warrants for high treason have been issued out against them, but they have withdrawn themselves from their usual places of abode, and are fled from justice: His majesty has therefore thought fit, by the advice of his privy council, to issue his royal proclamation, and his majesty doth hereby command and require all his loving subjects to discover, take, and apprehend James duke of Berwick, sir George Barclay, major Lowick, George Porter, capt. Stow, capt. Walbank, capt. James Courtney, lieutenant Sherborne, Brice Blair, Dinant, Chambers, Boise, George Higgins, and his two brothers, sons to sir Thomas Higgins, Davis Cardell, Goodman, Cramburne, Keyes, Pendergrass, Bryerly, Trevor, sir George Maxwell, Durance, a Flemming, Christopher Knightly, lieutenant King, Holmes, sir William Parkyns, Rookwood, wherever they may be found, and to carry them before the next justice of peace or chief magistrate, who is hereby required to commit them to the next gaol, there to remain until they be thence delivered by due course of law. And his majesty doth hereby require the said justice, or other magistrate, immediately to give notice thereof to him or his privy council. And for the prevention of the going of the said persons, or of any other, into Ireland, or other parts beyond the seas, his majesty does require and command all his officers of the customs, and other his officers and subjects of and in the respective courts and maritime towns and places within his kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, that they and every of them, in their respective stations and places, be careful and diligent in the examination of all persons who shall pass or endeavour to pass beyond the seas, and that they do not permit any person whatsoever to go into Ireland, or other places beyond the seas, without a pass under his majesty's royal sign manual until further order. And if they shall discover the said persons above-named, or any of them, then to cause them to be apprehended and secured, and to give notice as aforesaid. And his majesty does hereby publish and declare to all persons who shall conceal the persons above-named, or any of them, or be aiding and assisting in the concealing of them, or furthering their escape, that they shall be proceeded against, for such their offence, with the utmost severity, according to law. And for the encouragement of all persons to be diligent and careful in endeavouring to discover and apprehend the said persons, we do hereby further declare, that whosoever shall discover and apprehend the persons above-named, or any of them, and shall bring them before some justice of peace, or chief magistrate, as aforesaid, shall have

'and receive as a reward the sum of one thousand pound; which said sum of one thousand pound, the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury are hereby required and directed to pay accordingly. And if any of the persons above-named shall discover and apprehend any of their accomplices, so as they may be brought to justice, his majesty does hereby declare, that every person making such discovery shall have his majesty's gracious pardon for his offence, and shall receive the reward of one thousand pound, to be paid in such manner as aforesaid.

'Given at our court at Kensington, the 23d day of February, 1695-6, in the eighth year of our reign. GOD SAVE THE KING.'

Mr. Phipps. My lord, the different penning of the clauses is not only in that proclamation, but it is the language of every proclamation that has gone out for the apprehending any of the conspirators.

Att. Gen. My lord, all that we say in answer to this objection, is, That Mr. Harris is not named in that proclamation.

L. C. J. What say you to that, sir Bartholomew Shower? He is not named in the proclamation: and so if he hath discovered and apprehended the prisoner, he has earned his money, whether he be convicted or not, because Rookwood's name is in the proclamation, tho' his is not.

Mr. Phipps. Then, my lord, with humble submission, here is another proclamation where in he is named; we desire that may be read.

Sol. Gen. And when it is read, it will be as little to your purpose as the other.

Att. Gen. Let them read what they please, we need say nothing at all to it.

L. C. J. Certainly, upon this proclamation there is no objection; for he is intitled to his 1,000*l.* already, though Rookwood be never convicted.

Mr. Phipps. But is he not by this proclamation, which mentions his accomplices, intitled to his pardon? If so, he swears to secure himself.

L. C. J. By the apprehending and discovering, he is intitled to his pardon.

Mr. Phipps. But not without he be brought to justice; that is to say, till he be convicted; therefore he cannot be an evidence to convict him.

L. C. J. That is, as to any that are there named, if any of them discover and apprehend one another, it must be so as that they be brought to justice: but if any person that is not named there does apprehend any that is, he is intitled to the 1,000*l.* barely by the apprehension.

Mr. Phipps. Then there is another proclamation where they are both named, as Mr. Rookwood tells me.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we will set this matter right; we will show the other proclamation, in which, if I am rightly informed, for I have not read it, Mr. Harris is named.

Att. Gen. If you have not read it, I would advise you not to trouble the court with it; for you will find the latter part is restrained to three or four particular persons, of which he is none.

Rookwood. I am named in the proclamation.

Att. Gen. Aye, but read the latter part of it, and you will find you are not named in the clause that they referred to: you need not read the former part of the proclamation, we agree the prisoner is named there, but only look towards the bottom, which is the clause that they refer to.

Cl. of Ar. (reads). 'And we do hereby further declare,' &c.

Att. Gen. They have not considered the proclamation, and therefore make an objection of they do not know what.

Sir B. Shower. We are in your lordship's judgment.

L. C. J. For what? See if you can make or state a case for our judgment.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Rookwood is mentioned in the first proclamation, and Harris is not: but there are the word accomplices: he is likewise mentioned in the last proclamation, but not in the last clause of it. I confess, if he had, it had been plain it would have taken off his testimony; but now we must submit it to you, whether he is not an interested person, and consequently no good witness.

L. C. J. Truly I do not see any colour for the objection. Is he not as well intitled to his 1,000*l.* though Mr. Rookwood had never been try'd, by the bare apprehending of Mr. Rookwood, as if he was convicted?

Sir B. Shower. No, my lord; because the words are, so as he may be brought to justice.

L. C. J. That is not so, as to any person that apprehends one mentioned in the proclamation, if the person that apprehends be not mentioned in it, and named himself; if any one that is not mentioned apprehend one that is mentioned, he is intitled, by the apprehension, to the 1,000*l.* If any one that is mentioned apprehend another, then he is to bring him to justice; now Mr. Harris is not named in this proclamation, and so as to the 1,000*l.* he stands in the same condition as any other person that discovered or apprehended one of the persons there named.

Sir B. Shower. But it seems he was one of the conspirators, because he is himself described in another proclamation.*

Att. Gen. If it were so, it would not be material, nor any manner of objection; but as they have made their objection upon these proclamations, we think there is nothing for us to give an answer to.

Mr. Cowper. Nay, my lord, if it were so, will sir Bartholomew Shower say his client is not brought to justice unless he be convicted? I am sure the words 'convicted' or 'attainted,' are not in the proclamation.

* As to the admitting the testimony of a Particeps Criminis, see Howard v. Shipley, 4 East, 180; and see 4 East, 354, 356.

L. C. J. There is nothing in it: you must swear Mr. Harris. [Which was done accordingly.]

Sol. Gen. Will you give an account to my lord and the jury, what you know of this conspiracy against the king's life, from the first time you were acquainted with it, and what band the prisoner at the bar had in it.

Att. Gen. Pray give an account of the whole thing, your coming over, and who sent you, and upon what errand, and the whole that you know of this conspiracy.

Capt. Harris. Upon the 14th of January last, the French Stile, N. S. I was at St. Germain, where I was sent for by king James, and was ordered to wait his dinner till it was over, and accordingly I did wait till his dinner was over; and then I came in, and col. Parker was with him, and one Mr. Hare, who is also mentioned in the proclamation, was there also: the king told me he was sensible I had served him well, and now he had an opportunity of doing something for me; he told me he would send me into England, where I should be subsisted, and I was to follow the orders of sir George Barclay; and accordingly he ordered me ten lewidores to be paid by Mr. Caroll, who is secretary to the late queen; and colonel Parker went along with me, and Mr. Hare, to Caroll, and told him he came from the king, and we had the lewidores, and we went to Calais, in order to our coming over hither: But we were told if we were wind-bound, that the money we received would not bear our charges; there was orders given for our further subsistence at Calais, to the president there. Accordingly we came to Calais, and the wind did not serve us for eight or nine days; and while I stayed there, the money that I spent at Calais was paid by the president of Calais, Monsieur Latour. Afterwards I landed in England, near Romney marsh, as I was told, and I came to the house of one Hunt, and he provided me and my comrade with a couple of horses; and coming from thence, I came in the first place to one Tucker's an apothecary in Sandway, and next from thence we came to Rochester, to Charles Croft's, and from thence in a coach to Gravesend, and from thence by water to London: That night we lay in Grace-Church-street at an inn, it being night, the night-tide, and something late. The next day I came to a lodging at an acquaintance's of my comrade's, Mr. Hare, at the Unicorn in Brownlow-street, one Mr. Watenan's. The next night I went to look for sir George Barclay, whom the king told me I should certainly find by such a sign of a white handkerchief hanging out of his pocket, on Mondays and Thursdays, in Covent Garden, where his walk was to be in the evening, because he was not to appear in the day-time openly. It happened that upon Monday night after I came to town, I went there, and did not find sir George Barclay according to the king's direction, which I admired at; but there was one Mr. Berkenhead, who told my comrade, a day or two after. That sir George Barclay would needs speak with me, and accordingly I met with him; and he asked me how the king, queen, prince, and princess did, and I told him they were very well; I told him I was appointed to attend him, and obey his orders. He told me he had no money at present, but in two or three days he would send some; and so he did, by major Holmes. I had five shillings a day for subsistence, and I had no horse; and when I had a horse, it was six shillings a day; after which rate I had subsistence for a month at five shillings a day, guineas going then at thirty shillings. Major Holmes paid me the money by sir George Barclay's order, as he told me, and he afterwards gave me a guinea, and that was the first Saturday when the assassination was designed; for that we told him we wanted money, and it was not reasonable we should take our horses out of the stable before we paid for them: And I met sir George Barclay several times at Covent Garden, and he told me it was a suspicious place, and desired me not to come any more there; but when he had any particular orders to give me, he would give me notice of it where I should meet him; and accordingly I did meet him several times.

Att. Gen. Now, Sir, will you tell what you know as to the prisoner at the bar?

Harris. As to Mr. Rookwood, the Saturday that the assassination was designed to be, the first time that I knew of it, I met Mr. Rookwood, at one Mr. Burck's lodging, where he was up, and I saw him in a great hurry and some consternation, and in came M. Bernarde; I asked him the meaning of it, and what they were going about; and Mr. Rookwood told me, if I would go down to captain Counter I should know; accordingly I went, and to the best of my remembrance, he gave me a little note to captain Counter, but that I am not positive in. I went to captain Counter, and as soon as ever I came, he told us, we must be immediately ready to go to Turnham Green.

Att. Gen. Where was that?

Harris. At the Woolpack, that was the sign — as near as I remember. Mr. Hare and I were ordered together to come there, and there was Mr. Hungate, who had been there some time, and when I came in, sir George Barclay did declare laughing, 'These are my janissaries.' And he talked something of bringing the garter, and of attacking the coach; but he went out of the room, and afterwards he came in and declared, 'We are all men of honour, and that the business we were going about, was to attack the prince of Orange;' but Durant came in after that, and said, 'The prince of Orange did not go out that day.' When he talked of attacking the prince of Orange, I was very much startled, not knowing any thing of it before; and I came the next morning to Mr. Rookwood, and asked him if we were to be the murderers of the prince of Orange: Says Mr. Rookwood to me, 'I am afraid we are drawn into some such business; but if I had known it before I came over, I 'should have begged the king's pardon at St. Germain's, and not have come over hither: and said I, 'This is very fine, we have served to a very good purpose, to be sent over upon such an errand and account.' After this Mr. Rookwood, and Mr. Lowick, and I, had a meeting at Red Lyon fields, where we did discourse about the matter. I did often declare against it, that it was so barbarous a thing, that no man of honour almost would be guilty of it; but major Lowick answered, That we were to obey orders; for sure sir George Barclay would not undertake a thing of that nature without orders.

Att. Gen. Pray what said Mr. Rookwood?

Harris. He owned it was a barbarous thing; but he was sent over to obey sir George Barclay's orders, which he had several times declared he was resolved to do; upon that we parted: So afterwards I came to Mr. Rookwood's lodging; it was the Saturday morning I came to him, and so went to sir George Barclay's; while he was there, Mr. Rookwood gave me a note, naming so many names, particularly Mr. Hungate, Mr. Hanford, Mr. Hare, and his own name at top, not the name that he is arraigned by here; but a sham name that he had, as the rest of us all had sham names, which at that time we went by.

L. C. J. What was your name?

Harris. My name is Jenkins.

L. C. J. Who gave you that name?

Harris. King James at St. Germain's, and he gave Mr. Hare the name of Guiney, and Mr. Rookwood's name was Roberts. King James told us in his bed chamber, we were to go by those names.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, what did Rookwood say to you, when he gave you that list?

Harris. He told me, he was to go to Turnham green, and I was to go along with him, and says he to me smiling, 'You shall be my aid de camp; and get the rest of the gentlemen ready;' and accordingly I went to look for several of the persons—particularly for Mr. Blackburne: when I came back again, I found him lying on his bed, and that sir George Barclay had told him the prince of Orange did not go out that day; and from thence we went to dinner, where major Lowick dined with us, and Mr. Bernarde and major Lowick seeing me in a heat, asked me, Why I was in such a sweat? I told him I were getting those men ready for Mr. Rookwood, who had made me his aid de camp: says major Lowick to me, You may very well do it, for you have six shillings a-day allowed you, and I have nothing; I bring two men at my own charge. Said I, Major Lowick, I wonder you do not apply yourself to sir George Barclay, and then, I believe, you may be subsisted too. He answered me, He did not think it worth the while to trouble him, since he had never spoke to him of it before: and Rookwood, and Bernarde, and Lowick, and myself, several times met in Red-Lyon-fields, and talked of attacking the prince of Orange.

Att. Gen. Who did?

Harris. Rookwood, Bernarde, Lowick and myself.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, let me ask you one question. Where was your horse at first?

Harris. At first it was at my lord Feversham's stables, as they told me, in Somerset-House.

Att. Gen. Where were the other persons horses?

Harris. There was Mr. Hungate's and Mr. Hare's horses in the same place, at the same time, as they told me.

Att. Gen. How came you by your horse there?

Harris. Major Holmes did deliver my horse and committed it to my care, and I carried it thence to another place.

Att. Gen. Did you observe there was any more horses there?

Harris. I believe there was five or six, as near as I can guess.

Att. Gen. Do you know where Rookwood was to have his horse?

Harris. He had a horse; but whence he had it I do not know.

Att. Gen. Had you any arms delivered you?

Harris. Yes, I had by capt. Counter.

Mr. Conyers. Were you at no other place together that Saturday night, the 22d of February, because you say you dined together?

Harris. Yes, we were at the Bear tavern.

Mr. Conyers. What discourse passed between you there?

Harris. They were talking about the assassination; but what any particular person said, I cannot tell.

Mr. Conyers. Pray who were there?

Harris. There was Mr. Knightly, captain Rookwood, and Mr. King; and Knightly went out, and came in again, and declared, we must have a great deal of care of ourselves or we should be taken up: and he whispered at first, and afterwards I asked him what it was; and he told me, and said, 'We must have a care of ourselves.' Says Mr. King, staring this way with his eyes, 'Surely God Almighty is on our side;' and so we parted.

L. C. J. When was this?

Harris. This was the night of Saturday the 22d, when it was discovered; for some of them were taken up the next day.

Att. Gen. Was Rookwood there at that time at the Bear tavern?

Harris. I cannot positively say whether he was or not.

Att. Gen. What discourse had you there?

Harris. We talked of assassinating the king; but what it was in particular, I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Was Rookwood there?

Harris. Yes, I believe he was; but I cannot positively say.

L. C. J. You say it was the last Saturday that the king was to go abroad, that you apprehended you were discovered?

Harris. Yes, we apprehended we were discovered before that; for Mr. Lowick told me that three or four days before, in that week, that his name, and one Harrison's, were given into the council, and another, and another, two or three of them, as he told me; I think three or four; and upon that account major Lowick went from his lodging, and did not lie at his lodging the night before; and I came to major Lowick, and he told me the same thing at the King's-arms tavern.

Att. Gen. Can you remember what discourse you had that Saturday night?

Mr. Cowper. You say that on Saturday the 22d, Mr. Rookwood gave you the list.

Harris. I do not say it was the 22d, for I cannot swear to the day of the month; but it was the second Saturday that we were to have gone about this business.

Mr. Cowper. You say he gave you a list of names: pray when he gave you that list, what discourse happened in the room just before, or after the giving of the list?

Harris. Sir, I think I told the court that before.

Mr. Cowper. Sir, I desire you would repeat it.

Harris. My lord, I humbly desire to know whether I am to answer that gentleman that question?

L. C. J. Yes, you are to answer, being upon your oath, and to tell the whole truth.

Mr. Cowper. I asked him the question so fairly, what discourse introduced the giving of the list, and what followed upon it, that I perceive this gentleman does not know which side I am of.

Harris. Mr. Rookwood said we were to go to Turnham green; and he told me, that I was to be one of his party, that we were to attack the Prince of Orange.

L. C. J. You say you were to be one of his party; pray was it there that he told you, you should be his aid de camp?

Harris. Yes, he did tell me I was to be his aid de camp.

Mr. Phipps. Whose hand writing was that list?

Harris. I cannot tell, I had it from that gentleman.

Mr. Phipps. But whose writing was it?

Harris. Indeed I know not his hand-writing, and therefore cannot tell whose it was: he is for his life, but I believe he cannot deny any thing that I have said, I suppose not: I should be very sorry to accuse Mr. Rookwood of any thing that was not true.

Mr. Phipps. Pray whose names were in that list?

Harris. I have mentioned Mr. Hare, Mr. Hanford, Mr. Blackburne, myself, and you, Mr. Rookwood, had your own name at top.

Rookwood. What is that Blackburne?

Harris. He is a Lancashire man.

Rookwood. It is a very strange thing I should give you a list with a man's name that I do not know; I declare it, I know no such person.

Harris. Mr. Rookwood, I believe you are very sensible I do not accuse you of any thing that is not true.

Mr. Phipps. When did you see that list last?

Harris. He gave it into my hands, and had it from me again, or I threw it away afterwards.

Rookwood. But you that were to be an evidence ought to have kept it to justify your evidence.

Harris. Truly I did not intend to have been an evidence at that time.

Att. Gen. If they will ask him any questions, let them.

Sir B. Shower. No, indeed, I will ask him no questions.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we have another piece of evidence which we would offer to your lordship, which is not direct evidence against the prisoner, but only to prove a circumstance or two of what has already been sworn: we do acknowledge, my lord, it does not affect Mr. Rookwood, but only to strengthen and confirm what they have sworn.

Sir B. Shower. With submission, we hope it will not be evidence fit to be given as to the prisoner at all; for because a man may swear true in the particular circumstance of a thing, that therefore he swears true what he swears against the prisoner, I think is no consequence in the world.

L. C. J. It is a thing distinct and foreign to the matter, as to Mr. Rookwood.

Att. Gen. My lord, we do not say it directly affects Mr. Rookwood; but when your lordship has heard it, we shall submit it to you, how far it confirms even the evidence given against him.

Mr. Conyers. My lord, we say the prisoner was to have his horse from Somerset-house; and that there were horses placed there for that purpose we are going to prove.

Att. Gen. My lord, it is one entire conspiracy, in which every one had his part; one was to have his horses and his party in one place, and another in another: Now that there were at such time such horses at Somerset-house, and those horses were delivered out from Somerset-house, is certainly a confirmation of the truth of what the witnesses have said.

L. C. J. It is so. If that be it you offer, it is very material.

Mr. Conyers. We shall prove, That upon the disappointment on the first Saturday, the 15th of February, they were to be ready against the 22d; and you will hear how the horses were disposed of in the mean time. Call Chamberlain, Maskel, and Allen.

Att. Gen. Call any of them, I believe it is enough.

(Mr. Chamberlain appeared and was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray will you give my lord and the jury an account what you know of any horses that were brought to Somerset-house about February last, and how long they stayed there?

Chamberlain. There was six horses.

Att. Gen. Who brought them in?

Chamberlain. They were sent in by some persons in Mr. Lewis's name.

Att. Gen. Had you any direction to take care of them?

Chamberlain. Mr. Lewis sent in a note to take care of them for a night or two.

Att. Gen. Who carried them away?

Chamberlain. I cannot tell: some people came to see them that I never saw before, and they took care of them; I know not who they were, and I never saw them since.

Att. Gen. What time was it that they came for them?

Chamberlain. It was about the middle of the day.

Att. Gen. What month was it in?

Chamberlain. I think it was much about the latter end of February, to the best of my remembrance.

Att. Gen. How long was it before the plot was discovered?

Chamberlain. It was about a week, or a small matter, before the plot was discovered, to the best of my knowledge.

Att. Gen. How long staid the horses there at Somerset-house?

Chamberlain. Three of them staid a night or two; but the other three of them about a matter of a week or ten days.

Att. Gen. Who owned those horses?

Chamberlain. They were sent in in Mr. Lewis's name; but who owned them I cannot tell indeed.

Mr. Conyers. Then swear John Allen. [Who was sworn.] Pray tell my lords and the jury what you know concerning any horses about the time of the breaking out of the plot.

Att. Gen. We mean in Somerset-house stable.

Allen. There was seven horses came in.

Mr. Conyers. Who brought them?

Allen. There was six in the first place; one came in afterwards in the evening.

Mr. Conyers. By whose order were they brought there?

Allen. By Mr. Lewis's order.

Att. Gen. How long did they stay there?

Allen. Some of them staid there several days; three of them went away the next day, as I think.

Mr. Conyers. Do you remember about what time those horses were brought thither?

Allen. They were brought there, I believe, about seven or eight days before the plot broke out.

Att. Gen. My lord, we only call these witnesses to confirm the testimony of the others, that there were such horses there at that time, and for the present we rest it here.

L. C. J. Then, gentlemen, what say you to it for the prisoner?

Sir B. Shower. If your lordship please, we are of counsel for the prisoner; and that which we are to insist upon, is this, which we submit to your lordships' judgment: In the first place, whether here be two witnesses against the prisoner to prove this treason, according to the statute of Edw. 6, which requires two witnesses in High-treason, and lawful ones; but that in the first place we say, there are not two witnesses at all, at least not to any overt-act that is laid in this indictment. As to what captain Porter says of what passed between him and Durance, the dialogue between them where Rookwood was present, we are in your lordship's direction; and we doubt not but the jury will take it into their consideration, how far that affects the prisoner; that he shall not be concerned in any transaction between Mr. Porter and any other persons; none of their declarations, none of their treasonable practices, can be imputed to or affect him in any way whatsoever. Now all that captain Porter says of Mr. Rookwood is, that he was once at the Globe tavern, and there was a discourse about this matter; and then he tells your lordship of a dialogue between him and Durance, and an account of what passed between them; but he does not say any thing of Mr. Rookwood being any ways concerned in the matter, but only that he dropped this expression, it was a desperate adventure, a dangerous enterprise, and he seemed against it; but in the end he concluded with something in French, which what they are, and what they mean, we must submit to your lordship and the jury; he interprets it, when sir George Bareley said he must have a share in it, then Rookwood replied, There is an end of it. But there is not one word of agreement sworn to, that Mr. Rookwood spoke to shew his consent. There is but one time more that Mr. Porter swears to, about the prisoner at the bar, and that is, at his lodgings in Little-Rider-street; for as to the other consults, Mr. Rookwood was not present there; It seems there was a discourse about the affair, but that Rookwood said nothing, but went away; there was not so much as the least intimation of an agreement to any such design, or approbation of what was agitated in the company; and we insist upon it as to this in point of law, that it amounts to no more than misprision of treason at most. My lord, I will not now contend about notions, nor will I argue whether consulting and agreeing be evidence of an overt-act; I submit to your lordship's directions, notwithstanding the variety and difference of opinions that have been.

L. C. J. Sir Bartholomew Shower, I know not what variety of opinions you mean; there have been some discourses in pamphlets, I agree; but it was always taken and held for law, that consulting and agreeing was an overt-act.

Sir B. Shower. Here is no evidence of any agreement.

L. C. J. Pray let us hear what you say to that.

Sir B. Shower. It is not the being present where traitors do consult and conspire the death of the king, unless they actually agree; nor is it evidence sufficient to guide or prevail upon a jury's conscience to affirm upon their oaths, that such a one is guilty of high treason, because such a one was there, and said nothing at all; for the not discovering afterwards, nor detecting, is no evidence at all against Mr. Rookwood. As to Mr. Harris, he gives you an account of a great deal that does not affect Mr. Rookwood, neither all that passed at St. Germain's, nor in their journey into England; for all that may be true, and yet the prisoner no way concerned in it. As to what he affirms of the prisoner, we shall submit it to your consideration: what it amounts to, and all that his deposition comes up to, is, that Mr. Rookwood complained that he was to obey implicitly sir George Barclay's orders; and Harris gives an account but of one particular time that Mr. Rookwood undertook, or did agree to be concerned in this matter; it was but once, and that was, when he gave him the note of those that were to go to Turnham-Green, and that he was to be his aid-de-camp: and as to that, we shall give you an account by witnesses whom we shall call, that these two witnesses ought not to be believed as to what they have sworn, though they do not come up to make two witnesses according to law upon this indictment. What they have said as to this man, is not credible, though they may speak true as to others; and no doubt there was a barbarous conspiracy; it appears there was such, beyond all exception and contradiction; and the persons that have been condemned as conspirators have acknowledged it: but, my lord, that which is now before your lordship and the jury is, to enquire whether the prisoner is concerned in this affair at all, and how far; and we hope the jury will be of opinion he is not concerned. The heinousness of the crime, and the aggravations of it, being to be abhorred by all mankind, we think ought not to sway with the jury, nor influence their judgments to believe a witness ever the sooner in accusing any other person; it ought rather to have a contrary allay; for the greater the crime is, and the farther off from having any tolerable opinion in the world, they ought to expect the greater proof; and no one is to be presumed guilty of such an act, without very sufficient evidence of it; and the greater the crime, the proof ought to be the more positive and undeniable. It is not their being plainly positive that is sufficient, but whether it is such that is good in law; and about that we are sure your lordship will give true directions in point of law: and whether the witnesses be credible or no, must be submitted and left to the jury, after we have called some witnesses, who will give you an account of their reputation.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, we humbly insist there are not two witnesses, such as the law requires, to prove the charge upon this indictment against the prisoner: the two overt acts that touch Mr. Rookwood are, first, consulting and agreeing how to kill the king; the other is, the finding arms and horses for that purpose.

But as to this latter, the finding arms and horses, there is not one evidence that comes up to it: and as to the former, the consultations, whether there be sufficient evidence that comes up to that, is very much a question with us; but we say, with submission, there are not two witnesses in that case; for Mr. Porter says only what he was told by sir George Barclay, that sir George proposed this matter; but withal he tells you, that when sir George Barclay proposed it, and Mr. Rookwood was informed what the design was, he was so far from conspiring, consulting, or agreeing to do it, that he said it was a barbarous act, and he recoiled at it. Then at last says sir George Barclay, 'You must command a party.'

L. C. J. Well, and what said Rookwood then?

Mr. Phipps. Porter says, he then said, there is an end of it. Now, my lord, what evidence is this of a consultation and agreement? And this is all that Porter says. As to what Mr. Harris says, we are to consider whether the list given to him be an overt-act; and there the point in question is, whether that list can be given in evidence against Mr. Rookwood, upon this late act of parliament, as an overt-act, it not being laid in the indictment? There is indeed an overt-act of a list laid in the indictment, as given to Cranburne, but none as given to Mr. Rookwood.

L. C. J. Pray take the evidence right: first, what will you make an overt-act? What do you think when there is a debate among divers persons about killing the king?

Sir B. Shower. With submission, that will be no overt-act, if there be a debate of such a matter, though he be present.

L. C. J. Aye; but when there is a consult, and upon debate a resolution is formed, and though he does at first dislike it; yet when he is told he must command a party, he says he is content, or there is an end of it—What do you make of that?

Sir B. Shower. He said he did not like it; it was a barbarous, desperate design.

L. C. J. It is true; but when sir George Barclay said he should command a party, he acquiesced, and said there was an end of it. There was a discourse about cutting off the king, and that was agreed upon in the company at that time; and though at first he did not like it, yet he might afterwards agree to it.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, that is it which we deny; we say there is no proof of his agreement to it.

L. C. J. Captain Porter says, he did declare that he said he looked upon it as a desperate design, and was averse from being engaged in it, but afterwards did agree to it: whether is not that such an overt-act as is laid in the indictment?

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we must beg leave for the prisoner in a case of this nature, that it may be recollected what the evidence did say. Mr. Porter did not take upon him to affirm Mr. Rookwood consented to it, but only

'There was an end of it.' Now we must leave that to the jury, what they can make of such a doubtful expression.

L. C. J. Call Mr. Porter in again.

Mr. Conyers. My lord, the first meeting Mr. Porter speaks of, where the prisoner, Mr. Rookwood, was, is at the Globe tavern, where this discourse was; the next meeting that he speaks of was on the Friday night before the first Saturday when the business was to be done; and afterwards he met at Porter's lodgings, on Saturday morning, in Rider-street.

(Then Capt. Porter came in again.)

L. C. J. Hark ye, Mr. Porter, the first time that this matter was proposed, when Mr. Rookwood was present, you say was at the Globe tavern?—Porter. Yes, my lord, it was.

L. C. J. And you say he disliked it, and did not care to be concerned in it?

Porter. Yes, my lord, he did so.

L. C. J. Well, what said sir Geo. Barclay?

Porter. Sir George Barclay said, he ought to obey his orders, for he had such a commission for such a thing, and he drew out a scheme how it was to be done; and when sir George Barclay told Mr. Rookwood he should command his party, he replied in French, 'There's an end of it.'

L. C. J. This was at the Globe tavern, was it not?—Porter. Yes, my lord, it was.

Att. Gen. Pray then, capt. Porter, let me ask you another question: Was he afterwards with you at any other meeting, and when and where?

Porter. He was with me upon Saturday the 15th, at my lodging in Little Rider-street, where was sir George Barclay and others.

Att. Gen. What discourse happened then, I pray?

Porter. They did there discourse the whole matter, and sir George Barclay was not for going at that time, because there was so many people that went with the king, that there would not be a good opportunity to effect the design: but I told him they would go off after the hunting was over, and so it was agreed upon to go on with the undertaking.

Att. Gen. Pray, at that time did Mr. Rookwood pretend to dislike the affair, or refuse to be any way at all concerned in it?

Porter. No, my lord, I cannot remember that he spoke one word.

L. C. J. Was Mr. Rookwood there?

Porter. Yes, there was Mr. Rookwood, sir George Barclay, and Mr. Durance.

Att. Gen. And had you discourse, at that time about this business?

Porter. Yes, my lord; there was that objection made of so many people going with the king, and I made that answer that I tell you.

L. C. J. Why, then, suppose at the Globe tavern such an expression had not dropt from the prisoner, but a man is present at two consultations that are held about the death of the king, but says nothing either at the first or second, what would you make of that case?

Sir. B. Shower. My lord, I confess this is a case of a very barbarous nature, of which I hope my client will acquit himself: but I think we have the authority of parliament on our side, that this does not amount to a proof of treason. It seems they lay a stress upon this, that Mr. Rookwood came to captain Porter's lodgings on the Saturday morning the 15th: but then take the case as it is; for aught that does appear upon the proof, he knows not upon what account the meeting is, beforehand. I think that is the case of my lord Russel, upon which the reversal of his attainder went, that the evidence came short, and that it was but misprision; for the evidence was, that he was present at the supposed declaration's reading, but said nothing at all to it.

L. C. J. But I speak of two meetings; there was but one.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, I do not know whether there were two meetings or one then: but this is the ground we go upon, there ought to be two witnesses; and if there be two meetings upon such a design, the second may be as accidental, and it does not appear to be a designed meeting; and there was no appointment of Mr. Rookwood to be there, nor any negotiation by way of message or otherwise, to that purpose. Is this, my lord, an overt-act? Suppose a man be present at a consult about treasonable practices, and he uses words that are indifferent, it is true, in the case of a wager it amounts to an assent, but it hardly will come to that when people meet by accident, or for they do not know what.

L. C. J. How is this by accident?

Sir B. Shower. It does not appear that it was by design or appointment.

L. C. J. They were acquaintance.

Sir B. Shower. He had no acquaintance with him but in sir George Barclay's company.

L. C. J. But, besides, there was an express consent at the Globe tavern, when Rookwood said, 'There is an end of it.'

Sir B. Shower. That is as much as to say, I will not do it, I will not go with you—

Sol. Gen. Sir George Barclay was the person whom they were to obey; and Harris tells you he told them what they were to do, and six horses were first placed, and three of them afterwards removed.

Sir B. Shower. That will not affect him what sir George Barclay said, any more than Lewis's appointing of the horses.

L. C. J. Then here is another thing, Why did he give a list to Mr. Harris? The list that was given had Mr. Rookwood's name at top, as he was to command the party, and there was Harris's name and Hare's name as of his party; that is, their feigned names: Mr. Rookwood's feigned name was Roberts, that was at top, and they were to go to Tunham-Green, and Rookwood told Harris he should be his aid-de-camp.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, for that I think we have a point of law, that we apprehend will turn off all that evidence, and sure we may—take that exception now. The words of the act are, 'That no evidence shall be given of any overt-act that is not expressly laid in the indictment.' Now cannot I shew upon this indictment, that there is an overt-act in such a positive direct manner as they now urge about this list? Will not that satisfy your lordship's judgment to set aside all this evidence? To make the indictment good for treason, there ought to be a compassing of the death of the king laid, and an overt-act laid declaring that compassing; but no evidence is to be given of any overt-act that is not laid in the indictment.

L. C. J. You are not to take exceptions to the indictment now, but only to the evidence.

Sir B. Shower. I have this one exception more; there is never a 'Quodque,' nor a 'Juraiores ulterius presentant.'

L. C. J. There does not need; but that is a fault, if any, in the indictment, and is not to be stirred now.

Sir B. Shower. If there be not a presentment by the jury, then there is no overt-act alleged; and if there be no overt-act alleged, or no such overt-act, then we are within the words of the act, 'That no evidence shall be given of any such overt-act but what is alleged; and it is, if not expressly alleged, as if it were not alleged at all.' Now here it is very loose, ' &c. 'Judem Christophorus Knightley,' and so, it goes on with the rest, did so and so. There is a presentment at first, that they did compass and imagine the death of the king; and then the indictment comes farther, and says, that forty men should do this business, and of those forty these four should be some; and then the 'Judem' bought horses and arms, and so it must go to the last antecedent, and then there is no express alleging of any overt-act; and then it is as if no overt-act at all was alleged.

L. C. J. This exception is not to the evidence, but to the indictment: it begins 'Juraiores presentant quod;' Does not that relate to all?

Sir B. Shower. No, my lord; and I can tell you a reason why not: if it be not so well alleged as it should be, it is an indictment as if it were never alleged at all; and so within the words of the act of parliament this is not an overt-act alleged, and therefore they cannot give evidence upon it.

Sol. Gen. Truly, my lord, I cannot imagine what they are doing, they are moving in arrest of judgment before a verdict given: they say the overt-act is not expressly laid; Is that an exception to the evidence, or to the indictment?

Sir B. Shower. If my lord will please to give us the liberty, we would shew there can be no verdict given upon this indictment.

L. C. J. Certainly this is an irregular proceeding; this is not a time of exception to the judgment.

Mr. Phipps. Then, my lord, we are in your judgment, as to the proof that has been given: if a man be present at a meeting of several persons, and there is a reasonable debate about killing the king, and this man is only present, but neither assents, nor makes the proposal how it shall be done, whether the bare being silent, and saying nothing, is such an overt-act as shall convict a man of treason?

L. C. J. I tell you, consenting to a traitorous design is an overt-act of high-treason, if that consent be made to appear by good proof. Now the question is, What is a good proof and evidence of this consent? A man is two or three times at a treasonable consult for killing the king, and though perhaps at the first he did not, yet at the second he did know that the meeting was for such a design, (suppose for the purpose there was but two meetings) and at the second it is determined to go on with the design; Is not that an overt-act, though it cannot be proved that the prisoner said any thing?

Mr. Phipps. If the first meeting is not a consent or an overt-act, neither will a second or a third be, if there was no more done than at the first, but they are like so many cyphers without a figure.

L. C. J. The first meeting possibly might be accidental, he might not know what it was for, though that will go a great way if he does not dissent or discover; but when he meets again with the same company, knowing what they had in design; does not that prove a consent? That was the case of sir Everard Digby in the Powder Plot.

Mr. Phipps. But where it may be uncertain, my lord, whether it were with a good design, or a bad design, that he met with that company, it ought to be taken most favourably for the prisoner: This man might be present in order to a discovery.

L. C. J. But besides, that is not this case; you are mooted upon points that are not in the case. When Mr. Harris came to Mr. Rookwood, and finding them in some disorder, and being inquisitive what was the occasion, he was sent to Counter; and when he discovered what they were to go about, he afterwards meeting Mr. Rookwood, says to him, Are we sent over to murder the prince of Orange? says Rookwood, if I had known of this design before I came from France, I would have begged the king's, that is king James's pardon, and desired to have been excused. Hereby he expresses his knowledge of the design, and what he was to do; and though he disliked, yet would obey orders.

Mr. Phipps. There is no doubt, my lord, but he knew of it; but whether your lordship will construe his silence as a consent, in treason, is the question.

L. C. J. A man is at frequent consults about killing the king, and does not reveal it, it is a great evidence of his consent.

Mr. Phipps. But it is not proved that he did actually consent to it.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we must submit it to your lordship, whether this is not totally improper and irregular at this time? They are arguing how far the evidence is to be believed, before the time proper for such an argument comes.

Att. Gen. If they will call their witnesses, let them; or if they say they have none, then they may make their observations upon the evidence; but else we desire we may be kept to the usual method of proceedings.

Mr. Phipps. With submission, we thought it fit to know the opinion of the court first, if there be two witnesses against the prisoner; for if there be not two witnesses, as the law requires, we need not trouble the court with our evidence.

Sir B. Shower. Then, my lord, we must desire that the record may be read of captain Porter's conviction of manslaughter; a man that has been guilty of doing such an act, feloniously, maliciously and voluntarily, as that is, sure is not a competent witness.

Cl. of Ar. It has been read already.

Att. Gen. I thought we had been over that objection before.

Sir B. Shower. We think it is proper for us to move it now again; for though it is no objection to his being a legal witness, yet we hope it will influence his reputation as to his credit; for he that has been guilty of killing a man in such a manner as the indictment lays it, will find but little credit, we hope, with a jury of countrymen. But since it has been read, and your lordship and the jury have taken notice of it, we will call some other witnesses as to Mr. Porter's reputation and behaviour, we think they will prove things as bad as an attainer. I shall not open them to your lordship, but beg leave to call our witnesses, who will acquaint you what they have to say.

Att. Gen. Certainly, my lord, you will not think fit to let them do so. I desire they would not usher in any thing of evidence without acquainting the court what they call them for: For that were the way to let them in to call witnesses to things that are not proper.

L. C. J. Nay, without doubt it is not regular to produce any evidence, without opening it.

Att. Gen. For if it be for any crime that a man may be presented for, and there is no conviction; I think that ought not to be given in evidence to take away a witness's credit: If it be only to his general reputation and behaviour, so far they may go, and we cannot oppose it. Therefore I desire sir Bartholomew Shower will open to the court of what nature his evidence is.

Sir B. Shower. Well, I will tell you then what I call them to.

L. C. J. You must tell us what you call them to.

Sir B. Shower. Why then, my lord, if robbing upon the highway, if clipping, if conveying with clippers, if fornication, if buggery, if any of these irregularities, will take off the credit of a man, I have instructions in my brief of evidence of crimes of this nature, and to this purpose against Mr. Porter; and we hope that by law, a prisoner standing for his life is at liberty to give an account of the actions and behaviour of the witnesses against him. I know the objection that Mr. Attorney makes, a witness does not come prepared to vindicate and give an account of every action of his life, and it is not commonly allowed to give evidence of particular actions; but if those actions be repeated, and a man lives in the practice of them, and this practice is continued for several years, and this be made out by evidence; we hope no jury that have any conscience, will upon their oaths give any credit to the evidence of a person against whom such a testimony is given.

Mr. Phipps. We are speaking only, my lord, to the credit of Mr. Porter; and if we can shew by evidence that he is so ill a man as to be guilty of those crimes that we have opened, according to the instructions in our brief, we hope the jury will not think him fit to be a good evidence against us in this matter.

L. C. J. What say you to this, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. My lord, they themselves know, that this sort of evidence never was admitted in any case, nor can be, for it must tend to the overthrow of all justice and legal proceedings; for instead of trying the prisoner at the bar, they would try Mr. Porter. It has been always denied where it comes to a particular crime that a man may be prosecuted for; and this it seems is not one crime or two, but so many and so long continued, as they say, and so often practised, that here are the whole actions of a man's life to be ript up, which they can never shew any precedent when it was permitted, because a man has no opportunity to defend himself. Any man in the world may by this means be wounded in his reputation, and crimes laid to his charge that he never thought of, and he can have no opportunity of giving an answer to it, because he never imagined there would be any such objection: It is killing a man in his good name by a side-wound, against which he has no protection or defence. My lord, this must tend to the preventing all manner of justice; it is against all common sense or reason, and it never was offered at by any lawyer before, as I believe, at leastwise never so openly; and therefore I wonder that these gentlemen should do it, who acknowledge, at least one of them did, that as often as it has been now offered it has been over-ruled; and I know not for what end it is offered, but to make a noise in the court: They know that it is irregular as much as any thing that could be offered.

Sol. Gen. Indeed, my lord, if the prisoner at the bar had offered this matter, it had been excusable; but that gentlemen of the long robe, and who are so well acquainted with the practice of the courts of law, should pretend to do such a thing, is unaccountable. There was somewhat like this that was offered at Manchester, but that was by the prisoner, to prove that one Lunt who was a witness had two wives, and they brought a copy of an indictment upon which there was no process; after that they endeavoured to prove him guilty of several robberies; but all that sort of evidence was refused. I only give them this instance to shew, that where the prisoner has attempted it, it has been always rejected; and I am sure they cannot shew me that ever it was allowed, even to the prisoner himself, to give any thing of this kind in evidence; and this I must say, they can never shew me any one particular instance, when counsel ever endeavoured to do it, before this time.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, I mentioned the particular crimes, the faults which I had in my instructions to object against the credit of the testimony of capt. Porter, in answer to Mr. Attorney's desire, that I would open the particulars of the evidence, that I would call my witnesses to the truth of it; I was loth to repeat the words, I think the things themselves so abominable; but we conceive, with submission, we may be admitted in this case to offer what we have offered. Suppose a man be a common, lewd, disorderly fellow, one that frequently swears to falsehood for his life: We know it is a common rule in point of evidence, that against a witness you shall only give an account of his character at large, of his general conversation; but that general conversation arises from particular actions, and if the witnesses give you an account of such disorderly actions repeated, we hope that will go to his discredit, which is that we now are labouring for, and submit it to your lordship's opinion whether we may not do it.

L. C. J. Look ye, you may bring witnesses to give an account of the general tenour of his conversation, but you do not think sure that we will try now at this time, whether he be guilty of robbery or buggery.*

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we will give you an account that he used to have a private lodging, and come in with his horse tired, and several other such things, as that he used to go out in disguises, and the like.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, I cannot imagine why a man that has been guilty of any such crimes, and is not taken, should be of greater credit than a man that has been taken and punished.

L. C. J. What is that you say, Mr. Phipps?

Mr. Phipps. My lord, I say it is the crime that renders a man infamous, and I do not know why a man that has had the good fortune not to be taken and punished for great crimes by him committed, should be in a better condition as to the credit of his testimony, than one that is taken and undergoes the punishment of the law.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Charnock urged that as far as it would go, but we are obliged, it seems, to hear things that have been over-ruled over and over; but I desire to know of them, whether they can shew he has been guilty of a greater crime than he has confest himself guilty of in court, I mean of the intended assassination.

Mr. Phipps. No, we agree we cannot; but pray let us prove him guilty of as many crimes as we can.

Sol. Gen. But, my lord, I hope you will keep them to the general question of the common ordinary tenour of his conversation.

Sir B. Shower. Call Mr. Oldfield, Mr. Nicholas, Mr. Milford, Black Will.

[Mr. Milford appeared.

Cryer. Lay your hand on the book. The evidence that you shall give on behalf of the prisoner at the bar shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God.

Sir B. Shower. Pray will you give my lord and the jury an account whether you know captain Porter, and how long you have known him?

Milford. I have known him about four years.

Sir B. Shower. What reputation is he of?

Milford. I never knew any hurt by him in my life.

Sir B. Shower. Pray what is your name?

Milford. Frederick Milford.

Sir B. Shower. But the name in my brief is John Milford, that is my man.

L. C. J. But you see this man knows him.

Sir B. Shower. Call Mr. Oldfield.

[Which was done, and he appeared accordingly.]

Mr. Phipps. Do you know captain Porter?

Oldfield. Yes, I do.

Mr. Phipps. How long have you known him?

Oldfield. I believe about twenty years.

Mr. Phipps. Pray will you give my lord and the jury an account of his life and conversation.

Oldfield. I can say nothing, he was always civil in my company, but he was lewd in his discourse.

Sir B. Shower. What do you mean by being lewd in his discourse?

Oldfield. Why, he would be talking very extravagantly.

Mr. Phipps. What do you mean in talking? Was it of what he had done himself, Sir?

Oldfield. No otherwise than that he had whored, and those kind of things.

Sir B. Shower. What other things beside whoring?

Oldfield. I know no other part of it.

Sir B. Shower. Where is Edward Bouchey? (He did not appear.)

Mr. Phipps. Call William O'Bryan. (He did not appear.)

Sir B. Shower. Where is Mr. Page, and Mr. Hardiman?

(None of them appeared.)

Cryer. There is not a man of them here, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Webber, Do you know where they are, for the court stays for them.

* See Peake's Law of Evidence, chap. 3, Witnesses, sect. 2, art. General Character.

Mr. Webber. Indeed I do not, they were summoned to be here.

Sir B. Shower. Where is Black Will?

Cryer. Black Will. (He appeared, and was a Moor.)

L. C. J. Ask him if he be a Christian.

Cryer. I have asked him, and he says he is a Christian.

(Then he was sworn.)

L. C. J. Well, what do you ask him?

Rookwood. Will, Pray give an account of your master, and of his life and conversation.

Mr. Phipps. You are sworn to tell the truth, sweet-heart.

Will. I served him almost eight years, and he has been a very good master to me, my lord.

Sir B. Shower. What do you know him to be guilty of?—Will. Nothing at all.

Sir B. Shower. I believe they have put in these men to confirm his reputation.

L. C. J. Indeed, I think the king's counsel should have called these witnesses, if there had been occasion.

Sir B. Shower. We submit it to your direction, how far this evidence will affect him; there is nothing said, as we apprehend, that will amount to treason; if the prisoner has a mind to say any thing himself, we hope your lordship will please to hear him.

L. C. J. Aye, if he will, let him.

Rookwood. My lord, Mr. Porter does not say, that I consented to command a party.

L. C. J. Is that all you have to say? Then, Gentlemen, will you sum up?

Mr. Conyers. My lord, we are agreed; we submit to the court on both sides.

L. C. J. Then, gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Rookwood, is indicted for high-treason, in compassing, imagining, and intending the death and destruction of the king, by a most barbarous and wicked assassination; you have had an account of this design from two witnesses that have been produced; the one is captain Porter, the other is Mr. Harris, who swear they were both concerned as actors in it.

Captain Porter tells you, about the latter end of January, or the beginning of February, last, sir George Barclay came over into England from France; and there was a former design to murder the king; and after several meetings and conferences among the conspirators, they came to a resolution that he should be assassinated; but which way to effect it, admitted of a dispute among them; for the king as you have heard, going frequently, about once a week, a hunting on the other side the water near Richmond, the design was first to assassinate him at Richmond Park, or thereabouts, as he returned from hunting, and preparation was made accordingly; but that not being so fully agreed upon, the conveniency of the place held still some debate; for some were of opinion, that it was better to make the attempt on this side the water, than on the other; therefore, as Mr. Porter tells you, to determine that difficulty, there were several men sent, whereof he was one; Knightley another, and King a third, to view the ground on both sides the water, and to make their report; the ground being viewed, and the report made to some of their accomplices, who to receive it met at the Nag's-Head in Covent-Garden, which was about the tenth or twelfth of February last; it was then agreed that the king and his guards should be attacked on this side the water, about Turnham-Green.

Mr. Porter has told you, that at several meetings for the carrying on this design, the prisoner Mr. Rookwood was present, more particularly at the Globe Tavern in Hatton-garden, where were also sir George Barclay, Mr. Charnock, sir William Parkyns, himself, and others, and there they did enter into a consult how they might assassinate the king; and it being proposed, Mr. Rookwood did not like it, as Mr. Porter says, but said it was a desperate attempt; and thereupon sir George Barclay pulled out a scheme that he had, and shewed it at that time to Mr. Rookwood, and said, you are sent over from France, and are to obey my orders, and you are to command a party; and then Mr. Rookwood made an answer in French, 'There's ah end of it,' which, as he says, imports a consent.

Then at another time, which was the Saturday morning the 15th of February, they met at captain Porter's lodging, and there was a discourse about going on to put the design in execution; and one Durant, one of the men that was to watch the king and the guards going out at Kensington, came in, and the question was, whether they should go that day upon the design? They had discourse about it, and Mr. Rookwood the prisoner was there present, and there did not appear any dissent in him to the prosecution of the design, but it seems it was readily agreed among them, to pursue it according to the former determination.

Then the next witness that is produced is Mr. Harris, who gives you a large account of the beginning of his knowledge, and of his being concerned in this matter; he tells you he was in France, and at the court of St. Germain, where the late king then was, and that he spoke with him, and where was also colonel Parker; and king James took notice of him and of his faithful service, and told him, he always designed him a kindness, and then had opportunity of doing it, and said he would send him over into England, where he should be subsisted, and directed him to obey the orders of sir George Barclay; and there being one Hareby, who was to come over with him, king James gave them both names of disguise which they were to go by in England, and, as it seems, others that came over did also assume; for Mr. Rookwood went by the name of Roberts, Harris was to go by the name of Jenkins, and Hareby by the name of Guiney; they were directed to apply themselves to sir George Barcley, and had directions how they should find him, which were to go into Covent-garden, in the evening, upon a Monday or a Thursday and if they saw a person that had a white handkerchief hanging out of his pocket, they were to take notice of him to be sir George Barcley, and they had ten lewis d'ores a-piece for their journeys to carry them off; and you have heard from whom they had them; and they were told, that if at Calais they were kept longer than they expected, whereby their money was spent, care was taken that they should be supplied from the governor of Calais, the president there; and it seems Mr. Harris and Mr. Hare went together to Calais, and lay a considerable time for want of a wind, whereby their money fell short of defraying their expences; but they were afterwards supplied by the governor of Calais, according as was promised at St. Germain's.

Gentlemen, he tells you, that after they came into England, the first time they went to seek sir George Barcley, was upon the Monday night, but they did not find him at that time; but afterwards they met with him, and Mr. Harris had subsistence-money from him, according to king James's promise, which was at the rate of 5s. a-day, when he had no horse, and afterwards when he had a horse, at 6s. a-day; this is the account he gives you how he came over, and of his journey and meeting with sir George Barcley.

And now he comes to speak particularly concerning the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Rookwood: He tells you, that on Saturday morning the 16th of February, the first day when this assassination was designed to be committed, he went to the lodging of one Burk, where Mr. Rookwood was, with others, and he found them all in a great disorder; and thereupon he asked them, what was the matter, and what they were going to do? And Rookwood bid him go to one Counter, and he should know of him what was the matter: accordingly he went to his lodging, and Counter told him and those who were with him, that they must get ready to go to Turnham-Green; and at the same time and place he met with sir George Barcley, and after some discourse of attacking the coach, sir George Barcley at the first said, they were his janizaries; and afterwards going out, he came in again and said, they were men of honour, and that they were to go abroad to attack the prince of Orange,

The next day, or a little time after, Mr. Harris met with Mr. Rookwood, and enters into discourse with him to this effect: What! are we sent over to murder the prince of Orange? It is a strange sort of employment: (for it seems they were not informed in France what they were to do here, but they were to put themselves under the conduct of sir George Barcley, and obey his orders.) Mr. Rookwood said, he was afraid the thing was so, and that they were drawn in; but said, if he had known of the design before-hand, he would not have come over, but have begged the king's pardon.

Which shews not only his knowledge of the design, but his being engaged in the prosecution of it.

And then, Gentlemen, you are told further, That upon the going out upon Saturday the 22d, which was the second time it was to have been put in execution, there was a list of men that Mr. Rookwood gave to Mr. Harris of several names that he has mentioned to you; he says, Mr. Rookwood's name was at the top, as one that was to command the party, and the name he went by was Roberts; and there was Harris's counterfeit name, which was Jenkins; and Hare's counterfeit name, which was Guiney; and they were to make ready to go to Turnham-Green. He told him, there was a list, and that he and Harris was to be of his party, that he was to attack the prince of Orange, and that Mr. Harris should be his aid de camp.

Gentlemen, I forgot to tell you, That between the first Saturday and the second, Mr. Harris, Mr. Rookwood, and Mr. Lowick, walking in Red-Lyon-Fields, and there in discourse among themselves, Mr. Harris and Mr. Rookwood did express themselves to be much concerned that they were to be employed upon such a design as this was, which they owned to be very barbarous; but Mr. Rookwood and Lowick said, They were under command, and must obey orders, though Mr. Rookwood did not like the design they were engaged in.

Gentlemen, they have told you of horses that were placed at Somerset-house in a stable there, under the care of Mr. Lewis, my lord Feversham's gentleman of the horse, about six or seven horses, and those six horses that were there at that time were afterwards taken away; but that is only a circumstance.

So that, Gentlemen, this is now the sum and substance of this evidence that has been given you, as far as it relates to the prisoner: his counsel in his defence have insisted upon several things; in the first place, though it was last mentioned in time, yet it ought to have the first consideration; the counsel for the prisoner have endeavoured to take off the credit of Mr. Porter, and have opened indeed very great crimes that he should be guilty of, which must render him a person not to be believed, but they have not proved any thing; no witness that they have called against Mr. Porter says the least against him to invalidate his testimony, or to induce you to disbelieve what he has said.

Then they say in point of law, There is no overt-act proved of any design against the king's life that affects Mr. Rookwood; now that matter you are to consider of, whether or no it does appear by the testimony of two witnesses, that Mr. Rookwood was concerned in this design of assassinating the king: captain Porter is positive that he was at the consult at the Globe-tavern, where it was proposed, debated, and resolved upon; but Mr. Rookwood says, he did dislike it; so says captain Porter, he did not approve of it at the first upon his being acquainted with it; but being sent over to obey the orders of sir George Barcley, and sir George Barclay producing a scheme ready drawn, wherein he was to command the party, telling him, that he must obey orders. You hear what he said, and the answer he returned in French, There is an end of it; whether that does not amount to a consent and agreement to be engaged in this design, is left to your consideration; for if it do, it is plainly an overt-act.

Then, Gentlemen, you hear further, that Harris was told by Mr. Rookwood, that he should be of his party, and be his aid du camp, and go to Turnham-Green to attack the prince of Orange, and he had a list of men given him by Rookwood, and was directed to get the rest ready.

Rookwood. That was not in the indictment.

L. C. J. But you were at that meeting, which is laid in the indictment.

Rookwood. My lord, that list is not in the indictment; the list in the indictment refers to Mr. Cranburne.

L. C. J. No, but that is an evidence of your being in the design; I hope that list of men will be some evidence of the consent and agreement that Mr. Rookwood was to command a party.

Sir B. Shower. With submission, my lord, the words of the act seem otherwise, and that no overt-act should be given in evidence, that is not expressly alledged.

L. C. J. But cannot there be one act, that may be proof of another act which is alledged?

Sir B. Shower. Then there is no advantage of this law; for, my lord, the end of the act was, That they should know the particular crimes that they were to answer to.

L. C. J. That could never be the end of the law, that all particular facts that are but evidence of the facts alledged should be set forth in the indictment; it was sufficient before the act, to alledge any overt-act; and any other overt-act, though not alledged, and had no relation to the overt-act that was alledged, yet if it were to the same sort of treason, might be given in evidence.

Sir B. Shower. The law says, Ye shall not give evidence of any overt-act that is not expressly mentioned.

L. C. J. It is not urged as an overt-act, but as evidence of an overt-act that is alledged; for instance, the overt-act alledged is, that they did meet and consult, shall not they give in evidence what was said and done at those meetings, though not alledged? Sir George Barclay produced a scheme at the Globe-tavern, shall not the producing of that scheme be given in evidence? If it may, why not the giving the list to Harris?

Mr. Phipps. My lord, it is plain it was Mr. Attorney's opinion, it could not be given in evidence, unless it was alledged in the indictment; because he has particularly alledged the list in Cranburne's case, in this very indictment.

Sol. Gen. I know not what those gentlemen mean by this sort of practice; certainly there never were so many irregularities committed in any trial as in this, and now particularly to break in upon the court in the midst of the charge.

L. C. J. Nay, nay, if there be any mistake, let us hear them, that it may be rectified.

L. C. J. Treby. I think we should receive them, to try if they can make it out. But the objection I do not very well understand yet for, as I take the matter to stand, it is alledged in the indictment, that they had prepared men and arms, and horses, for the execution of this design. Now is it not reasonable, or can there be any thing more proper, than to give in evidence, and prove that the prisoner had, and delivered to some of the complices, a list of those men that were to do it? Why, it proves the very thing alledged; but let us see whether it be so.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, there is no such thing alledged.

L. C. J. That is strange! pray see if it be in the indictment.

Clerk of Arr. (Reads.) Mr. Conyers. And, my lord, there is evidence of some of these forty men, whose names were given in a list by Rookwood to Harris?

Mr. Phipps. But now, in Cranburne's part, the list is expressly alledged as an overt-act.

L. C. J. Never talk of Cranburne, we have not him before us now; but what do you say to this of the list given by Rookwood to Harris?

Sir B. Shower. My Lord, we say this is not evidence of an overt-act, according to this act of parliament; which says, no evidence shall be given of any overt-act, that is not expressly alleged in the indictment; now the indictment says, they did agree that forty horsemen armed, of which the four named were to be four, and every one undertook to be one, who should lie in wait to set upon the king in his coach, and a competent number should set upon the guards; and then it says, in order to fulfil this, they did prepare horses and arms, and one of them by the consent of all the rest did carry forward and backward a list, that is, Cranburne; and that particular list is a particular overt-act alleged in the indictment; which makes it plain, they thought it necessary to be particularly alleged by this act of parliament, or they could not give any evidence of it; now the list that evidence is given of, is supposed to be delivered by the prisoner to Harris. Now first we say, it is not evidence that forty should do it, for they may do it without a list; and next, it is not evidence of the list that they have mentioned, for that is alleged to be carried about by Cranburne; and as the prisoner himself has observed, this list given to Harris is not in the indictment, and therefore no evidence can be given of it.

Mr. Conyers. It is an evidence of that overt-act which is expressly alleged in the indictment, that they met together to consult how to effect this treason.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, we are in a very strange case here, if we be not very proper in this part of our evidence; the overt-act laid is, That the prisoner met together with others to consult how to assassinate the king, and there the prisoner among the rest did agree it should be done so and so. It is admitted the prisoner was there; but, say they, if you only prove that he sat by while there was a general discourse of such a matter, but do not prove that he said or did any thing expressing his assent, that will not amount to a proof of the overt-act laid; and yet, if we go about to prove further, any act done that manifests his assent, then they say you go too far, and prove an overt-act that is not mentioned in the indictment. Thus they grant, the agreement is a sufficient overt-act, but object, that being present barely is not a sufficient proof of his agreement; then when we go to make proof of any thing that is a sufficient proof of his agreement, they tell us it is not proper upon this act of parliament, because not laid in the indictment, though his agreement be laid in the indictment: And so they would amuse us, rather than make any solid objection to our evidence. This doctrine is certainly very odd, my lord, and we doubt not will have little weight with the court or the jury.

Att. Gen. According to this doctrine, all the evidence must be put in the indictment.

L. C. J. They ask you, what this giving this list does prove.

Att. Gen. His agreeing at that meeting to the conspiracy, and the execution of it, by giving that list of the names of them that were to be of his party, and his own name as commander of that party, this he gives to one that was to be of the party, and particularly was to be his aid du camp, in order to get them ready for the execution; is not this an evidence of the agreement, which is the overt-act? No man in the world can be convicted of treason, if this doctrine be true.

Sol. Gen. My lord, they have not expressed something in the indictment that has been read, which will make it plain that this is the most proper evidence of the overt-act laid in the indictment. The indictment says, they agreed there should be forty men or thereabouts armed, of which a certain number should make an assault upon the king's coach, while another part should set upon the guards: Now the proof we make is, that Mr. Rookwood the prisoner was to command a party that was to set upon the guards; and in order to it, he gives a list of his men to Harris, who was to be his aid du camp, and bids him get those men ready; and this was upon the day that this matter was to be acted: So that it proves very plainly that overt-act that we suggest in the indictment, that a certain number of those men were to assault the king's person, and another the guards. And therefore they needed not to have interrupted your lordship; for this list that Harris speaks of is a very good proof of the overt-act that is laid in the indictment.

L. C. J. Then, gentlemen, as to this matter which they have objected, that this list given on the day of the intended assassination, ought not to be allowed as evidence to prove the treason, because it is not specially laid in the indictment, but is by the late act of parliament excluded from being proved to convict the prisoner: Now though the act doth exclude the giving in evidence of any overt-act that is not laid in the indictment, yet it doth not exclude such evidence as is proper and fit to prove that overt act that is laid in the indictment. Therefore the question is, Whether this giving of the list does not prove some overt-act that is alleged in the indictment? There is in the indictment an agreement laid to kill the king; and if that be proved, that is an overt-act of this treason. Now when the consent and agreement of Mr. Rookwood to that design is proved, surely the proof of his giving a list of men, is a further proof that he did agree to it, and then it is very proper to be given in evidence; for if by the new statute no one act can be given in evidence to prove another, then must not only the overt-act, but also the evidence of that act be expressed in the indictment.

Gentlemen, You have heard the witnesses what they say concerning this matter. In the first place, if you do believe that there was such consultations and meetings, where this intended assassination of the king was debated and resolved ed upon, and that Mr. Rookwood was present and did agree to it, that is an overt-act: And again, if you are satisfied that there was an agreement to prepare and provide a number of men to set upon the king and his guards, in the manner you have heard, and he was concerned in making this provision, and was to have a post, and command a party in that attack, that is a further proof of that consent and agreement that is laid in the indictment.

Gentlemen, I must leave it to you, upon the evidence that you have heard. If you are satisfied, upon the testimony of these two witnesses that have been produced, that Mr. Rookwood is guilty of this treason of which he is indicted, in compassing and imagining the death of the king, then you will find him guilty: If you are not satisfied that he is guilty, you will acquit him.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, swear an officer to keep the jury. (Which was done.)

L. C. J. Now, if you have any thing to move on behalf of your other clients, pray do it.

Sir B. Shower. Yes, we have an exception, but never a one of false spelling.

L. C. J. If so be it be any such matter as you can move in arrest of judgment, it had best be reserved till after the verdict.

Sir B. Shower. Our exceptions will serve, if occasion be, for Mr. Rookwood in arrest of judgment, and they will serve for the others also to prevent the trouble of the trial, if we have your lordship's opinion that they are good exceptions.

(Then the Jury withdrew to consider of their verdict, and after a quarter of an hour's staying out returned, and gave in their verdict.)

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen of the jury, answer to your names. Samuel Powell.

Mr. Powell. Here. (And so of the rest.)

Cryer. Vous avez.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Ambrose Rookwood, hold up thy hand, (which he did). Look upon the prisoner: How say you? Is he guilty of the high treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements, had he at the time of the treason committed?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

Cl. of Ar. Then hearken to your verdict as the court has recorded it. You say that Ambrose Rookwood is guilty of the high treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no goods or chattels, lands or tenements, at the time of the high treason committed, or at any time since to your knowledge, and so you say all?—Jury. Yes.

Mr. Powell. We desire we may be discharged.

L. C. J. We cannot do that, till we see whether there be enough upon the other pannel: We will give you as much ease as we can: We shall not, I suppose, try the other till the afternoon, therefore you may take your ease for the present; but you must be about the court when the other trials come on.

(While the Jury was withdrawn, the court offered to the counsel for the prisoners, that they might move what exceptions they had before the Jury was sworn as to any of the other; which accordingly they did; but that relating to the case of Mr. Charles Cranburne, in whose presence, being then at the bar, the objections were made, that part is left to his Trial.)

387. The Trial of CHARLES CRANBURN, for High Treason: At the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer for the County of Middlesex, sitting in the Court of King's-Bench at Westminster: 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.*

April 21. 1696.

AFTER the trial of Ambrose Rookwood was over, while the jury were withdrawn to consider of their verdict, the court proceeded thus:

L. C. J. (Sir John Holt.) Mr. Attorney, whom will you have tried next?

Att. Gen. (Sir Tho. Trevor) Cranburne, if your lordship pleases.

Cl. of Ar. Then, keeper of Newgate, set Charles Cranburne to the bar.

L. C. J. You, gentlemen, that are of counsel for the prisoner, if you have any thing to move for your client, you may move it; but first let the prisoner be here.

(Then Charles Cranburne was brought to the bar in irons.)

L. C. J. Look you, keeper, you should take off the prisoners irons* when they are at the bar, for they should stand at their ease when they are tried.

* See in this Collection, vol. 5, p. 979.

Keeper. My lord, we have no instruments here to do it just now.

Cl. of Ar. You may send to the Gate-house, and borrow instruments.

Just. Powell. It should be done, indeed; they ought to plead at ease.

L. C. J. Well, go on, sir Bartholomew Shower.

Att. Gen. My lord, before sir Bartholomew Shower enter upon his exceptions, unless those exceptions of his are some of the particulars mentioned in this act, he must not do it now, after plea pleaded, before the trial; but he must do it in arrest of judgment.

L. C. J. Treby. It is true, regularly; but let him use his own judgment.

L. C. J. It is very true; the course has not been to allow them to move to quash an indictment for treason, or felony; but it may be done.

Att. Gen. Sure, it must be only for such things as they cannot take advantage of in arrest in judgment after the verdict.

L. C. J. It has not been the course, but it may be done.

Att. Gen. Not where there is an issue joined, and a jury returned to try that issue; I believe that never was done, nor attempted.

L. C. J. Treby. If there were any prejudice to the king by it, it were not fit for us to alter the course; but let us hear what his exceptions are.

Sir B. Shower. I have several exceptions; five at least; one of them is within the very words of the act, that is, improper Latin; I am sure some of it is so.

L. C. J. Well, let's hear what that is.

Sir B. Shower. It says, 'anno regni dicti domini regis nunc septimo,' and Lewis is the last king mentioned before; and so here is no year of the king of England mentioned. It is a certain rule, that relatives must refer to the last antecedent; and that rule holds always, unless there be words that accompany the relative, which undeniably shew to what it refers.

L. C. J. Aye; but do we call the French king 'dominus rex?'

L. C. J. Treby. He would have been so, if he had succeeded in his invasion, and this assassination.

Sir B. Shower. In every indictment, if there be occasion to mention a former king, it is always nuper rex, and such a one, naming the name of the king, where the present king's name does intervene, to prevent confusion; and so in civil actions it is the same; and so it should have been here.

L. C. J. Ay. but I tell you, it is 'dominus rex nunc,' which is our king.

Mr. Phipps. It is not said 'Anglie.'

L. C. J. But wherever it is 'dominus rex,' we understand it of the king of England, and nobody else. Read the indictment.

Cl. of Ar. 'Necnon tandem Dominum Regem ad Mortem et finalem Destructionem ponere et adducere, ac subditos suos fideles, et Liberos Homines Hujus Regni Anglia in

'servitutum intolerabilem et miserabilem Ludovico Regi Gallico subjugare, et mancipare, Decimo Die Februarii, Anno Regni dicti Domini nunc Regis septimo, et diversis aliis Diebus, &c.'

L. C. J. Can any man imagine this to be the French king?

Sir B. Shower. My lord, your lordship is not to imagine one way or other.

Mr. Cowper. In the strictest sense and grammar in the world, it must mean king William, and no other. We do not need any imagination, when in the strictest construction it is plain who it refers to.

Sir B. Shower. I am sure no grammar can make it good; nothing but a supposition can help it.

Mr. Cowper. When it is said 'Dictus Dominus Rex,' if sir Bartholomew Shower can find out another 'Dominus Rex' in the indictment, then he may make something of his objection; but the 'Dominus' is only applied to our own king throughout.

L. C. J. Treby. Besides, as to the rule that sir Bartholomew Shower mentions, it is that 'ad proximum Antecedens fiat relatio nisi im-pediat Sententia.' That is the restriction of the rule, it must relate to the next antecedent, unless the sense would be prejudiced; but here if this construction should be, it would make this clause to be no better than nonsense, viz. That the subjects and freemen of this realm were to be brought into intolerable slavery to Lewis the French king, such a day in the seventh year of the reign of our lord the French king.

Sir B. Shower. We say it is little better than nonsense; I am sure it is loose, and uncertain, and not grammar, but carries a new form with it.

L. C. J. No, it is as well as it can be.

Sir B. Shower. Then, my lord, there is another exception; it is said, 'Diversis Diebus et Vicibus tam antea quam postea;' and then afterwards it says, 'postea scilicet eodem Decimo Die Februarii;' that is repugnant; it is as much as to say, That upon the 10th of February, and two days afterwards (to wit) the said 10th day of February; that is, after two days after the 10th of February, viz. upon the same tenth day.

Att. Gen. That 'Postea' is another sentence, and relates to other matters.

Sir B. Shower. It cannot in propriety of speech be said to be afterwards the same day.

Sol. Gen. (sir John Hawles.) If sir Bartholomew Shower remembers the evidence that we have given this day, he will find it was in fact so; they met on the Saturday morning, and afterwards met again the night of the same day.

L. C. J. There is nothing in that objection, sure; it is a common form, when they tell of different matters.

Sir B. Shower. Well then, if you will hear the rest which are not of the same nature, we shall come to what we think a fatal exception;

we say, this indictment of High Treason being against a subject born, ought to have had the words in it, 'Contra supremum naturalem Ligeantiam Dominum suum,' according to Calvin's Case in the 7th Report, fol. septima.

L. C. J. Is it 'Contra Ligeantiam suae Debitum,' is it not?

Sir B. Stowen. That won't help it, my lord, for all that is applicable to an alien born, and so is the case in my lord Dyer, 144, where it is said, that if an indictment of treason be against an alien, you must not put in the word naturalem; if you do, it will be faulty, because he owes but a local allegiance to the king of England, and not a natural one. Now we say, there are none of these prisoners but are subjects born, and the constant form in queen Elizabeth's time, and queen Mary's, was to put in the words 'Naturalem Dominum,' and they cannot shew me any of those precedents without it. There was occasion in Tucker's case to look into this matter, and search all the precedents. I have looked in my lord Coke's entries, and all the precedents; I have seen my lord of Essex's indictment, and all the others in queen Elizabeth's time, and those of the traitors in the Power-Plot, and those of the Regicides, and Tucker's own indictment itself; all along it is 'Naturalem Dominum suum;' and the reason for it is, he that is alien born, you never put in 'Naturalem Dominum suum,' because he owes a double allegiance; one natural, to his own king under whose dominion he was born, and the other local, to the king in whose dominions he resides, for he is bound to observe the laws of the place where he lives: and if he violate them, he does break the allegiance that he owes to the government where he lives, upon account of the protection he enjoys under it. But if he be born a subject of the king of England, he has but one natural liege-lord; and he being an Englishman born, the king stands in that relation to him, as he does to all his native subjects, but not to foreigners; and therefore it was thought requisite to be, and has always been inserted into indictments of treason against subjects born. And, my lord, we think the very resolution of the court, afterwards affirmed in the House of Lords that reversed Tucker's attainder, went upon this opinion, that the law required 'naturalem Ligeantiam Dominum' to be put in. There the exception was, that 'Contra Debitum Ligeantiae suae' was omitted: to which it was objected, that there was 'Dominum Supremum Naturalem,' which was equivalent; no, it was answered, both were requisite, because every act charged in the indictment ought to be laid against the duty of his allegiance. Now in indictments of treason, there are certain words that are essential, because of their relation between the king and his people. There are certain forms of words, which if the constant practice has been to make use of them, the omission is an error. Those usual forms ought to be observed, and the want of them will be a fatal exception; so we think it would be in this case, as much as if the word 'Proditorie' had been left out; or as if in a case of felony and burglary, the words 'Felonice' and 'Burglariter' had been left out.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, we take the practice and precedents to be the rule of law in the case; and I have looked over a great many precedents, besides those that sir Bartholomew Shower has cited; and I never saw any one precedent of an indictment of treason against a subject born, without the word Naturalem; and all the cases cited by sir Bartholomew Shower are full in the point. Counter's case in my lord Hobbart, 271, where it is said, that if there be an indictment against a subject born, it must be 'Contra naturalem Dominum;' if against an alien, 'naturalem' must be left out. To say 'Contra Ligeantiae suae Debitum' will not do, it is not enough, for that may be said against an alien, because he owes a local allegiance, though not a natural one. And I take it, upon this difference, this indictment is not good.

Att. Gen. My lord, I do not know how far you will think it proper to enter into this matter before the trial.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, I think you had as good speak to it now as at another time; though I must confess it is not so proper in point of practice.

Att. Gen. Well, my lord, then we will speak to it now. The objection is, that the words 'naturalem Dominum' is not in the indictment; which they say is contrary to the usual form: as to the precedents, there are a great many where it has been, and I am sure a great many where it has not been; and I am sure for this six, seven, or eight years last past, it has always been omitted: and, with submission to your lordship, it is not at all necessary, if there be words in the indictment which shew, that what he did was against the duty of his allegiance to his lawful and undoubted lord (which are the words in this indictment). It is true, if he be not a subject born, 'naturalem' cannot be in, because that is contradictory to the obedience which he owes, for it is not a natural obedience that he owes, but a local; but if a man be a subject born, and commits treason against the allegiance that he owes, that is against his natural allegiance; for whatsoever he does against his allegiance, he does against his natural allegiance, and so there is no need to put in the word 'naturalem;' because he owes no other allegiance but that; it is sufficient if that be put in which shews it being against his allegiance. If they could shew that a subject born has two allegiances, one that is natural, and the other that is not natural; then if you would prosecute him, you must shew, whether it was against his natural, or against his other allegiance. But when he has none but a natural allegiance, certainly against his allegiance, without putting in natural, will be well enough. It is true, where there is no natural allegiance, it must be wrong if you put it in, because you put in that allegiance which he does not owe; but where he is a subject born, to put in natural liege-lord, there is no ground at all for it: there are words shew that shew it was against his allegiance to his lawful and undoubted lord.

L. C. J. Look you, sir Bartholomew Shower, how does it appear, that these men are subjects born? The matter you go upon does not appear upon the indictment, and you are not to go off from that.

Sir B. Shower. Every man is presumed to be so, unless the contrary appears.

L. C. J. You quote Calvin's Case, and the other cases that are there put; those are all cases of aliens; there is Dr. Lopez's Case: he being an alien comes into England, and commits high-treason: why, say they, how shall we indict this man? We cannot say it is 'contra Naturalem Dominum suum;' for he owes no natural allegiance to the queen of England; how shall we do to frame a good indictment against this man? They considered of this; and they said it will be a good indictment, to charge him with high-treason, or any one else, leaving out the word 'Naturalem.' For if it appear he has committed an offence against the laws of the kingdom, and against the duty of his allegiance, which is high-treason, that is enough. Now as to Tucker's Case, it was reversed for want of the conclusion, 'contra Debitum Ligeantiae suae.' Those words are material; for let the offence be never so much against the person of the king, as to assassinate him, or levy war against him, yet still if it be not against the duty of his allegiance, as it cannot be if he owes him none, it is not high-treason. And therefore if it be against his allegiance, whether that allegiance be natural or local, it is all one, it is enough to make it high-treason.

Sol. Gen. In that case in Dyer, they shew where it was a fault to put the word in, but they can shew no case where it has been adjudged to be a fault to leave the word out.

L. C. J. No doubt it would be a fault to have that in, 'Contra Naturalem Dominum suum,' where there is only a local allegiance due.

Mr. Phipps. How does it appear whether it is the one or the other that is due?

L. C. J. It is no matter whether the one or the other do appear, it is high-treason be it the one or the other, if it be against the duty of his allegiance.

Mr. Phipps. Suppose an indictment against an alien were, 'Contra Naturalem Dominum.'

L. C. J. That would be ill, because then you had laid it more specially, and otherwise than really it is, and restrained it where you ought not to do it.

Mr. Phipps. How then, my lord, shall it appear that he only owed a local obedience?

L. C. J. It may be given in evidence, that he is an alien born.

Sol. Gen. He may plead it in abatement to the indictment.

L. C. J. He ought to be acquitted, for you have not proved him of a crime against his natural allegiance, when he owes no such. But allegiance generally comprehends all sorts of allegiance, natural and local.

Sir B. Shower. How then, my lord, come all the lawyers of all ages to put in those words in indictments of high-treason against subjects born?

L. C. J. No, I have seen abundance of precedents, that have only 'Contra Ligeantiae suae Debitum' generally, and so the most part are; for allegiance is the genus, and if that be suggested, all the species are contained under that.

Att. Gen. Well, have they any more?

Sir B. Shower. Yes, we have more.

L. C. J. Well, you shall have them all in time.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, here is another objection, and that is this: Here is one fact that they have laid, and that is the second overt-act in this indictment, that they consented and agreed that 40 men, (whereof these four were to be four) but do not lay it to be done traitorously. They say 'Consenserunt, agreeverunt' et assenserunt, but not 'proditorie;' and I never saw an indictment that laid an express overt-act, without repeating the word again. If your lordship please, the words in the indictment are thus; as to the first overt-act, it is laid in this manner; 'Et ad execrabilem assassinationem illam exequend,' at such a time and such a place 'proditorie tractaverunt, proposuerunt et Consultaverunt de viis et modis mediis, &c.' and then comes this which we except against; 'et consenserunt, agreeverunt et assenserunt quod quadraginta Homines, &c.' Now this is a plain distinct act, and there is no 'proditorie' to it; and if ever they can shew me any indictment, in which an overt-act was laid, of which they gave any evidence, and it had not the word 'proditorie' in it, I am very much mistaken. I am sure, I never saw any such. And it is not enough to say, that the nature of the thing is such, as that it cannot but be a treasonable act; but they must alledge it to be so, by the express use of that word which the law has appointed to express this crime by. In the case of an indictment for felony, if it be not said felony, it is not good. They are not to describe that by circumlocution, which is a particular crime fixt by law, they must use the verba artis, the terms of art, and no other: if your lordship please it may be read.

Sol. Gen. Let it be read if you please; but take it in English, and it is no more than this, they did traitorously compass the death of the king, and for that purpose they did traitorously meet, and consult about the ways and means, and did consent and agree that forty men, &c.

Cl. of Ar. Reads: 'Et ad Execrabilem Horrendum et Detestabilem Assassinationem, Anglie Assassination, et interfectionem illam Citius exequendum et anno ac Diversis diebus et diebus apud parochiam predictam in Comitatu predicto proditorie tractaverunt, proposuerunt et Consultaverunt de viis modis et modis ac Tempore et Locis ubi quando

'qualiter et quomodo Dictum Dominum Regem
'no ex insidia facilius Interficerent.'

Sir B. Shower. There is an end of that, now go on.

Att. Gen. No, sir Bartholemew, you mistake, there is no end of it, that is done at the same time with that which follows.

Sir B. Shower. No, it is not the same overt-act; but let him go on.

Cl. of Ar. 'Et Consenserunt Agreeverunt
'et Assenserunt quod quadraginta Homines
'Equestris.'

Sir B. Shower. Well, you need read no further for our objection. We say there wants the word 'Proditorie:' for there are two overt acts, the one is, that they traitorously did consult of the ways and means how to kill the king; and that overt-act we agree to be well laid: but then it says they consented and agreed that there should be forty men, whereof these four should be four, but does not say they traitorously agreed; are not these distinct acts?

Mr. Phipps. Surely, my lord, they are distinct acts; for this part of the indictment upon which sir Bartholemew grounds his objection, is that overt-act of which the list in Mr. Rookwood's Case was urged by the king's counsel, and agreed by the court to be an evidence.

Then the jury against Mr. Rookwood came in, and delivered in their verdict, as it is in his trial, then afterwards the court went on thus:

Att. Gen. My lord, the objection is, that 'Proditorie' is not inserted into that particular clause of the indictment, which shews their particular agreement that there should be forty men, whereof the four named in the indictment were to be four. Now your lordship observes how the indictment runs, it is for compassing and imagining the death and destruction of the king; and it sets forth for this purpose, that to effect this compassing and imagining, they 'Proditorie tractaverunt et consultaverunt de viis mediis et Modis' how they should kill the king. Now that which immediately follows after is, the particular method and means that were agreed upon, that is, that there should be forty men. Now this is the strangest suggestion that ever was, when we have set forth, that traitorously they did so agree of the ways and means, and then set forth the particular means, that here must be 'proditorie' again to that. This is such a construction as I cannot but admire how it could come into any one's head. It is part of the sentence; for the other part, as we have laid it, is not complete before: it may be it might be sufficient without setting forth the particular ways and means; but when it is set forth it is part of the sentence, and refers to the first beginning.

L. C. J. Aye, sure it does.

Att. Gen. I cannot tell what they would have, unless they would have us repeat the word 'proditorie' in every line.

Sol. Gen. Or before every verb.

Sir B. Shower. No; but I think it ought to be repeated at every overt-act.

Mr. Cowper. If your lordship please, after that they have set forth that this was the particular method and way agreed upon at their consultation, that forty horsemen or thereabouts should go about it, of which the persons indicted were to be four, it goes on, 'Et Quilibet eorum proditorie super se Suscepit esse unum,' there it is put in, and it appears to be as particular as possible can be.

Mr. Cowper. Sir Bartholemew Shower says, that when we have alleged that they did traitorously treat, propose, and consult of the means and ways of killing the king, there we have done the sentence, and made that one overt-act. Now how is the sentence done? The next word is a conjunction copulative, 'et consenserunt,' &c. And what is the use of a conjunction copulative, but to convey the force of the words in a former sentence to the sentence following, and to prevent the repetition of every word in the subsequent sentence that was in the precedent? But it is plain, they are both one and the same overt-act, and these subsequent words are only an explanation, more particularly of the overt-act set forth in the precedent words.

Sir B. Shower. In answer to that that has been said, if they shew me any precedent, where an indictment has been for high-treason, setting forth several overt-acts, and not the word 'proditorie' set to every overt-act, then they answer my objection. If the word 'Quod' had come in, that would have made them distinct to be sure; and I think they are as distinct acts now; suppose they had concluded at the end of the word 'Interficerent,' that had been a good overt-act; I am sure they will agree to that: and if it be so, then the other is a good overt-act too. For it is a distinct thing from that which was a perfect sentence before; and it either requires a 'likewise,' or the word 'proditorie' must be repeated. They have not so much as said 'similiter Consenserunt,' or 'simili modo;' there is an 'et' indeed, but that does not so couple the sentences together, as not to make them distinct acts. There are several 'ets' through the whole indictment, but that does not, as Mr. Cowper would have it, couple all together to make one overt-act.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, if what Mr. Cowper says be allowed, (viz.) that the 'et' makes it one intire sentence, then there is no overt-act at all; for after the treason alleged, the clauses are coupled to one another by an 'et,' and consequently, by Mr. Cowper's way of arguing, the whole indictment is but one entire sentence.

L. C. J. I do not understand your meaning as to that; they tell you 'proditorie' is alleged to the consulting, contriving and agreeing, then they tell you what was the subject matter of that contrivance and agreement, to assassinate the king, and in order to that they agreed there should be forty men; is not that good enough, without 'Proditorie' to every line?

Sir B. Shower. No, it is not said in 'Ordine ad,' there is no such thing; but only they did consult of the ways and means, and did agree that 40 horsemen should do it, and afterwards did agree to provide horses and instruments of war. Now that being with a 'Quodque,' they say makes a new overt-act; but I cannot understand why 'Quodque' is not as much a 'Copulative' as 'Et,' and the one should not have the same effect as the other.

L. C. J. First, it tells you there was a consult and agreement to assassinate the king, and for the accomplishment of the said assassination; afterwards 'eisdem die et Anno Proditorie' 'Tractaverunt et Consultaverunt de viis et modis,' how they should kill the king.

Sir B. Shower. That is one overt-act, say we, and there you should stop.

L. C. J. 'Et Consenserunt et Agreeverunt' 'quod quadraginta Homines,' &c. it is all at the same time, and must be intended the same consult and contrivance; that they consulted of the ways and means, and then agreed so many men should be provided.

Mr. Phipps. No, my lord, we say that is another overt-act.

L. C. J. Treby. It seems to me to be a specifying and particularising the ways and means, that they had consulted of, and concluded on.

Sir B. Shower. If it had been a specifying, it had been much better to put in either then and there, or that this was the result of the consultation.

L. C. J. Treby. It does seem to me so, that it was the result of the consultation, and it is well enough.

L. C. J. You had better have saved these kind of exceptions till the trial was over.

Sir B. Shower. But, my lord, if there be one overt-act ill laid, I submit it whether they can give any evidence of that overt-act.

L. C. J. Treby. No doubt of that, they cannot; but we think it is as well laid as it could be laid.

L. C. J. Truly I am not well satisfied, that it is necessary after you have laid the 'Proditorie,' as to the particular treason, to lay it again to the overt-act. For the overt-act is but evidence of the treason: the treason itself lies in the compassing, which is an act of the mind.

L. C. J. Treby. You cannot indict a man of treason for assassinating or killing the king, but you must in every such case frame the indictment upon the article for compassing and imagining the death of the king; which must be laid to be done traitorously. Then, when afterwards you say the person accused did wound him, or imprison him, or consult and agree to assassinate him, or did actually assassinate him, these are but so many overt-acts of compassing the death; and you having first said that he did 'Proditorie' compass and imagine the king's death, you have thereby shown that you charge him with a greater offence than felony (which my lord Coke says is the use of the word 'Proditorie;') and that being thus done, I do not apprehend it to be necessary that you should add 'Proditorie' to all the rest of the following particulars; for they are only external discoveries of the inward treason; and more properly deemed to be evidence of the treason, than to be the treason itself.

L. C. J. The treason is consummated in the intention; besides the words of the statute make that the treason, not the overt-act, that is but evidence, and so it was held, (not upon this exception, but upon the reason that my lord speaks of) in the Case of the Regicides of king Charles the First, That the indictment should not be for killing the king, but for compassing and imagining his death, and the killing was alleged as an overt-act.

Sir B. Shower. It must be so if it were for levying of war.

L. C. J. Most true; for levying the war is the treason; but in this case we think it is no exception.

Att. Gen. Then let us have the fifth.

Sir B. Shower. Then, my lord, here is another thing. It is a question whether there be any overt-act presented by the jury at all. The indictment says, 'Juratores pro Domino Rege' 'presentant,' that they as false traitors did compass the death of the king and the slaughter of his subjects, and they did meet, and consult, and agree how to do it, 'Et iidem Christophorus Knightley' and the rest, to fulfil their said traitorous intentions and imaginations did, afterwards, the 10th of February, buy arms and horses. Now our objection is, That it does not appear, that any one of these overt-acts are the presentment of the jury; with submission they ought to have begun it again, either with a 'Quodque,' or something that should have referred it to the first, 'Juratores' 'presentant,' or else they must have begun quite again, with a 'Juratores Uterius presentant,' and not have coupled them as this is with an 'Et.' The most forms begin with an 'uterius presentant,' but here we find no overt-act is so introduced. They might present part, and not present the other part, for any thing that does appear. Every thing ought to be laid positively, as the jury's dictum; it may be only the clerk's saying, and not the jury's, for any thing that does appear. Your lordship remembers the case of the king and Trobridge, upon a Writ of Error to reverse a judgment for erecting and continuing a cottage against the form of the statute; now 'Contra' 'forpam Statuti' was in the beginning of the indictment, but not in the conclusion; to the erecting but not the continuing. And though there was there 'Juratores ulterius dicunt,' it was not 'super Sacramentum suum,' and they did not say, he did continue it against the statute; and there being no formal presentment, that he maintained the cottage notwithstanding the act, 'Et' did not so couple it to the first part, as to make it a good presentment. So we say in this case, this is a fault, and different from all the common forms; there ought to be a direct presentment of each overt-act, and not coupled by an 'Et.' For 'Et' will not do it; for it is a distinct overt-act every one, and should have been: 'Et quod Consultaverunt, quodque Agreeverunt,' that a certain number should do so and so; and to be sure, it should have been so at the last overt-act, which is only 'Et idem Christophorus Knightley,' &c. did buy arms and horses. Now this last 'Et,' being a loose conjunction copulative, in common sense ought to refer to that which they had agreed upon, for that is last mentioned there, and the natural sense leads thither, and not to the beginning of the bill 'Juratores præsentant quod.'

Mr. Phipps. I shall not trouble your lordship further; they ought to have put in a 'quodque,' or an 'Uterius præsentant.'

Att. Gen. Where would you have the 'Quodque,' or the 'Uterius præsentant?'

Mr. Phipps. Either to every overt-act, or at least to that last.

Att. Gen. The indictment sets forth, that they committed such and such a treason: their objection is, that 'quodque' is not put into every overt-act; and our answer is, that the first 'quod' governs all that relates to that treason. It may be, if there were too distinct treasons in the indictment, when you come to set forth the second treason, you should say 'Juratores ulterius præsentant' the second treason; but the overt-acts to prove the same treason, are all parts of that treason, and make but one species of treason, which is the imagining the death of the king. There is the treason; and to bring it to pass, they did so and so: this, my lord, must be part of the finding of the jury as well as the treason itself, of which these are the overt-acts. But then if you will lay the levying of war in the same indictment, then it may be you must say 'Juratores ulterius præsentant quod,' &c. But it had been a strange absurdity to say, 'Juratores ulterius præsentant,' such and such overt-acts: for the overt-act is not a further indictment, but only a setting forth that which is evidence, upon which they found the indictment for treason.

Sol. Gen. What the indictment says, is as direct affirmation as can be all along of the presentment of the jury, that the prisoner and others did compass and imagine the death of the king; and to bring it about, they did consult together, and did agree to make use of such and such means, and were to have a party of 40 men, and they bought arms and horses. Now it does not repeat 'quodque,' or 'ulterius præsentant quod,' to every one of those sentences, that they did so and so, and that they did so and so. Now I would fain know the difference between saying, and they did such a thing, and saying, and that they did such a thing. That is all the difference that they think to overturn this indictment for. The omitting of a 'Juratores ulterius præsentant,' certainly is nothing; for the first presentment runs through the whole indictment, and there does not need an 'Uterius.'

Sir B. Shower. Certainly there should have been a 'Quodque' at least.

L. C. J. No, indeed, I think it is better as it is; than as you would have it; because the first 'Quod' goes through the whole. That in order thereunto he did so and so; would you have it said 'et quod' in order thereunto he did so and so; but though that may be good sense, I think it is not so good as the other. This indictment is for one sort of treason, and that is, for compassing the death of the king: and it is, I think, more proper to have but one 'Quod,' than to have more; for it makes the whole indictment more entire. As to the 'Juratores ulterius præsentant,' that is never proper, where the species of treason is the same: for, indeed, if there had been two distinct treasons, the one for compassing the death of the king, and the other for levying of war, in that case you must bring it in by 'ulterius præsentant:' because they are two several offences, though comprised in one bill, and they are in law as two indictments. And so it is in the case that you mentioned of cottages: it is one offence to erect a cottage, and another offence to continue a cottage, and they are to have several punishments; and because they there jumbled them both together in one indictment, that indictment was held to be nought: for, by law, the indictment for erecting a cottage, ought to conclude 'contra formam Statuti; and then the jury must begin again, 'et ulterius præsentant quod' the cottage was continued against the form of the statute: because they are several offences. But here the high-treason is but one and the same offence, and the other things are but overt-acts to manifest this treason, the compassing the death of the king; and truly, I think, it is better as it is.

Mr. Phipps. I have seen several precedents of indictments, where the several overt-acts were to the same high-treason, but still they had each an 'ulterius præsentant.'

Att. Gen. I believe it is hard to find many indictments in the same words: I am sure all are not.

L. C. Baron. (sir Edward Ward). Is it not as great an affirmation to say, and they did such a thing, as to say, and that they did such a thing?

L. C. J. I cannot reconcile it to my reason, but it should be as good sense without 'that' as with it.

L. C. J. Treby. In a long deed it begins, 'This indenture witnesseth that' the party granted so and so, and the party covenants thus and thus; and so it goes on commonly, without renewing the word 'that' to the subsequent clauses: but yet the first expression (This indenture witnesseth that) governs the whole deed, though it be many skins of parchment.

L. C. J. If you begin with an indenture, you begin, That it witnesseth so and so; without renewing, unless it be a very distinct thing.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we think that similitude makes for us. A. B. covenants so and so in a conveyance, and then farther, that so and so.

L. C. J. But there you restrain that is the beginning of the covenant to every particular in that covenant.

Att. Gen. Will your lordship please to call the jury now?

L. C. J. Have you a mind to go on with the trial, or to go to dinner?

Att. Gen. I believe your lordship can try but one more to night, and that may be as well after dinner as before.

L. C. J. Well, then, adjourn till five o'clock, and in the mean time, you keeper, knock off the prisoner's fetters.

Keeper. They shall, my lord.

Then the Court adjourned till five o'clock in the afternoon, it being then about three.

Post Meridiem, the 21st of April, 1696. The Court returned, and was resumed about six in the Evening.

Cl. of Ar. Keeper of Newgate, bring Charles Cranburne to the bar, (Which was done). Charles Cranburne, hold up thy hand. (Which he did). Those good men that you shall hear called and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; and therefore if you will challenge them or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Cranburne. My lord, I humbly desire I may have pen, ink, and paper.

Cryer. Vous avez.

Cl. of Ar. William Underhill.

Cl. of Ar. William Withers.

Cranb. I challenge him.

Mr. Phipps. If your lordship pleases, those that were of the last jury I hope shall not be called of this jury; this prisoner being tried upon the same indictment the last was.

L. C. J. If they be not, it shall be in ease to them, but it is not in favour of you.

Mr. Phipps. We humbly conceive, having given their verdict upon the same indictment, they are not such indifferent persons as the law intends they should be, and think it is good reason they should not serve upon this jury.

L. C. J. What though it be upon the same indictment? The evidence is not the same; for they are distinct offences.

Mr. Phipps. I do not know whether it be a good cause of challenge, but submit it to your lordship.

L. C. J. Well, you may doubt of it if you please, and try the exception.*

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyez! If any one can inform my lords the king's justices of Oyer and Terminer, the king's serjeant, or the king's attorney-general, before this inquest be taken, of the high-treason wherof the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, let them come forth and they shall be heard; for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance: and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, do you think we shall be able to try the other to night?

Att. Gen. That is according as this holds, my lord.

L. C. J. I speak it for the ease of the jury, that they might be dispatched, and not attend another day.

Att. Gen. I doubt we cannot try any more than this to night.

L. C. J. Well, it is no great matter, it will be but a morning's work; it may be too great a stress and a hurry to do any more to night; and therefore we will discharge the jury for to night, those of them that are not sworn; but we will be here to-morrow morning by seven o'clock; and therefore, pray, gentlemen, attend early.

Cl. of Ar. Charles Cranburne, hold up thy hand, (which he did). You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of Charles Cranburne, late of the parish of St. Paul Covent-garden, in the county of Middlesex, yeoman; for that he, with Christopher Knightley, late of the same parish and county, gentleman, and Robert Lowick, late of the same parish and county, gentleman, and Ambrose Rookwood, late of the same parish and county, gentleman, the fear of God in their hearts not having, nor weighing the duty of their allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, against the most serene, most illustrious, most clement, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord, William the Third, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. their supreme, true, rightful, lawful, and undoubted lord, the cordial love, and the true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance which every faithful subject of our said lord the king that now is, towards him our said lord the king should bear, and of right ought to bear, withdrawing, and wholly to extinguish, intending and contriving, and with all their strength, purposing, designing and conspiring the government of this kingdom of England, under him our said lord the king that now is of right, duty, happily, and very well established, altogether to subvert, change and alter; as also our said lord the king to death and final destruction to put and bring, and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England into intolerable and most miserable slavery to Lewis the French king to subjugate and enthrall, the 10th day of February in the 7th year of the reign of our said lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at the parish of St. Paul Covent-garden aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, de-viciously, and traitorously, did compass, imagine and contrive, purpose, design and intend our said lord the king that now is, to slay, kill, and murder, and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of him our said lord the king, throughout this whole kingdom of England to make and cause; and they said most wicked, impious, and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, contrivances and purposes aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, they the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, and very many other false traitors to the jurors unknown; afterwards, to wit, the same 10th day of February, in the year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county abovesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, traitorously, and with force and arms, did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent, and agree, him our said lord the king that now is, by lying in wait and wile, to assassinate, kill and murder: and that execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing the sooner to execute and perpetrate; afterwards, to wit, the same day and year, and divers other days and times, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously did treat, propose, and consult of the ways, manner, and means, and the time and place where, when, how, and in what manner our said lord the king so by lying in wait the more easily they might kill: and did consent, agree, and assent, that forty horsemen, or thereabout (of whom they the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, should be four; and every one of them traitorously took upon himself to be one) with guns, muskets, and pistols, charged with gun-powder and leaden bullets, and with swords, rapiers, and other weapons armed, should lie in wait, and be in ambush our said lord the king, in his coach being, when he should go abroad, to set upon; and that a certain and competent number of those men so armed, upon the guards of our said lord the king, then attending him, and being with him, should set upon, and there should fight with and overcome; whilst others of the same men so armed, him our said lord the king should assassinate, slay, kill, and murder. And they the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, the treasons, and all their treasonable intentions, purposes and contrivances aforesaid to execute, perform, fulfil, and bring to effect, afterwards, (to wit) the aforesaid 10th day of February, in the 7th year abovesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, divers houses and very many arms, guns, pistols, swords and rapiers, and other weapons, ammunition, and warlike things, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously, secretly, and traitorously did change, buy, gather together, and convey; and to be bought, obtained, gotten, conveyed, and possessed did cause, with that intent them in, and about the detestable, horrid, and execrable assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king that now is, as aforesaid, to be used, employed, and bestowed: and the same promises the more safely and certainly to execute, do, and perpetrate, the aforesaid Christopher Knightley, with one Edward King (late of high-treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said lord the king that now is, duly convicted and attainted), by the consent and assent of divers of the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, the aforesaid 10th day of February, in the 7th year aforesaid, traitorously did go, and came unto the place proposed, where such intended assassination, killing, and murdering of our said lord the king, by lying in wait, should be done, perpetrated and committed, to view, see, and observe the conveniency and fitness of the same place for such lying in wait, assassination, and killing, there to be done, perpetrated and committed; and that place so being seen and observed, afterwards, to wit, the same day and year, his observations thereof to several of the said traitors and conspirators did relate and impart, to wit, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid; and the said Charles Cranburne the same day and year there, in order to the same execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing of our said lord the king, by the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, the more readily and boldly to execute, perpetrate, and commit, advisedly, knowingly, and traitorously did bear and carry among divers of these traitors and conspirators forward and backward from some to others of them, a list of the names of divers men of them who were designed and appointed our said lord the king, so as aforesaid, by lying in wait, to kill and murder, against the duty of his allegiance, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are; your charge is to inquire, whether he be guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty: if you find him guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since: if you find him not guilty, you are to inquire whether he fled for it; if you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty: if you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more: and hear your evidence.

Mr. Mountague. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an indictment of high-treason that is found against four persons; but the particular treason against the prisoner at the bar, is for compassing and imagining the death of the king, and endeavouring to subvert the government, and contrive the motion to Lewis the French king; and the indictment sets forth, that the prisoner at the bar did for this purpose meet and consult with several false traitors to the king and government, of the ways, manner, and means how; and the time and place when and where to assassinate the king; and at length they agreed that forty horsemen should go together; and set upon the king in his coach, as he returned from hunting; some to attack the coach, while others set upon the guards. The indictment does further charge him with getting horses and arms, and particularly with carrying a list of the assassins from one to another. These are the particular things charged in the indictment, and to this indictment he has pleaded not guilty; if we prove the fact, gentlemen, we do not doubt your justice.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; the prisoner at the bar, Charles Cranburne, is indicted for high-treason, in compassing and imagining the death of the king. Gentlemen, the overt-acts laid in the indictment to prove the prisoner guilty are, that he was at several meetings and consultations about the manner of putting this design in execution; at which meetings it was agreed, that there should be about forty horsemen in number prepared, and armed for that purpose, and they did provide horses and arms for that very thing, and did agree to put it in execution.

Gentlemen, the evidence that you will hear produced against the prisoner at the bar will be of this nature: You will hear from the witnesses, that about Christmas last, or the beginning of January, sir George Barclay did come over from France from the late king James, to whom he was an officer in his guards, with a commission for attacking the prince of Orange, or levying war upon his person. He came over about that time, and several troopers of the late king James's guards, to assist him in that barbarous conspiracy. When sir George Barclay came over, he did acquaint with this design several persons in England, that he thought proper to be accomplices with him in it; particularly captain Porter, Mr. Charnock, sir William Parkyns, and several others whose names you will hear of, and they had several meetings about it the beginning of February, at capt. Porter's lodgings, at the Nag's-Head in Covent-garden, at the Sun tavern in the Strand, at the Globe tavern in Hatten-garden, and several other places where they consulted in what manner they might attempt and accomplish this bloody design.

Gentlemen, you will hear, that at these meetings it was proposed, that they should do it by ambuscade as the king came from Richmond hunting, whither he used to go upon Saturdays; where were for doing it on this side the water. And so their opinions being divided, it was thought necessary to find out another place which was the best place; and in order thereto they employed captain Porter,

Mr. Knightley, and Mr. King (who was excused) to view the ground; and accordingly they went, and pitched upon the lane between Brentford and Turnham-green for this purpose, as the most convenient place: and having so done, they came back, and gave an account to those that had appointed to meet them, to hear the success of their expedition, at the Nag's-Head in Covent-garden; and in that place, you will find by the evidence, that those persons who were the heads of the conspiracy, undertook to find their several proportions of men, for whom they would undertake that would go with them, and be concerned in this design. Sir George Barclay was to furnish about twenty. He had the command of the troopers that came from France, and those other officers that came thence were under him. Captain Porter was to furnish seven, Charnock was to furnish eight, sir William Parkyns was to furnish five horses and three men, and, I think, Lowick was to furnish some more: in the whole number they reckoned there should be about forty.

It will appear, gentlemen, that the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Cranburne, was one of the men that captain Porter undertook to get, and engage in this design; and accordingly captain Porter did acquaint Mr. Cranburne with it; and he did undertake to be one, and to be ready to go with him, and be concerned in this assassination. You will find he was acquainted with it about the 14th of February, the day before the first time that they intended to assault the king: then he did undertake and agree to prepare himself against the next day. The next day, which was the 15th of February, they had several meetings, and they were making preparation in order to go out. It happened, by great providence, his majesty did not go abroad that day, and thereupon they dispersed themselves; but they had meetings afterwards, at which meetings the prisoner was present with captain Porter, Mr. Pendergrass, La Rue, and several others that were concerned in the conspiracy, particularly the 21st of February, the day before the second time they were to have put this in execution. Captain Porter being at the Sun tavern, with several other gentlemen, and they resolving to have it executed the next day, if the king went abroad; captain Porter sent for Cranburne, and Keyes that was executed, and Kendrick and Shesborn, four of those that he had undertaken for, (of whom, I say, Cranburne, the prisoner at the bar, was one) and then he acquainted them that they were resolved to go on with it the next day. And then they agreed to be in a readiness accordingly. The next day the prisoner, with some others, met at Mr. Porter's, where they were preparing to go out and attack the king, and they had several discourses about the ways and means of doing it; and particularly captain Porter at that time said, that he had a very good gun that held about six or eight bullets, and that Mr. Pendergrass was to have, who was to attack the coach, and shoot into the coach: Mr. Cranburne was there present at that time; and Mr. Cranburne was employed particularly by capt. Porter to carry a list that Porter writ of the names of several men that were to act in it under him, and this he was to carry to Charnock; Porter writ it and gave it him, and he carried it, with directions to bring it back with the list of the names of Mr. Charnock's men. Cranburne did accordingly at that time carry the list of the names to captain Charnock, and brought it back, with an additional list from capt. Charnock, of his men.

At that time, you will hear further, when Cranburne brought the list, he brought an account that he heard the king did certainly go abroad: for Mr. Charnock had intelligence so from Chambers, who lay at Kensington to get intelligence: at which there was very great rejoicing among all that were present at that time, hoping they should have an opportunity to put this execrable design in execution; and so they prepared all of them to go out. There were several inns in Turnham Green and Brentford, and thereabouts, and they were to be placed two or three in an inn, that they might be ready to get together when time should serve. It happened the king did not go abroad that day neither; there being some discovery of this design, and so they did disperse themselves, as apprehending it was discovered.

Gentlemen, it will appear by several witnesses, that the prisoner at the bar was engaged in this horrid treasonable design, and was to have acted a part in it. We will tell our witnesses that will make the particulars out to you, and we do not question but you will do what is right. First, call captain Porter.

Sol. Gen. Pray, if you please, capt. Porter, give the court and the jury an account what you know of this wicked intended assassination, and what share the prisoner at the bar had in it?

Porter. My lord, before this wicked assassination was on foot, the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Cranburne, was employed by me to buy arms; I used to give him money to go to the brokers to buy arms at second-hand, and he brought a sword-cutter to me, of whom I bought about twenty swords. And when sir George Barclay came into England, and this business was resolved upon, I acquainted him with the design, and promised to mount him. He never was at any of the meetings with captain Charnock, sir George Barclay, or sir Wm. Parkyn; but he went to look for a horse, and was ready both Saturdays to go along with me. On Saturday the 22d I sent him with a message to sir William Parkyn, for the note for the two horses, which he had promised me to furnish me with; out of his fire that he was to furnish; he came back again, and told me that there was a messenger came and said that the king did go out, and he knew where to have the two horses; that Mr. Charnock was afraid we should not have the full number of men, and desired me to send him the names of my men; I did write a list of the names of my men, and I went afterwards to the Blue-Ponds in Spring-garden, whither he was to come to me; he did so, and he brought back the list of my men, with the list of Mr. Charnock's men written underneath it, and at the same time news was brought that the king did not go abroad that day.

L. C. J. You say, that before the assassination was set on foot, you employed him to buy arms and horses?

Porter. My lord, I acquainted him with it the Friday before the first Saturday.

L. C. J. You said before the assassination you employed him to buy arms: when was that?

Porter. I said before the assassination was on foot I employed him to buy arms. I told him I was to be a captain in colonel Parker's regiment, and promised to make him my quarter-master.

L. C. J. How long ago was this? Was it a week before the assassination was on foot?

Porter. He has known of my being a captain in col. Parker's regiment this two years.

Att. Gen. I do doubt, my lord, he does not distinguish the times when he bought the arms, and when the assassination was.

L. C. J. Yes yes, he does now; I misapprehended him at first, and thought he said he had employed him to buy arms a week before the assassination was on foot; but he says it was a longer time.

Att. Gen. I desire, my lord, he may be asked what time he bought arms before this assassination: when was the last time he bought arms?

Porter. It was several months before the assassination.

Att. Gen. Was it within a year before it?

Porter. Yes; I believe it was within a year. I gave him several times money for that purpose, in all above ten pounds, and he told me, one with another, he had bought ten case of pistols, and kept them in the house till there were occasion.

Att. Gen. How long ago is it?

Porter. I believe about a year; within a year.

Att. Gen. When did you first acquaint him with the assassination?

Porter. Presently after sir George Barclay acquainted me with it; I sent to him, to desire him to get the pistols clean and ready.

Att. Gen. Did you tell him of the design?

Porter. I told him there was a design on foot, and I would tell him more when I saw him next; and I desired him to get the swords from the sword-cutlers, and the pistols clean and ready. And I met him afterwards, and told him of the design, and that we intended to do it on Saturday the 15th; and he engaged to be ready and make one. On the Friday before the 22d he went with me to the Cook-pit, and there we met with one Mr. Gunn, and I asked him if he knew where any good hackney horses might be had? He said he believed he did; and I sent Cranburne with him, and he came back, and told me he had found two or three out in Bloomsbury.

L. C. J. Look ye, captain Porter, you must not speak so fast, it is impossible to understand so much matter as you deliver without distinguishing of times. You said, that some long time before the assassination was on foot you sent him to buy arms; for what purpose were those arms?

Att. Gen. My lord, he has told you—

L. C. J. Pray, let me hear it from him again.

Porter. I say, my lord, he knew of my being a captain in colonel Parker's regiment this two years.

L. C. J. But what were those arms for that he bought?

Porter. To be ready against king James landed, which was designed several times.

L. C. J. Why, now you make the matter clear to me.

Att. Gen. My lord, that is not the thing we go upon, that is but introductory to the business that we are now trying. Therefore we desire to know of him? captain Porter, when did you first acquaint Cranburne of the assassination of the king?

Porter. As soon as sir George Barclay acquainted me with it, and desired me to get what men I could to effect it. I sent for Cranburne to my lodgings in Norfolk-street, and he came to me one morning; and I told him there was a design on foot, and I would tell him more of it afterwards.

Sol. Gen. When was it that sir George Barclay acquainted you with it?

Porter. About the latter end of January.

Att. Gen. And what said he to it when you acquainted him with it?

Porter. He did agree to go with me, and I promised to furnish him with horse and arms; and on Friday before the 15th I sent him with three case of pistols to sir William Parkyns, to furnish the three men he was to mount with his own horses.

L. C. J. Who was to have those three case of pistols?

Porter. Sir William Parkyns was; and he carried them to sir William Parkyns's.

Att. Gen. How long was this, do you say, before the assassination was to have been?

Porter. It was Friday before the 15th.

Att. Gen. That was before the first time that it was to have been done?

Porter. Yes; and Friday before the last, I sent him to look after the horses that Gunn said he believed he could help me to, and he came to me to the Gun-tavern in the Strand, and told me he and Jeffery Gunn had found three horses in Bloomsbury, and I came out of the rooth where I was with sir George Barclay and others, and there was Kendrick, and Keyes, and Cranburne, and I told them we were resolved to put it in execution the next day.

Att. Gen. Well, pray what discourse had you with him the next day?

Porter. The next day, the 22d, he came to my lodging at Maiden-lane, and I sent him to sir William Parkyns for a note for the two horses, that I was to mount of his: he came back and told me, he knew where to have them, and that captain Charnock was afraid we should not have our complement of men, and desired me to send him an account what men I could bring, which I did by Mr. Cranburne, and being to go to the Blue-Posts, ordered him to bring it me thither, and he did bring it back to me to the Blue-Posts, with captain Charnock's list underneath.

Sol. Gen. Pray, captain Porter, was there any body present when you sent the list, and the prisoner brought it back to you?

Porter. Yes, there was Mr. De la Rue, and captain Pendergrass, and Mr. King, I know of none else.

Att. Gen. Pray do you remember what healths were drunk after you heard the king was not to go abroad?

Porter. I do not remember what healths were drunk that day particularly; but whether it were Thursday or Friday, (I cannot tell particularly the day). We drank a health to the squeezing of the Rotten Orange upon the next Saturday.

Att. Gen. Who was present that day when that health was drunk?

Porter. Mr. Cranburne was there present at that time, and did drink the health.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Sir, did he meet you by appointment on Saturday the 15th, or was it by accident?

Porter. By appointment, as all the rest did, to get ready, as all the rest did, to go upon the design; and so it was both days.

Sir B. Shower. If they have done with Mr. Porter, we would ask him a question or two for the prisoner: we desire to know when it was that those arms were bought that he talks of? For we must acknowledge that Mr. Cranburne heretofore went upon several messages for captain Porter; when was that buying of arms?

Porter. I tell you, I cannot exactly tell the month.

Cranburne. Do you remember the year?

Porter. I believe it was less than a year before the assassination was on foot.

Cranburne. If you remember, Sir, it was a month before colonel Parker was put in the Tower.

Porter. It was several times; I cannot tell the particular times.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, I desire to know, when he first communicated this design to Mr. Cranburne? and who was by, and where it was?

Porter. I told you I sent for Mr. Cranburne one day in the week before the 15th, and he came to me at my lodging in Norfolk-street, and I acquainted him that sir George Barclay was come, and there was such a design on foot; and I desired him to get those pistols that he had of mine ready, and cleaned, that they might be ready for the execution.

Sir B. Shower. What day was that?

Porter. One day in the week before the 15th.

Cranburne. Did you ever name sir George Barclay to me in your life?

Porter. Yes; I did; I told you he was come from France.

Cranburne. Where was that, at Mr. —?

Porter. In Norfolk-street, where I lay.

Cranburne. Who was by?

Porter. Nobody but myself.

Sir B. Shower. Upon what occasion did you meet there?

Porter. I sent for him to my lodging.

Sir B. Shower. How long had sir George Barclay been in town, before that time?

Porter. I cannot tell the time when he came to town.

Sir B. Shower. How long was it after he came to town before you saw him? Had you seen him a week or a fortnight before? Pray recollect yourself.

Porter. I told you that the first time I heard of him, was the latter end of January; captain Charnock told me he was come, but I was then sick of the gout.

Sir B. Shower. Now then I would desire to know, who was by, upon the Friday before the 22d, at the Sun-tavern in the Strand, when you and Mr. Cranburne were there?

Porter. I did tell you, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. I desire to know, whether there was any body besides Mr. Cranburne, Kendrick, and Keyes?

Porter. Sir, I will tell you all I can remember; I was in one room with sir George Barclay, and there was sir William Parkyns, captain Charnock, and myself; and afterwards I went into another room, where there was Kendrick, and Cranburne, and Keyes; and Jeffery Gunn came in afterwards; I remember nobody else.

Mr. Phipps. Was not Gunn there when you first came in?

Porter. To the best of my remembrance, he came in afterwards.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, this may be a very material part of our defence, and therefore we must enquire a little the more into it. Mr. Porter is pleased to say, that he was in a room with sir George Barclay, and Charnock, and sir William Parkyns; and he came out into another room, where was Mr. Cranburne, Kendrick, and Keyes; and there he says, after he had been there some time, Gunn came in; I desire to know whether Gunn was there when he first came in?

Porter. To the best of my remembrance, he came in afterwards; but I cannot positively say I was in and out several times.

Phipps. At the time that you communicated this design to Mr. Cranburne, what said he?

Porter. When I first communicated this to him, I told him there was a thing on foot for the service of king James, and desired him to go along with me.

L. C. J. What kind of service did you tell him it was?

Porter. He asked me, what kind of service it was? I told him sir George Barclay was come over, and I told him the whole design of the assassination of the prince of Orange, that it was intended to take him off, as he came from Richmond from hunting.

Mr. Phipps. And pray what did Mr. Cranburne say to you?

Porter. He said he would be ready to go along with me.

Mr. Phipps. You say, you sent by him three case of pistols to sir William Parkyns; at that time did you tell him for what design those pistols were?

Porter. I told him, they were for the three men that sir William Parkyns was to mount upon three of his five horses.

Cranburne. Did you speak to me to carry those pistols to sir William Parkyns?

Porter. I think so, to the best of my remembrance I ordered you myself to carry them.

Sir B. Shower. Captain Porter, I desire you to recollect yourself, and tell us plainly, whether the design was communicated to Mr. Cranburne before the 15th?

Porter. Certainly, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. Are you sure of it?

Porter. Yes, Sir, I am sure of it.

Sir B. Shower. I ask you, because you know what has been said upon this occasion in other trials.

Cranburne. Where did you write the note, that you say you sent to sir William Parkyns? Was that note sealed, or was it not?

Porter. I did not tell you that I wrote a note.

Cranburne. You swore that you wrote a note, and sent it by me to sir William Parkyns for two horses.

Porter. I said no such thing, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Look you, captain Porter, let him ask you any questions; and if they be proper answer them, and let not his affirmations or mistakes provoke you to be angry.

Porter. I said, I sent him to sir William Parkyns, for a note to have the horses from Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Phipps. Did you send him with a letter, or was it a message by word of mouth?

Porter. I did send him by word of mouth, for a note.

L. C. J. Pray, gentlemen, observe the evidence: sir William Parkyns was to give a note for two horses, and captain Porter sent Cranburne for the note.

Mr. Phipps. The question therefore that I ask, is, whether he sent a letter for the note, or whether by word of mouth?

Porter. I sent by word of mouth.

Cranburne. Pray will you tell the court what you said upon the 22d to Mr. Pendergast and me, after you came down from the Blue Boats, leaning upon the rail.

Porter. I do not remember a word of it, Sir.

I cannot remember every word that I have spoken.

Sir B. Shower. If you can remember one particular, sure you can remember another. If you cannot remember this, how came you to remember any part of the discourse that happened at the Blue-Posts?

Porter. Because that was material to this business, for I had very soon after a particular occasion to recollect it upon the breaking out of the plot.

Cranburne. Pray what hour was it this Saturday the 15th, that you communicated this design to me?

Porter. I cannot tell what hour, but I say you met at the Blue-Posts Saturday the 15th.

Cranburne. You say, you communicated it to me the 15th.

Att. Gen. He says he communicated it to you, before the 15th.

Cranburne. I desire to know where he was the 14th.

Porter. I say, one day before the 15th; in that week I sent for you to come to my lodgings, and you did come, and there I communicated it to you.

Cranburne. Sir, I was not at your lodgings that week.

Mr. Phipps. What day of the week?

Porter. I cannot be positive whether it was Thursday or Friday, or what day; but one day that week it was.

Mr. Phipps. You ought to be positive when it was.

Porter. I do tell you as near as I can.

Mr. Phipps. With submission, my lord, he ought to be positive one way or other.

L. C. J. Nay, I do not see that he ought to be positive to a day; he may be so if he can.

Cranburne. Pray what day did you say you sent me to sir George Barclay?

Porter. I do not say that I ever sent you to sir George Barclay.

Mr. Phipps. Can you take upon you to say, that he was at your lodgings that week before the 15th?

Porter. To the best of my knowledge it was one day that week.

Mr. Phipps. To the best of your knowledge! Are you sure of it?

L. C. J. Speak as certainly as you can.

Porter. Indeed, I believe so, it was before the 15th. I am sure, I think, it was within three or four days after sir George Barclay had acquainted me with it, I sent to the prisoner to come to me to my lodgings, at Mrs. —, in Norfolk-street, and acquainted him with it.

L. C. J. And when you acquainted him with it, what did you tell him? What part was he to act in it?

Porter. I told him, I would have him go along with me, and that I had set him down for one of my party, and would provide him horse and mine; and he did agree to go along with me.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Webber, Pray let me see Charnock's trial.

Sh. Buckingham. Way, at Bartholemew, is the trial any evidence?

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Sheriff, I know what use I can make of it.

Sol. Gen. Will you ask him any more questions?—Sir B. Shower. No, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Then swear Mr. De la Rue. [Which was done.] Pray, Sir, give the court and the jury, an account what you know of the intended assassination, and what share the prisoner had in it.

De la Rue. It is too long a story to tell you all that I know of this matter; but, if you please, I will tell you what concerns the prisoner at the bar. I am heartily sorry that I have occasion to appear against him, as I would be truly against any body: but since I am here upon my oath, I must declare the truth, and nothing but the truth; and I hope I shall not declare any thing but what is truth. Upon Saturday the 15th of February, the day that the design was to have been put in execution against his majesty, and all that were in the coach with him, and against his guards: I went to Mr. Charnock's lodgings in Norfolk-street, to inform myself whether they resolved on that day to go out upon the design; and I found by Mr. Charnock that they did resolve it, and I stayed there awhile, till such time as Mr. Chambers came in; I did not know whence he came then, but, as I was informed afterwards, he came from Kensington to Mr. Charnock, and his boots were dirty; and Mr. Charnock told me he had sent a messenger to Mr. Porter; and, says he, 'If you will stay a little time, I shall have an answer.' The messenger came back, and told him, That captain Porter dined at the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden. I did not go to dine with him, but went home, where I saw Mr. King, who told me, that the king did not go out that day. I told him, I heard he did not: I found by Mr. Chambers's coming back, and that we had no notice from Mr. Charnock, that it was concluded the king did not go out as it was supposed he should have gone. When I had dined at my lodging, I went to the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden to Mr. Porter, and there were four, or five, or six people with him; there was one Mr. Sherborn, and Mr. Kendrick, and two people that I never saw before, and another person, but I cannot tell now who he was. When we had been there a little while, in comes this unfortunate man at the bar, Mr. Cranburne; I do not know where he had been; but by his coming in so late, I suppose he had not dined, and he ordered the drawer to get him some costeleets. This is all I can say as to that day. I had seen capt. Porter twice or thrice between that and the 22d, and he desired me to be at home on Friday night between eight and nine, and he would send to me: he did send, and I was from home. But when I came I was informed his servant had been to speak with me; and in the morning, about eight or nine o'clock, Saturday the 22d, he sent his servant to me to tell me his master would speak with me at his lodgings. I went to his lodgings, and he then lay in Maiden-lane, at one Brown's a surgeon: when I came in, he was in bed; and he told me in French, 'Tous parties sont prests.' All parties are ready. I understood all along that there were three parties to be engaged; one to attack the king's coach, and the two others the guards: sir George Barclay was to head the first, and Porter and Rookwood, the rest. Mr. Porter arose and dressed himself, and in came Mr. Cranburne; and Mr. Porter went out to him in the dining-room, and what he said I cannot tell: but soon after came in Pendergrass, Mr. Keyes, and Mr. King, and then he takes pen, ink, and paper.

Sir B. Shower. Who took that?

De la Rue. Captain Porter took pen, ink, and paper, and writes down a list of his party, and puts me down first. Mr. Pendergrass asked me if I was the captain? And I made him some answer, but what in particular I cannot tell; I think I told him I knew of the thing before the most did. But I can remember particularly that list was given to Mr. Cranburne, to carry to Mr. Charnock; upon what account it was, I cannot tell; but I concluded, that Mr. Charnock was to be acquainted with those persons that Mr. Porter was sure of; and Mr. Porter at that time told me that he was disappointed of some people, and desired me to get him some other men in their rooms; and he sent particularly to one that Mr. King proposed; and I did go, and brought him to the Blue-Posts, where captain Porter told me he was to dine; and the gentleman I went to, told me he would meet me at the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden. When I came back to Mr. Porter's lodgings, Mr. Porter and Mr. Pendergrass, and Mr. Oldfield, and I, went in a coach to the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden; and when we had been there a little while, Mr. Cranburne came back to give an account of the errand Mr. Porter had sent him upon, and he brings this list.

Att. Gen. Who brought it?

De la Rue. Mr. Cranburne.

Cranburne. Whither did I bring it?

De la Rue. To the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden.

L. C. J. You must not ask any questions till they have done with him. But Mr. De la Rue, let me ask you what day was this?

De la Rue. This was Saturday the 22d of February; and he told Mr. Porter there was a list of Mr. Charnock's men at the bottom of that list; and I took the list in my hand, and there was Mr. Charnock's list of six or seven, or thereabouts, of his party, and at the bottom of it was R. C. I think, for Robert Charnock. Mr. Porter takes Mr. Cranburne from the company into another room, and I went after them, and he told captain Porter, in my hearing, that the king did not go out that day. There is one thing I forgot which now I recollect, and I am sworn on oath to tell the truth, and the whole truth. When I was at Mr. Porter's lodging, he told me the king was to go out; and that Mr. Chambers, the orderly man, had sent word. That the king resolved to go out between ten and eleven.

L. C. J. Who said so?

De la Rue. Mr. Cranburne told me so at Mr. Porter's lodgings: I say I had forgot it, but it occurs to my memory now, that he told me there before he went to the Blue-Posts, that the king did go out that day between ten and eleven; for Mr. Chambers, the orderly man, had been with Mr. Charnock or sir Wm. Parkyns, to let them know so much. And afterwards, when he came back with the list of captain Porter's men, to captain Porter at the Blue Posts, in the Spring-garden, there was at the foot of that list, a list of Mr. Charnock's men in another hand, I suppose writ by himself, but that I cannot swear whose hand it was; and Mr. Porter took him into another room, and then Mr. Cranburne told him the king did not go out, and I believe it was then between eleven and twelve o'clock; and he also told Mr. Porter, that Mr. Charnock was apprehensive the thing was discovered, and therefore desired him to have a care of himself, for he himself was resolved not to lie at home that night; I think, my lord, Mr. Porter did send back Mr. Cranburne to Mr. Charnock; I cannot be positive whether he did or not, but I believe he did; because I am sure Mr. Cranburne did tell Mr. Porter, sir George Barclay would speak with him; and Mr. Porter made answer, why should he desire me to go to him, when he knows I am under some ill circumstances, and he can better come to me? And I believe Mr. Porter did send Mr. Cranburne once again to Mr. Charnock.

L. C. J. Well, pray do not say any thing of any matter, but what you can be positive in.

De la Rue. But Mr. Porter did not go to Mr. Charnock, nor did Mr. Charnock come to him, therefore they staid there and dined; and after dinner, or a little before dinner, Keyes the trumpeter came up and told us, that my lord of Oxford's regiment of Guards was returned from Richmond, foaming: Keys went down stairs again to learn intelligence, as I thought, and came up and told us he saw the king's coaches newly returned to the Mews, and Mr. Cranburne was by all the time; I think this was before dinner, and then we went to dinner.

L. C. J. I tell you again, do not speak any thing that is material, but what you can be positive in.

De la Rue. I am positive as to the thing, and that it was the 22d of February, but I cannot be positive as to all the circumstances. After dinner there was the usual healths, the Jacobite healths to king James, and the prince of Wales, and the Restoration, and the like; and after that I think it was Mr. Porter took an Orange in his hand, and squeezed it, I am sure once in the company did, and drank something to the Rotten Orange, I cannot very well remember just now what it was; but I would be cautious of saying any thing but what is truth; but if your lordship will give me leave to reflect myself, I will tell you what it was.—Oh! it was 'to the squeezing of the Rotten Orange,' and the health went round, and Mr. Cranburne was in the company, and drank the health. But being disappointed and frustrated of the design by the king's not going abroad that day, and Mr. Porter being cautioned by Mr. Charnock to take care of himself, and being told that Mr. Charnock would not lie at home that night, and the guards returning in that manner, they were all apprehensive that the thing had taken air, and the design of assassinating the king was discovered, and therefore Mr. Porter concluded of going out of town; several healths were drunk round, and I think about two o'clock he went out of town, and then the company broke up. This is what I can say as to the prisoner, and I hope I have said nothing but what is truth.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, we desire to know whether they will ask him any questions?

Mr. Phipps. At the time you say this list was given by captain Porter to Mr. Cranburne, did Mr. Porter declare to what purpose the list was sent?

De la Rue. No, Sir, not a word of any such thing. Mr. King was by, and Mr. Pendergrass was by, and I think Mr. Keyes was by, and he writ a list of his party, putting me down first; and Mr. Pendergrass said to me, You are captain, and he gave it to Mr. Cranburne to carry it to Mr. Charnock; what the particular message was, I cannot be positive: indeed I do not very well remember the message, but the list was carried to Mr. Charnock, and to the best of my memory it was to give Mr. Charnock an account what men he was sure of; for Mr. Porter told me of several disappointments he had had, of persons that had promised him, and failed.

Mr. Phipps. Can you remember what Mr. Cranburne said upon that?

De la Rue. No, I do not.

Cranburne. What message was that, you say, I brought from sir George Barclay?

De la Rue. I do not say that you brought any message from sir George Barclay.

Cranburne. You said that I brought a message, that sir George Barclay would see him.

De la Rue. I do not say so; but I say that you told Mr. Porter that Mr. Charnock sent you with a message to let him know that sir Geo. Barclay was desirous to see Mr. Porter, to confer about taking care of themselves.

Cranburne. Did you hear me name sir George Barclay's name?

De la Rue. Yes, I say you told Mr. Porter that Mr. Charnock bid you caution him to take care of himself, and that he would go that way, for sir George Barclay, and he desired to see him; and Mr. Porter said it was an unreasonable thing for Mr. Charnock to desire it, because they knew he was under circumstances that it was not proper for him to go, and he wondered they would not rather come to him.

L. C. J. What time a day was this?

De la Rue. It was about twelve o'clock, I think.

L. C. J. Was it after such time as the news was brought that the king did not go abroad that day?

De la Rue. Yes, my lord, it was after that time.

Mr. Phipps. Were you with sir George Barclay when he was here in England? Did you see him here?

De la Rue. I did not see him on this side of the water. I knew him abroad, and a great many other unfortunate persons, that were concerned in this affair; I knew some of them here, and that they were concerned in the design, but I did not converse with many, indeed with but a very few about it; for to shew that I was not a man that designed to trepan or ensnare any man, I did never exchange two words about this matter with any persons that I knew were concerned in it, but sir William Parkyns, (and that but in a small measure) and Mr. Charnock, and Mr. Porter, and Mr. King, and colonel Parker; except what passed upon the 22d, between Mr. Porter and Mr. Charnock, when Mr. Porter sent Mr. Cranburne to Mr. Charnock. Mr. Cranburne was one who Mr. Porter called his quarter-master: I know this gentleman was commonly depending upon Mr. Porter, but I think I never was much in his company, I did not know what design he had upon him, but I was told by Mr. Porter, that he intended to make him his quarter-master, and I understood Mr. Porter was to have a troop of horse in colonel Parker's regiment.

Mr. Phipps. You say you knew a great many of them that were concerned, but you discoursed and conversed but with a few?

De la Rue. I do so, Sir.

Mr. Phipps. How do you know that they were concerned, when you did not discourse with them?

De la Rue. By information from Mr. Charnock and Mr. Porter.

Mr. Phipps. Do you know any thing more of Mr. Cranburne, than the list, and what you have said already?

De la Rue. I give you an account of all that I do know.

L. C. J. Answer that particular question. Do you know nothing more than what you have said?

De la Rue. No, my lord, I do not remember nor know any more as to Mr. Cranburne than what I have declared, and I am sorry I had occasion to declare so much.

Att. Gen. Then call Mr. Pendergrass.

[Who was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Pray will you give my lord and the jury an account of what you know of the intended assassination, and how far Mr. Cranburne, the prisoner at the bar, was concerned in it.

Pendergrass. My lord, the 19th of February last, I came out of Hampshire, Mr. Porter sent for me to come to town, and I met him that day at the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden, and there he told me of the assassination that was to be done on Saturday following: the next day we dined at the Rose-tavern, where the prisoner dined with us, and we talked of the business; that was Friday the 14th, and we were to be in readiness the next day to assassinate the king, as he was coming from Richmond; but some company coming in afterwards, we left off the discourse, and talked no more that night. The next day that we were to do the business, we met at the Blue-Posts in Spring-garden, and finding the king did not go abroad that Saturday, we dined there at the Blue-Posts, and talked over again of assassinating the king, and the prisoner was by at the same time; they were all mightily concerned the king did not go that Saturday; but when we had dined there, we had no further discourse about the assassination that day, but every body was to prepare against the next Saturday.

L. C. J. Was that agreed upon then?

Pendergrass. Yes, it was by all the company; so we parted that day. Some time the next week I met Mr. Porter, and Mr. Porter asked me, if I had a horseman's sword? I told him, No: says he to Mr. Cranburne, Let capt. Pendergrass have one of the horsemen's swords that you have got. Says Mr. Cranburne to me, If you will come to my house you shall make choice of one yourself, for I have several at home. Said I, Mr. Cranburne, I cannot go that way, but I will take one of your choosing, if so be you will leave it at my lodgings: he said he would do it, and did; he left it at my lodgings in Suffolk-street, which sword I have still. The day following I met him, and he asked me if I had received the sword? I said, I had it; and he said it was very well. After this, I did not see Mr. Cranburne till Saturday the 22d, at which time I came to Mr. Porter's lodgings between nine and ten o'clock in the morning, and the prisoner at the bar was there, and I heard Mr. Porter give him a message to go to sir William Parkyns for some horses, I know not how many. The prisoner went, and in some time after came back again, and brought an account that the king went out that Saturday the 22d to Richmond; so every body was to get ready: and Mr. Cranburne said, that Mr. Charnock desired that Mr. Porter would send a list of his men; upon which Mr. Porter wrote a list of his men, and gave it to the prisoner to carry to Mr. Charnock; and bid him meet him at the Blue-Posts; and Mr. Porter, and Mr. De la Rue, and I, took coach, and went down to Spring-garden, and when we came to the Blue-Posts, there were some persons that I think Mr. De la Rue had appointed to come there: the prisoner came thither, and brought the list back, with a list of Mr. Charnock's men underneath. I know not who the men were, but it is only on the one side of the table in the prisoner's hand; at the same time the prisoner brought an account, that the king did not go abroad that day, and presently after we had the same account from other hands; and captain Porter and I went out of town, and we heard no more of it.

L. C. J. Are you sure that he did agree to this matter before the 15th?

Pendergrass. Yes, I am sure of it; he agreed to it Friday the 14th, at the Rose-tavern, in Covent-garden.

L. C. J. On the 15th, it seems they were disappointed; are you sure there was an agreement to pursue it the 22d?

Pendergrass. Yes, I am sure there was, my lord.

L. C. J. Was the prisoner there?

Pendergrass. Yes, my lord, I am sure that the prisoner at the bar was there.

Cranburne. Pray, Mr. Pendergrass, was there any discourse about this thing when I was there?

Pendergrass. Yes, Mr. Cranburne, you cannot but remember there was.

Cranburne. What hour did I come there, pray, Sir?

Pendergrass. Truly, I cannot be positive to an hour; but you were there while the discourse was.

Cranburne. Whether I did stay there all the while, and who was in the company?

Pendergrass. All the company broke up about six o'clock; there was Mr. King, capt. Porter, Mr. Kendrick, Mr. Cranburne, Mr. Keyes, and myself.

Cranburne. Was Kendrick there when I was there?

Pendergrass. Yes, I am sure of it; I will do you all the justice in the world that I can.

Sir B. Shower. You say, Sir, he did agree upon the 14th to this design; pray what words did he use?

Pendergrass. He did agree that we should attack the king the next day.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, Sir, if you can recollect yourself, what did the prisoner say, or whether you took him to agree by being silent?

Pendergrass. He said, he hoped we should execute our business the next day.

L. C. J. What day was that?

Pendergrass. That was the 14th of February, and the same night I gave account of the matter to my lord Portland.

Mr. Phipps. Did he agree to be one in the execution of the design?

Pendergrass. Yes, he did; he discoursed the matter to me himself.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done with our evidence.

L. C. J. Well, then, what say you to it for the prisoner?

Sir B. Shower. My lord, what we have to say on behalf of the prisoner in this respect is this: Here are but three witnesses produced, and as to one of them, De la Rue, there is no evidence that he gives your lordship and the jury that affects this matter, but only that there was a list given by capt. Porter, and carried by the prisoner to Mr. Charnock, and so brought back again. But he does not recollect, nor does he say that was sent from Porter by the prisoner to Mr. Charnock; now, my lord, the bare carrying of a note of names will be no evidence of treason. Mr. De la Rue does not swear to any privacy of the prisoner, what the list was for, nor to the delivery of the list, which is the overt-act in the indictment; nor upon what account this list was written, or sent, or brought back again, or any word that proceeded from captain Porter to him upon giving the list, or any word when it was brought back again. So that as to De la Rue's testimony, we must submit it to the memories and recollection of your lordship and the jury; we think the only proves a plot in general, of which there is no peradventure, every body is satisfied that there was such a horrible conspiracy: those that have been condemned and executed for it, have owned it, and so it can never be doubted; but he does not say any thing to affect the prisoner at the bar; for as to the drinking of healths, and being present when those healths were drunk, though it be an evidence of disaffection to the government, or too much good manners and complaisance to the company a man is in; yet that disaffection, or civil temper, or complaisance, we hope are no evidences of treason. It is plain the prisoner did depend very much upon captain Porter; he was in truth his servant to go of his errands, and expected an office from him, God knows when; but it does not appear by any particular action, that he did any thing that can be treason, upon Mr. De la Rue's evidence. Then, as to what Mr. Pendergrass says, I must confess his evidence comes home, for he says there was a design of the assassination, and some agreement of the prisoner to it; but I must beg your lordship's favour to observe, upon Mr. Pendergrass's evidence, if that stand alone, it will be but one witness, and then we are safe by the purview of this act of parliament.

L. C. J. Ay, and by the law, before the making of that act.

Sir B. Shower. Then, as to capt. Porter, I must beg leave to say, if our witnesses are come that were absent at the other trial, and they prove what is in my instructions, it will be very much questionable, whether there be any credibility due to his testimony: then if you take off his testimony, there is only the evidence of Mr. Pendergrass; and if he be to be believed, to which I have nothing to say at present, in the case of a man's life, upon an indictment of treason, where the law requires two credible witnesses, his single testimony is not sufficient to convict the prisoner. We beg leave to call our witnesses, and then we shall leave it to your lordship and the jury.

Mr. Phipps. As to the particular overt-act laid in the indictment, the carrying about the list, only Mr. De la Rue speaks to it, and sir Bartholomew Shower has given it an answer, and I shall not repeat it.

L. C. J. Look ye, for that, if any one overt-act is proved by 2 witnesses, it is well enough.

Sir Gen. Besides, they mistake, my lord extremely; for captain Porter and Mr. Pendergrass speak both of them to that particular as to the list.

Sir B. Shower. We do not deny it; the question is, Whether you have two credible witnesses?

Cranburne. Pray, Mr. Pendergrass, do you remember what captain Porter said to you, and I, when we came down to the Blue-Posts, leaning upon the rail?

Pendergrass. Indeed, Sir, I do not.

Cranburne. I would have you recollect yourself; as we stood against the rails in Spring-garden, when we came down from the Blue-Posts, after the design miscarried, Mr. Porter said, Mr. Charnock and they might thank themselves if it were discovered; 'For,' says he, 'I never communicated a word of this thing to any of my party.'

Pendergrass. Indeed, I do not remember a word of it, Sir.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, we have one piece of evidence to offer against the testimony of captain Porter: he says, that he sent Cranburne with Gunn from the Cock-pit to see for hackney horses, and that Cranburne came to him to the Sun-tavern, and there they had some discourse about executing the design the next day; and being asked, who was by, when he communicated the design to Cranburne? and particularly, whether Mr. Gunn was by? He says he came in afterwards, but was not there at the time of the communication about the design. Now we shall prove that Gunn came in with the prisoner, and was with him all the time, and there was no such discourse happened.

Sir B. Shower. Call Jeffery Gunn, and Mary Gerrard. [They appeared.] Your lordship will observe, what captain Porter swore, that he went into the room to Cranburne, and Gunn was not there: now, if we falsify him in that particular, we shall submit to your lordship how far he is to be believed in the rest.

Alt. Gen. Pray, sir Bartholomew, ask your witnesses what you will, but make no descants upon their evidence till you have heard them.

Then the two Witnesses were sworn.

L. C. J. Well, look ye, you are both upon your oaths, consider what you say, speak the truth, and tell all that you know, and nothing but the truth. Which do you begin with?

Mr. Phipps. Jeffery Gunn.—Pray Mr. Gunn, did you go to the Sun-tavern at any time with Mr. Cranburne?—Gunn. Yes, I did.

Mr. Phipps. What day of the month was it?—Gunn. I cannot positively tell the day, it was of a Friday.

Sir B. Shower. Was it of a Friday, in February, or January?

Gunn. It was in February.

Mr. Phipps. Was it before the plot broke out?—Gunn. Yes, it was.

Mr. Phipps. How long was it before the plot broke out?—Gunn. I cannot tell that, truly.

Mr. Phipps. Whence did you go?

Gunn. I was at the Cock-pit, and I went from thence to the Sun-tavern.

Sir B. Shower. Whom did you meet there?

Gunn. I saw captain Porter there.

Sir B. Shower. What room were you in?

Gunn. We went into a room next the street.

Sir B. Shower. Who was there with you?

Gunn. There was Mr. Cranburne, and I, and Mr. Keyes.

Sir B. Shower. How long was it before Mr. Porter came in to you?

Gunn. He came in about half a quarter of an hour after I was there.

Sir B. Shower. Were you there from the beginning till Mr. Cranburne went away?

Gunn. Mr. Cranburne and I went from the Cock-pit together.

Sir B. Shower. How long did you stay there?

Gunn. I was there about an hour and a half.

Sir B. Shower. Were you out of the room at all in that time?

Gunn. Yes, I was out of the room once.

Sir B. Shower. How long were you out of the room?

Gunn. I went home to my lodging.

Sir B. Shower. Were you ever with Mr. Cranburne at the Sun-tavern at any time besides this?—Gunn. Never in my life.

Sir B. Shower. Whom did you leave with him when you went out?

Gunn. Captain Porter and Mr. Keys, as I remember.

Sir B. Shower. Were you there before captain Porter came to him?

Gunn. I was with Mr. Cranburne, and captain Porter came in about a quarter of an hour after; we came from the Cock-pit together.

Sir B. Shower. Pray recollect yourself, and tell us upon your oath, were you there when captain Porter came in?

Gunn. Yes, I think I was there when captain Porter came in.

Sir B. Shower. Did you go and leave him there?

Gunn. We went all out together. I was there about an hour and a half.

L. C. J. Nay, but you said you were absent some time.

Gunn. I went home, and came back again.

Sir B. Shower. When you went home, did you leave Mr. Cranburne behind you?

Gunn. Yes, I think so.

Mr. Phipps. Did you leave captain Porter with him?

Gunn. I think captain Porter was with him then.

Mr. Phipps. But, upon your oath, was you in company with Mr. Cranburne at the Sun-tavern, when captain Porter came first in?

Gunn. Captain Porter went in and out several times.

Sir B. Shower. Did you see captain Porter before you went to your own house?

Gunn. Yes, sure.

Mr. Phipps. Then it cannot be true what Mr. Porter says, that Gunn did not come in till afterwards.

Att. Gen. Now, Mr. Gunn, I would ask you a question or two first. Were you there all the while that Mr. Cranburne was there, or did you go home?—Gunn. I went home.

Att. Gen. Did you come back again?

Gunn. Yes, I went home and eat some victuals.

Att. Gen. How long were you absent?

Gunn. I came back in half a quarter of an hour.

Att. Gen. How far is it to your house?

Gunn. It is not above 100 yards.

Sir B. Shower. Did Mr. Porter come in to you before you went home, when you first came in with Cranburne?

Gunn. He came in after we were in the room.

Mr. Phipps. Captain Porter said, when he came into the room Gunn was not there.

L. C. J. He did not say positively, but, as he remembered; now I would ask you a question or two.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, my lord, our inference from this evidence is this: Captain Porter says, that upon Friday the 21st of February he was with Cranburne at the Sun-tavern, and out of one room into another; he came to Mr. Cranburne, and talked with him of this design, and after that Gunn came into the room, after the communication was over: now this man swears he went from the Cock-pit with Mr. Cranburne, he was with him in the room at first when captain Porter came; some time afterwards he went to his own house, and left captain Porter with Mr. Cranburne, and came back again, and they came away together: now, we say, these two are inconsistent; for captain Porter swears that Gunn was not there till after the communication was over.

L. C. J. As he remembers.

Mr. Phipps. Nay, I think he was positive he came in afterwards.

L. C. J. As I remember, he was not positive; but call captain Porter again.

Mr. Phipps. When you came back from your house, who were in the room?

Gunn. The same company as I left, as far as I remember.

Mr. Mountague. Was captain Porter in the room when you came back?

Gunn. Indeed I cannot directly tell, I believe he was.

L. C. J. Pray observe what your witness says: he says, captain Porter came in and out, and was there several times before he went away.

Gunn. Yes, my lord, he was so.

L. C. J. And you were absent some time; but were you there some time before Porter came in?—Gunn. Yes, I believe I was.

Then Captain Porter came in.

Att. Gen. Look ye, captain Porter, you see that man there?—Porter. Yes.

Att. Gen. Pray give an account of what you know of that man's coming in to you at the Sun-tavern.

Porter. I came several times out of sir George Barclay's room into theirs, and to the best of my remembrance, Mr. Cranburne was there before Gunn came in.

Sir B. Shower. Do you remember whether the first time that you went out of sir George Barclay's room to speak with Mr. Cranburne, Mr. Gunn was there?

Porter. To the best of my remembrance he was not; to the best of my remembrance, Mr. Gunn, I saw Mr. Cranburne in the room before you was there.

Sir B. Shower. Did you not order Gunn to come with him to the Sun-tavern?

Porter. Yes, Sir, I did.

Sir B. Shower. Cannot you tell whether they came together?

Porter. I was not in the room when they came in first; but to the best of my remembrance he was not there when I came in the first time.

L. C. J. Now, Gunn, you hear what captain Porter says; before you went away to your own house, did Mr. Porter come into the room to you?

Gunn. Indeed, my lord, I am not positive, I think he did.

All. Gen. Neither of them is positive, and it is a circumstance not very material; for it seems he was absent, and then the discourse might be.

L. C. J. No, it is not material, but you see upon a strict examination what it comes to.

Sir B. Shower. They are agreed upon it, I perceive, to be positive on neither side.

Mr. Phipps. Mr. Cranburne, pray ask Mrs. Gerrard what you have a mind.

Cranburne. Pray what do you know of captain Porter's going out in disguise, and wearing false hair and vizards, and going upon the highway, and such things?

Gerrard. I know not what Mr. Cranburne means. [At which the people laughed.]

Sir B. Shower. It is no laughing matter, when a man is upon his life.

L. C. J. No, no, let him have fair play; answer the question.

Cranburne. Do you know anything of your master's going abroad in disguises?

Gerrard. I do not know any thing of my master's going upon the highway.

L. C. J. Did he go out with vizards, or any such things?

Gerrard. I never saw him wear a vizard or false beard in my life, but he had once a patch on when he was forced to keep out of the way, upon the account of the Dog-tavern business in Drury-lane.

Mr. Phipps. See if Mr. Edward Boucher is here. [He was called, but did not appear.]

Sir B. Shower. Call Mrs. Barton. [Which was done, but she did not appear.]

Mr. Phipps. Is William Hardyman here? [He was called, but did not appear.]

Sir B. Shower. Then call Simon Dawson, and we have done. [Which was done.]

Crier. They are all called, but they do not

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we must submit it to your lordship's directions, upon the evidence that has been given, as to the credibility of these witnesses, and whether what capt. Porter says, and what Gunn says, be consistent; so that you can be satisfied there are two lawful credible witnesses to prove any overt-act.

L. C. J. Yes, sure; but I would have you debate it, if you believe there be any thing in it.

Sir B. Shower. I submit it to your lordship's directions.

L. C. J. The question is, Whether I should give any directions at all or no, or whether there be any occasion for it?

Cranburne. I declare this openly before this honourable court, and so many noblemen as are here, that Mr. Porter never made me acquainted with this design, till what he swore here.

L. C. J. I cannot tell; it is sworn by two witnesses.

Cranburne. I do declare, though capt. Pendergrass says he does not remember it, that captain Porter did declare in Spring-garden the 22d, when he came out of the Blue-Posts by the rails, If this design miscarry, says he, Mr. Charnock may thank himself: for I never communicated this secret to any of my friends.

L. C. J. But hark ye, do you consider what you say, If this design miscarry? Pray what design was that?

Cranburne. He never named any thing but the design, he did not say what it was.

L. C. J. But why were you employed to carry a list from captain Porter to Mr. Charnock, and to bring a list back again from him to captain Porter?

Cranburne. I did carry the note, but there was nothing mentioned what the list was for.

L. C. J. Then you were there on Friday the 14th, and there the design was proposed to assassinate the king the next day, and you engaged in it.

Cranburne. Not a word of it true, my lord.

L. C. J. Ay, but Mr. Pendergrass swears it, and that you were hearty in the matter, and hoped you should do your business the next day.

Cranburne. I cannot help it if he does swear it.

L. C. J. Then you were at the meeting at the Sun-tavern, the 21st.

Cranburne. My lord, you hear what Gunn says.

L. C. J. As to that, they are neither of them positive; but you did there promise and undertake the matter, that captain Porter is positive in, that it was agreed by you all to do it the 22d; and Mr. Pendergrass says, when you were disappointed the 15th, you all agreed to pursue the same design the Saturday following.

Cranburne. My lord, I did not dine at the Blue-Posts that day.

L. C. J. But you were there; I think, in-dead, Mr. Pendergrass says you came in after dinner, and had some steaks.

Cranburne. I never heard directly nor indirectly of this design, till what I heard them swear here.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Jury, You do understand for what crime this prisoner at the bar is indicted; it is for high-treason, in designing, and compassing the death of the king, which was to be effected by an assassination in the most barbarous and wicked manner, that any attempt of that nature can possibly be made, being to surprise the king, and murder him in his coach.

The question, gentlemen, is, Whether this prisoner be guilty of this crime or no? There have been three witnesses produced that have given evidence against him, captain Porter, Mr. De la Rue, and Mr. Pendergrass; and they do all tell you that there was such a design on foot to assassinate the king, as he came from hunting at Richmond, after he came on this side the water, in the lane between Brentford and Turnham-Green. There were diverse persons engaged in this design, which sir George Barclay, was come from France to promote and manage: captain Porter, as it does appear upon his evidence, was a person that was principally engaged, and at that time was hearty in the prosecution of it.

As to Mr. Cranburne, captain Porter tells you he was a man that he had had a long acquaintance with, and had employed him, and designed to employ him as an officer under him, in case a revolution happened, which it seems about that time; and some time before it, was expected. Captain Porter was to have been a captain, and I think he designed to promote Cranburne to be his quarter-master; and he sent him to buy arms; and preparations were made for that business; but that is not the thing that we are now upon; the matter that now properly falls under our consideration, is this: the coming over of sir George Barclay, the latter end of January, or the beginning of February last; upon which, as it seems, Mr. Porter was engaged; and having an interest in this Cranburne, and there being horses to be furnished to attack the king and his guards about Turnham-Green, this man, Cranburne, was a person that was engaged to be one of the horsemen that were to make the attack; and he tells you that he did employ him to provide horses and swords, and to prepare the pistols; and that he did engage in it, and particularly that the design was to be executed on Saturday the 15th of February, and that he was then ready to go with capt. Porter; but on that Saturday the king did not go abroad, whereby the design was disappointed for that time: afterwards, there was a meeting at the Sun-tavern in the Strand, where he met with sir George Barclay, and others of them; and there comes to that tavern Mr. Cranburne and others, and they were in another room, and captain Porter says he came to them, and did discourse about pursuing the design the very next day, which was agreed, and Cranburne was ready to go the next day.

Then he tells you further, that the next day being Saturday the 22d, the second time that this assassination was to have been executed, upon the desire of Mr. Charnock, who was a person also that was engaged in this design, captain Porter writes a list of the men he could bring, and sent it by Cranburne to Charnock; Cranburne carries the list to Mr. Charnock, and brings it back again with an addition of the names of Mr. Charnock's men underneath.

Mr. De la Rue is called, and he swears to that very circumstance, that Mr. Cranburne was sent by captain Porter with a list to Mr. Charnock, and brought it back again from Mr. Charnock, with an addition of other names.

Then Mr. Pendergrass tells you, that he was with this Mr. Cranburne, the prisoner at the bar, the 14th of February, and there was a discourse of going in pursuance of this design the next day, and the prisoner agreed to it, which he is positive in: he tells you, that when they were disappointed the 15th, being at the Blue-Posts, they then agreed to pursue it the next Saturday; Cranburne was one of them that agreed.

Captain Porter and De la Rue inform you that healths were drank to the late king, and the late queen, and the prince of Wales, as they called him, and then at length, as the concluding health, captain Porter, or some of them in the company, having an orange in his hand, squeezed it, and drank a health to the squeezing of the Rotten Orange, which was pledged by all, and particularly by Mr. Cranburne, as is proved by both captain Porter and De la Rue.

So that now, Gentlemen, I must leave it to you, whether this is not evidence sufficient to prove this man guilty of the treason whereof he is indicted, that is, of designing and intending the assassination of the king, and being engaged as a party to execute this design, whenever there was an opportunity.

The counsel insist upon it, on the behalf of the prisoner, that what captain Porter says is no evidence: in the first place, they urge that he is not a man of credit, for they have mentioned that he used to be disguised, and wear a vizard mask, and go abroad under odd circumstances, and therefore his reputation, they hope is not good enough to make him a credible witness against the prisoner: now the prisoner's witness being produced, says she never knew him go in disguise, or wear a vizard mask, but once he wore a patch, because he was under some ill circumstances about a riot in Drury-lane; every body understands what the meaning of that was, his drinking of healths at a riotous assembly, upon the 10th of June, and he being under some prosecution for that, occasioned him to wear that disguise, but it was not done to hinder any person, or do any mischief.

But then, say they, he is mistaken in his evidence, of the meeting at the Sun-tavern the 21st of February, the day before the last, that this design was to have been executed, for whereas he says, that Gunn was not there when he came to them, yet Gunn was in the company at that time, and whereas he swears positively that they discoursed of going upon the same design to assassinate the king the next day, as was agreed the Saturday before; Gunn heard no such discourse. Gunn is called, and he tells you he did come to the Sun-tavern at that time, with Cranburne and captain Porter, he came into the room, and he heard no such discourse. They did open it, indeed, that Gunn had been there all the while, and if so, then if there had been such a discourse, he must have heard it. Gunn has been examined, and does tell you he was not there all the while, but went out and was absent for some time, about half a quarter of an hour.

They have made a question, whether captain Porter came in when Gunn was there? He says truly he thinks that captain Porter did come into the room while he was there, before he went out, but he cannot tell certainly; he was there some time, while he was there. Then captain Porter was called again, and captain Porter does say he knows Gunn was there, but whether he was there at that time he came in, he cannot say positively; but Gunn says captain Porter was going in and out several times, as Porter says himself; and Gunn was absent for some part of the time. So that I cannot see any sort of contradiction between the evidence that Porter gives, and the evidence that Gunn gives; the one is uncertain, and so is the other as to that circumstance.

But, Gentlemen, they would infer, that if there was any such discourse while Gunn was there, it must be of necessity that Gunn must have heard it; but it is not necessary the discourse should be when Gunn was there: captain Porter swears positively, that there was such a discourse of going the next day to pursue the design, and he says he thinks Gunn was not present at that time when the discourse was, and Gunn says he was absent some part of the time.

And so I must leave it to you: upon the whole matter, if Mr. Cranburne, the prisoner at the bar, did consent and agree to act in this bloody and wicked design, then you are to find him guilty; if you are not satisfied of that upon the evidence you have heard, or you think there is any inconsistency, or incoherence in the testimony on the one side, and the other; and that there is good reason to disbelieve the evidence against the prisoner, then you are to acquit him. You have heard your evidence, and you had best consider of it.

Cl. of the Crown. Who keeps the jury?
Cryer. There is an officer sworn.

Then the Jury withdrew to consider of their verdict, and about a quarter of an hour after returned.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, answer to your names, John Caine?

Mr. Caine. Here. (And so of the rest.)

Cl. of Ar. Are you all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Charles Cranburne, hold up thy hand, (which he did). Look upon the prisoner, how say ye, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements, had he at the time of the treason committed, or at any time since?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

Cl. of Ar. Then hearken to your verdict as the court hath recorded it. You say that Charles Cranburne is guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no goods, chattels, lands, or tenements, at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge, and so you say all.—Jury. Yes.

Mr. Caine. My lord, the jury humbly desires they may be discharged from their attendance to-morrow.

L. C. J. We cannot do it, unless the jury be full without them; if you come early, we shall dispatch you presently.

Then the Prisoner was taken from the bar, and the Court adjourned till seven o'clock the next morning.

388. The Trial of ROBERT LOWICK, for High Treason: 8 WILLIAM III., A. D. 1696.*

April 22, 1696.

THIS day the justices of Oyer and Terminer holden for the county of Middlesex, met, and the court was resumed by proclamation in usual form.

Clerk of the Arraignments. Keeper of Newgate, set Robert Lowick to the bar, (which was done). You the prisoner at the bar, Robert Lowick, those men that you shall hear called and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Mr. Mompesson. If your lordship pleases to favour me with one word for the prisoner at the bar, I shall not trouble your lordship with any thing that was urged by the gentlemen that were of counsel yesterday, but I shall rely upon something that has not yet been spoken to. My lord, they have not laid any time or place where the consent or agreement was, for the forty men that were to set upon the king and his guards: there is a time laid before where they met and discoursed of the ways and means how to assassinate and kill the king; but when it comes to the 'Assenserunt, consenserunt, et agraverunt,' with submission, this being another act, there ought to be another time and place laid, and for that I shall cite your lordship two of three cases; for men may meet and propose, and discourse, and consult of such things, though they be very ill things, and yet that may not be treason. It is the agreement that is the treason, and so it was held in captain Blague's Case about taking the Tower. They may meet at one time and place, and at another time and place they may agree, in Dyer, 68 B. and 69 Pl. 28. A man was indicted for murder, That he at such a place in and upon the person that was murdered, 'in-sultum fecit, et ipsum,' the person that was murdered, 'cum quodam cultello,' of such a price, 'percussit;' and he does not shew the place where he struck him, nor had the indictment the words, 'ad tunc et ibidem,' and therefore the court held it void: so it is likewise ruled in Goodrick's Case, Hell. 35 et 119, and therefore in indictments for murder, since they generally set forth not only the time and place of the assault, but likewise of the blow; so likewise in things of a more inferior nature, as rescues returned by the sheriff, that the Capias was served, but does not shew where the rescue was; or though he shews where the arrest was, and an 'et' coupled the rescue to it, yet it was adjudged an ill return, Dyer 62, Pl. 29,

10 Edw. 4. 15 Fitz. Ret. Vics. 82 Bro. Ret. Det. Drs. 97, and Error 193. Palm 564, and in Noy 114, there are these words, Note, It was moved in discharge of rescue; the return was, that they, viz. A. B. aforesaid, the bailiffs, 'ad tunc et ibidem vulneraverunt,' &c. And the aforesaid George, &c. 'Rescuserunt' without 'ad tunc et ibidem,' referred only to the 'vulneraverunt,' and not to the 'rescuserunt,' and therefore the return was adjudged insufficient; for, my lord, although in conveyances, a clause or word in the beginning or end may refer to the whole, yet in indictments, every sentence must be certain, plain, and express, and have its own time and place: therefore in Noy's Rep. 122, Raymond was indicted for stopping a cross-way leading from a certain ville called Stoneke, into a ville called Melton, in the county of Dorset, and the indictment was quashed, because in the county of Dorset, shall refer only to Melton, and not to both: so an indictment of forceable entry into a messuage 'existens liberum tenementum' of J. S. is not good for want of the words 'ad tunc,' though the participle 'existens' does strongly imply that it was his house at that time, 3 Cro. 754. Het. 73. Noy, 131. Palm. 426. Bridg. 68. 2 Cro. 214, et 610. Sid. 102. Lat. 109, &c. And my lord Coke tells us in Calvin's Case, 5 B., that indictments of treason, of all others, are the most curiously and certainly indited and penned; and all those that I have seen and observed, have contained more certainty than the indictment now before your lordship. In Reginald Tucker's Case, the indictment was, That he and Thomas Place apud Bridgewater, in Com. Somerset. predict. compassaverunt, to kill and depose the king, &c. and to bring their treasonable purposes to effect, they the said Reginald Tucker and Thomas Place, the same day and year, at Bridgewater aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, against the king, with a great multitude of people, arrayed in a warlike manner, viz. with swords, &c. 'seipso illicito et proditorie insimul ad tunc et ibidem congregaverunt et assemblaverunt et gugram publicam contra dictum Dominum Regem apud Bridgewater predict. in Com. predict. dicto vicessimo Die Junii Anno primo supradicto proditorie paraverunt, ordinaverunt et levaverunt.' So in the indictment of Gate, as it is set forth at large in a plea in bar of Dower, brought by his wife, he with force and arms, 'apud villam de Ware,' &c. assembled with a great many persons, 'et bellum crudele contra dictam Dominam Regiam apud Ware, predict. ad tunc falso et proditorie publicavit et levavit, ac insuper ad tunc et ibidem falso et proditorie,' proclaimed the duke of Northumberland; to be lieutenant-general of their forces; 'et etiam falso et proditorie apud Ware publicavit'

'ad tunc,' proclaimed the lady Jean Dudley queen. This is in Bradlowe's Reports, published by Robert Rowe, fol. 55, plucke 81. So in the earl of Leicester's Case, Plowd. Com. 385, the indictment is laid much after the same manner, and many other indictments, which at present I am unwilling to trouble your lordship with; and this being one of a new form, and of the first impression, I hope your lordship will hold it insufficient. And, my lord, when they go farther, and say, 'Et quilibet eorum proditor super se suscepit esse unum,' there is no place or time alleged where that was done, which of necessity should be mentioned: for it is a constant rule in our books, that what is issuable, ought to have a place where it may be tried. Now, this is issuable, and the most material thing in the indictment is, for compassing the king's death. The overt-acts are, That Christopher Knightley the prisoner, and two others, did consult to kill the king; and afterwards did agree how to do it, viz. by forty horsemen, quorum these should be four, and every one of them did agree to be one; then comes the other overt-act of providing arms for them. Now suppose they should not prove the last, viz. the providing arms; then, my lord, they must resort to one of the other overt-acts, that these four did consult and agree to kill the king; or that these four did agree the manner how to do it, as is laid in the indictment; and it is plain they must fail of proof of either of these; for by the not prosecuting any one of the name of Christopher Knightley, but preferring a new indictment against one Alexander Knightley, it appears that Christopher Knightley was not there; and the proving these three others making a consult and agreement, is not a proof of the same overt-act that is laid in the indictment, as it ought to be by the late act; unless they can prove that a consult of three is a consult of four: and if it be answered, that it is alleged, that 'Quilibet eorum super se suscepit,' then will that come to be issuable, and the most material part of the indictment; and consequently a place ought to have been laid where it should be tried; this, my lord, is a distinct sentence of itself, it is in a parenthesis, and though you take it away, the sense of what remains is perfect and intire; and consequently this sentence is or should be intire of itself, and therefore ought certainly to be expressed. Besides, if your lordship pleases, it is not positively laid, what these persons severally undertook to be, there is indeed mention made before of forty horsemen, agreed upon to set upon the king, then comes the parenthesis, 'Quorum idem Christophorus Knightley, Robertus Lowick, Ambrosius Rockwood et Carolus Cranborne forent quatuor, et quilibet eorum proditoris super se suscepit esse unum.' It is perhaps expressed fully enough by the word 'Quorum,' that it was agreed these should be four of the forty horsemen; but there wants the repetition of the word 'Quorum,' to express what they severally engaged to be; and the word 'et' cannot join and connect the sentences: for 'forent' and 'suscepit' differ not only in number, but also in mood and tense, and the sense is not necessarily coherent; for it might be true, that the majority of the company might agree these should be four, and yet they themselves might not severally engage therein, and one or some of them might undertake it, and yet the company not agree to it; and it cannot be mended by intendment. There was Vaux's Case, in the 4 Rep. 44; he was indicted for murder, for persuading a man to take Cantharides; it was laid, That he 'persuadebat eundem Nicholaum recipere et hiberno quendam potum mixtum cum quodam veneno vocat. Cantharides;' and the indictment says, 'Quod predictus Nicholaus nesciens predictum potum cum veneno predicto fore intoxicatum, sed fidem adhibens dictæ persuasioni Willicmi recepit et bibit;' but does not say, 'venenum predictum,' but yet it adds, 'Per quod predictus Nicholaus immediate post receptionem veneni predicti languis et died;' here, one would think, was a sufficient implication, that he took and drank the poison; but it was ruled, that none of these words were sufficient to maintain the indictment; for the matter of the indictment ought to be plain, express, and certain, and shall not be maintained by argument or implication, and therefore for want of those words the indictment was held insufficient, and the man again indicted for that offence; and there seems much more uncertainty in this indictment, and therefore I humbly pray your lordship that it may be quashed.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we think the objection is fully put, and therefore we desire to have their answer to it.

Att. Gen. (Sir Thomas Trevor). We think, my lord, this objection will receive a very plain answer. The indictment sets forth, That at such a place the prisoner at the bar did imagine and compass the death of the king: there is a particular case where the imagining was, and that they, to accomplish that treason, in compassing and imagining the death of the king, did, among others, 'postea eisdem die et anno apud parochiam predictam, meet and consult, &c.' so there is the same place set forth again, wherein they did meet and consult of the ways and means, and time and place, when, where, and how to assassinate the king: and immediately it follows, 'et consenserunt et agreeverunt,' &c. that forty men, whereof they were to be four, and every one of them undertook to be one, should do so and so. Now, my lord, say they, it is not said that the agreement that there should be forty men to do it, was at the same time and place where they did meet and consult about the ways and means: but, my lord, with submission, it is very plain, that the agreement for forty men, and the particular agreement for them to be of the number, is but the effect of the consultation that is mentioned just before: for it is said, they consulted how they should do it, and they agreed to do it in this manner; the particular manner is set forth distinctly after that, it is said in the sixth of the manner; so that, my lord, it is part of the former sentence; a particularizing of what they did agree upon at that consultation; but it is no distinct overt-act: if it had been a distinct overt-act, then the cases that have been cited by the counsel, do shew, that there should be a particular time and place mentioned for every overt-act; but this is only a part of that overt-act that was mentioned generally before: this tells you particularly what the means were they did agree upon, and the sentence is not complete till you have gone over this; so that, my lord, with submission, it had been very improper when they agreed at such a time and place, of the means and ways how it should be effected, then to set forth that it was at the same time and place where they did consult of the ways and means, that cannot be proper; for it is not laid at first, that there was any particular way proposed, but only in general, they consulted of the ways and means; therefore, my lord, all this that Mr. Mompesson has said, will not be pertinent to this case, it is impossible to have been otherwise; it is but a part of the sentence; and it is not complete till you have gone over the several particulars: as to the Case of a 'Rescous,' that is, the offence upon which the matter is to be grounded; the 'Veneravit' and 'Veneravit' are not the rescuing; but where there is not one sentence complete, till you come to the end of these words, there it must be all taken together; so it is here, they consulted of the way, and agreed this to be the way, which they set forth in particular: it is joined to the former part of the sentence, and the whole is not complete without it.

Sol. Gen. (sir John Hawles). With submission, my lord, it cannot be otherwise, nor can they make it sense otherwise.

L. C. J. (sir John Holt). They say you might and should have put in, 'ad tunc et ibidem.'

Sol. Gen. With submission, my lord, I say it cannot be repeated again: indeed, if you would make it like the case, as Mr. Mompesson would have it, that forty men did agree to it, and forty men did it, it were necessary to name time and place, as it is in the case of murder: that he did agree to murder him, and afterwards knocked him on the head, there you must lay time and place where he agreed, and where he did the act, for there is an act done; but in this case there is no act done, but only an agreement that forty should do it, whereof these four were to be part of the number. Now, they say, you do not say what these four were to do. Yes, we do: the forty were to do such an act, and these were to be four of that forty, and every one of them undertook to be one; so that it cannot be expressed otherwise than it is, for what they say of the indictment being not in the same form that other indictments are, that will be no argument at all; for it does not follow, that there must be one expressed form of an indictment; or right there are divers forms of indictments; and all of them good, because indictments are to be framed according to the particular case, and they did not put this as an instance of such a particular case as this. As to that of the initials of the name of Kaighley, that unquestionably can be no objection at all: for how does it appear to the court, that this is against the same person that was before indicted by the name of Christopher? there may be another Christopher, for aught they know: but I will suppose, that this consult was proved not, as it is laid, that there were to be four; but only that they were to be three of them, it would be well enough against the prisoner at the bar, if he be proved to be one.

Mr. Congers. First, we have here laid a time and place for the treason alleged in the indictment, and also for the two overt-acts, how, when, and where it was to be done; and the providing of arms for it; and for this particular of the forty men, that they would have us put the 'ad tunc et ibidem' to that, is but part of the overt-act, which was before alleged; for the first overt-act mentioned, is the meeting and consulting, and there we lay both time and place; that on such a day, and at such a place, they did meet and consult of the way and manner how to do such an act: and then we continue on the sentence, by particularizing how it was to be effected; that they did agree there should be forty horsemen to do it, whereof they were to be four: this is but a part of the overt-act, which is the consulting and agreeing upon the ways and means; this particular means agreed upon, being but the result and effect of the consultation before: so that we conceive there is no want of time or place upon which to take issue in this case.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I think, with submission, there is nothing in their objection, and I take it to have received a full answer already: yet I would ask one thing of the gentlemen of the other side, had the sentence run without the words 'de his modis et auxiliis,' &c. which follow after the word 'consultavit,' and before the words 'et agreevit;' in this manner, That they did then and there traitorously treat, propose, consult, and agree, that forty horsemen, or thereabouts, with guns, and so forth. If then there had been any colour to think it necessary, that it should be laid in this manner, That they did then and there traitorously treat, and then and there traitorously propose, and then and there traitorously consult, and did then and there traitorously agree: and if not, then I would desire them to tell me why 'then and there' is more necessary to one verb 'did agree,' than it is to all the rest, in sense and common speaking. The only use of a conjunction copulative, is to derive the force of some words, in a sentence foregoing, down to a sentence following, to avoid repetition: and here, though after the consultation be put, many words that relate to that matter, by way of parenthesis; yet the 'ad tunc et ibidem' still does refer to all the verbs following, being joined by the conjunction copulative; it does not vary the case at all, the putting in that parenthesis; it is notwithstanding but as one sentence; and the supposing that the parenthesis stood out, makes it very plain, there can be no colour to say there wanted a repetition of the 'ad tunc et ibidem' to every verb.

Sir B. Shower. With submission to your lordship's judgment, there is no answer made to this objection. I do agree, if there had been several verbs, and no other words had intervened, that an 'et' would have coupled all together, and you need not have repeated 'ad tunc et ibidem' to every one: but here is a fact after the verbs, that makes one complete entire sentence; and if this of the forty men were left out, it had been a good sentence, that they did propose and treat how, where and when; that is a sentence of itself, the consulting and the treating of the ways and means: but then they say, 'and they did agree and assent that forty should do it;' now there is no necessity for the interpreting of these words, That they should consult and agree at the same place and time; there is no necessity to conjoin this agreement for the forty men with the consultation; they might propose and consult at one time and place, and not agree, and afterwards agree at another time and place: it is not a specification, or, as they call it, a specific account of the consultation, nor a necessary effect of it, so as to make it necessary to join them together; they might meet and consult at one time and place, and at another time and place they might agree that forty should do it; and therefore when you say at one time and place they did consult and propose, and afterwards they did agree; it is not necessarily implied, that it must be at the same time and place; and when it is not necessarily implied, we think it necessary in indictments, for certainty sake, to have 'ad tunc et ibidem' inserted again.

Mr. Mompesson. My lord, Mr. Solicitor says, That as to other precedents, that does not make it necessary that this should be like them; and that it is no argument that it ought to be so here. My lord Coke, in Calvin's case, tells us, That by precedents the law is known, and that indictments of treason are of all things the most curiously penned; and it is common to infer the law is so, because usually it is so in the precedents of indictments. Mr. Solicitor says likewise, That there may be a Christopher Knightley besides an Alexander; but I cannot take that for an answer to the exception I urge, which is the want of 'ad tunc et ibidem' at the 'Quoniam, and the 'Quilibet; for the 'Quilibet' may come to be in question as the most material part of the indictment, because the agreement of the four upon the meeting of the four is alleged as an overt act. Now, with submission, they must prove the assembly of the whole four, or they do not prove the overt act expressly laid: then as to the 'Quilibet suscepi,' which is the most material part, it has no time nor place.

Att. Gen. No more: we do not need to prove all four, for it is a distinct offence in each, and if any one undertook, it is well enough against him: and for the time and place we tell you it is part of the former sentence, and makes but an intire one.

Mr. Mompesson. As for the residue of the verbs, if they had been omitted, it had been good sense; but this is a perfect intire sentence of itself, when it tells you what they consulted and treated of, as in the Case of the Rescue that I put; if it had stopped there, it had been a good sentence without the 'Vulnera' variant.

Att. Gen. The 'Reason' is the offence in that case, the other is distinct: but here, in this case, nothing can be plainer than that all is one act, as we have laid it, That at such a time and place they did consult and treat of the ways and means; but then there is no agreement mentioned till after we have said they did consult of the ways and means, and did agree that this should be the way: this is certainly one entire sentence that shews what the agreement was upon the consultation as the result of it.

Mr. Cowper. As to what sir Bartholomew Shower says, That we ought to repeat the 'ad tunc et ibidem,' unless the sense of the words implies a necessity that the consultation and the agreement should be at one time and place: My lord, there can be nothing in that, for it does not arise from the necessity of the thing one way or the other; but we take it as an intire sentence, and that the whole matter is sufficiently connected, and laid to one time and place, though it might be divided, it must be taken, as alleged, to be one intire fact, or else it recurs to the same objection, that 'ad tunc et ibidem' must as well be put to every verb; for it is possible they might propose at one time and place, and consult at another, and debate at another as well as agree at another: so that nothing is to be argued from the necessity of the thing more in one case than the other; for one man might propose it in one place, and the rest might then shake their heads at it; and then they might again meet and consult at another place, and afterwards agree at a third: but when it is said 'then and there' they did meet, consult, and agree, it cannot be understood but that the agreement was at the same time and place with the meeting and consult.

Sir B. Shower. But this can be no answer that Mr. Cowper gives now, for proposing, and consulting, and treating, and debating, are all of the same signification; for one man's proposing to another, and the other's proposing to him, is consulting, treating, and debating; but now consulting and agreeing are different things.

Mr. Cowper. So is proposing and consulting: one may propose: but there must be at least two to consult: there is that nice difference between them.

Sir B. Shower. Every one must agree for himself, and that must be certainly laid with time and place; let the proposal and consultation be what it will.

L. C. J. Mr. Mompesson puts that Case in Court upon an indictment of murder. That on such a day, and at such a place, the party made an assault upon the persons slain, 'et percussit' but does not say, 'Et ad tunc et ibidem percussit' and for not alleging that, the indictment was held nought.

Att. Gen. My lord, that is a different case from this, because 'insultum facit,' and the 'percussit' are different crimes; there is a great difference between an assault and a stroke: but here it is, That they did propose and consult of the ways and means, and agreed upon this particular way; that is the same thing; it is not an entire sentence till you come to the end of it, then it is complete when you shew what was the effect of the consultation; what they were agreed upon, and not till then.

Mr. Mompesson. A man's holding up his hand is an assault, but he must actually strike to be guilty of murder: so a man may debate, and yet not agree: it is the agreement that is the treason.

L. C. J. Read the Indictment.

* No indictment (as to the diversity in impeachments, see in this Collection the Case of Lord Wintoun, A. D. 1716) can be good without precisely shewing a certain day and year of the facts alleged in it. See Leach's Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 77, 78, and the authorities there cited. See, also, lord Kenyon's judgment in the King against Holland, 5 Term, Rep. 624, 625. But it is sufficient in an indictment for treason, as in other cases, that a time be laid before the finding of the bill under which may be proved any acts committed before the finding of the bill: and as to place in cases of treason within the realm, it is sufficient that an overt act be proved in the county where the indictment is laid and the trial had. See in this Collection the Cases of Charnock, vol. 1. p. 1379; and of lord Baltimore, A. D. 1743. Black's Pleas of the Crown, chap. 2, sect. 60, et seq. and the authorities there cited; and for more, as to the place where treasons committed abroad or at home, shall be tried, see sect. 24, 25, of the same chapter.

Mr. Mompesson. The consult is like the assault, and the agreement is like the stroke.

L. C. J. Treby. It is a nice case as you would have it, but I think it is very natural as the king's counsel put it at first; they lay the consultation of the ways and means how it should be done, and then they conclude that thus it shall be done; all which makes but one intire thing.

L. C. J. They say they met that day at St. Paul Covent garden, that is in the beginning, and did consult how to kill the king; and they consented and agreed among themselves, that it should be done in this manner: doth not this refer to both time and place in the beginning? It is a continuing on of the same sentence, and shewes all but one and the same act; it is the result of the consultation at that time and place.

Sir B. Shower. But, my lord, it might be at another place: they might consult at one place, and conclude at another.

Mr. Conyers. But it is laid to meet the king place, for no other place does appear, and it is not continued sentence.

L. C. J. Treby. You would make the repetition so frequent and reiterated, that it would become absurd.

Att. Gen. Indeed I do not know what these gentlemen would have.

Sir B. Shower. We would have this indictment as all others are, the precedents are as we say, and we hope this shall pursue them, or else be quashed.

L. C. J. Look ye here, sir Bartholomew Shower; suppose this part should not be right, that will not vitiate the whole indictment.

Mr. Mompesson. But your lordship will not suffer them to give evidence of that part that is vicious.

L. C. J. Yes, yes; it comes within the first words of the time and place laid; they may give evidence of it, because this is but a setting forth for the manner agreed upon for the execution of the design that was before consulted and treated of; it is comprehended in the former words; and if they had omitted this out of the indictment, the indictment had never been the worse; there had been a sufficient overt-act alleged to prove the compassing and imagining the death of the king; for if people at such a place and time meet and propose the way and means how to effect it, do you think the indictment would not be good enough without laying the particular means agreed upon? Certainly it had been well enough if this had been omitted. Do you think they cannot give this in evidence as a proof of the overt-act? Certainly they may.

Sir B. Shower. The question will be, my lord, then upon the whole, Whether the conclusion of the indictment 'contra legiantie sue debitum,' shall be taken distributively to every fact? And if so, then there ought to be time and place alleged to every fact.

L. C. J. Suppose you lay several overt-acts, and prove but one, yet he is to be found guilty of the high-treason, which is the imagining and compassing the death of the king, which is the crime laid in the indictment; then suppose this was left out of the indictment, they might give it in evidence as a proof of the overt-act, that it is well laid for time and place; and therefore though it be expressed, and not so fully and particularly laid, we cannot quash the indictment for it, because the indictment would have been good, though that had been omitted.*

L. C. J. Treby. That is certainly true, it is no cause for quashing the indictment.

Sol. Gen. The indictments against the Regicides were for compassing the death of the king, and they gave in evidence that he was put to death, though they charged in the indictment, only the compassing and imagining the death of the king.

L. C. J. Ay, more, that is an overt-act with a witness, the indictment was not laid for murdering the king, but for compassing his death, which is the treason according to the act of parliament of 25 Ed. 3, and as an overt-act they gave the cutting off his head in evidence.

Att. Gen. The indictment says, they compassed and imagined the king's death, and they agreed to do it in this manner; if this be not all one intire sentence, I know not what is.

L. C. J. As to your case, Mr. Mompesson, which you quote out of Dyer, it is possible a man may make an assault at one time, and at another time make an assault and give a stroke; but this is all one act, it does but specify what was generally consulted of and proposed.

L. C. J. Treby. Pray, do you think a man may demur upon a common action of battery, where it is said first, at such a time and place, 'Insultum fecit, verberavit, et vulneravit,' because there is not a place set to every word.

Mr. Mompesson. Indictments ought to be very curiously penned, and what is good in an action will not be good in an indictment, with submission.

L. C. J. Treby. But suppose you shewed it for cause upon special demur.

Mr. Mompesson. My lord, I cannot tell what it would amount unto.

L. C. J. You cannot quash the indictment at this time; that is not possible, because the indictment is good as to the rest, supposing this was not so well as it might be.

Mr. Mompesson. Then, my lord, I am in your lordship's judgment, whether they shall be admitted to give evidence in this particular thing?

L. C. J. They may certainly give in evidence the agreement to have forty men to kill the king, as a proof of the consultation, agreement, and consent to kill the king; and the consenting to have forty horsemen is in evidence of their treating, proposing, and consulting to kill the king.* Then for your objection of 'Quilibet suscepit' to be one; that is well enough, it is all still but one sentence.

Sir B. Shower. One of which is it? for they have not laid in the indictment what is, whether it be one of the four, or one of the forty.

L. C. J. Whether it be one of the four, or the forty, is not material; for cannot one be found guilty, and the rest acquitted? The one is not charged with the act of the other, but they are several offences, and each must answer for himself. In all indictments, offences are several. Suppose an indictment of conspiracy, and it is laid in the indictment that four did conspire; cannot you prove that two conspired? no question you may. It is not certainly necessary that every one should be proved to have conspired. Suppose it were alleged that four did beat a man, and does not say 'Quilibet eorum' beat him, you may give in evidence that one did beat him.

* See East's Pleas of the Crown, chap. 2, s. 46, and Loyer's Case as there cited.

† See vol. 5, p. 247.

* See East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 2, s. 57, 58. See, also, in this Collection, vol. 5, p. 277.

Sir B. Shower. No question of that in case of a battery, but in the case of a conspiracy there must be more than one.

L. C. J. Nay, I will ask you even in an action of conspiracy, where the very gist of the action is conspiring together, cannot two be found guilty, and the rest acquitted? In riots there must be three or more. It may be you will say ten, but it is sufficient, I hope, if you prove it upon any three of them.

Att. Gen. The difference is betwixt contracts and crimes; for contracts they are joint, but crimes they are in their own nature several.

Sol. Gen. Besides, my lord, though they be out of time, yet this is not to the abatement of the indictment, but to the evidence; how do they know but we will give it in evidence that Christopher Knightley was one?

L. C. J. Treby. Mr. Mompesson moves it as a caveat against your giving it in evidence.

Sir B. Shower. If in an outlawry against divers, they leave out these words, 'Nec eorum aliquis comparuit,' that is every day held to be nought, and for that reason we say, the 'Quilibet eorum suspect' is necessary too, and without being laid cannot be given in evidence, and if it be laid, it ought to have time and place.

L. C. J. Treby. The default of appearance must be a several thing, and when he lays it jointly 'non comparuerunt,' it may be true that all did not appear, if any one made default; but when you charge men with a fact done, though in the plural number, yet it is a distinct separate charge upon every one.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Lowick, those men that thou shalt hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak to them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.—George Ford.

against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and give their evidence; or else they forfeit their recognizances.

The names of the twelve sworn are these:—George Ford, Thomas French, John Wolfe, John Raymond, Geo. Hawes, Matthew Batsman, Thomas Rammage, William Wild, Wm. Pitts, Wm. Smith, Benjamin Dobby, and Elias Fletcher.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Lowick, held up thy hand, (which he did): You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of Robert Lowick, late of the parish of St Paul Covent-garden, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman; for that he, together with Christopher Knightley, late of the same parish and county, gentleman; Ambrose Rookwood, late of the same parish and county, gentleman; and Charles Cranburne, late of the same parish and county, yeoman, not having the fear of God in their hearts nor weighing the duty of their allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as false traitors against the most serene, most illustrious, most mild, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord, William the Third, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. their supreme, true and rightful, lawful, and undoubted lord, the cordial love, and true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance which every subject of our said lord the king that now is, towards him our said lord the king should and of right ought to bear, withdrawing, and utterly to extinguish, intending and contriving, and with all their strength, purposing, designing, and conspiring the government of this kingdom of England, under him our said lord the king that now is, our right, duly, happily, and very well established, altogether to subvert, change and alter; as also the same our lord the king to death and total destruction to put and bring, and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England into intolerable and most miserable slavery to Lewis the French king to subjugate and enchain, the 10th day of February in the 7th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at the parish of St. Paul Covent-garden aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did compass, imagine and contrive, purpose, design, intend, our said lord the king that now is, to kill, slay, and murder; and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of our said lord the king, throughout this whole kingdom of England to make and cause; and the same their most wicked, impious, and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, contrivances and purposes aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, they the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, and very many other false traitors to the jurors unknown; afterwards, to wit, the same 10th day of February, in the year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, secretly, and traitorously, and with force and arms, did meet together, propose, treat, consult, consent, and agree, him our said sovereign lord the king that now is, by lying in wait and wild, to assassinate, kill and murder: and that execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing the sooner to execute and perpetrate; afterwards, to wit, the same day and year, and divers other days and times, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously did treat, propose, and consult, of the ways, manner, and means, and the time and place, where, when, how, and in what manner, our said lord the king, so by lying in wait, the more easily they might kill, and did consent, agree, and assent, that forty horsemen; or thereabouts; of whom the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, should be four; and every one of them traitorously took upon himself to be one, with guns, muskets, and pistols, laden with gunpowder, and leaden bullets, and with swords, rapiers, and other arms armed, should lie in wait, and be in ambush, the same our lord the king in his coach being, when he should go abroad, to set upon, and that a certain and competent number of those men, so armed, should set upon the guards of him our said lord the king then attending on him; and being with him, and should fight with them, and overcome them, whilst others of the same men so armed, him our said lord the king to assassinate, kill, slay, and murder; and they the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, their treasons, and all their traitorous intentions, designs, and contrivances aforesaid, to execute, perpetrate, fulfil, and bring to effect, afterwards, to wit, the aforesaid 10th day of February, in the 7th year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, divers horses, and very many arms, guns, pistols, rapiers, and swords, and other weapons, ammunition, and warlike things, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously, secretly, and traitorously did obtain, buy, gather together, and procure, and did cause to be bought, obtained, gathered together, and procured with that intent them in and about the detestable, horrid, and execrable assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king that now is, as aforesaid, to use, employ, and bestow: and the same promises the more safely and certainly to execute, do, and perpetrate, by the aforesaid Christopher Knightley, with one Edward King, late of high-treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said lord the king that now is, duly convicted and attainted, by the consent and assent of divers of the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, the said 10th day of February, in the 7th year aforesaid, traitorously did go, and came to the place proposed, where such intended assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king, by lying in wait, should be done, perpetrated and committed, to wit, see, and observe the conspiracy and fitness of the same place for such lying in wait, assassination, and killing, there to be done, perpetrated and committed; and that place being so viewed and observed, afterwards, to wit, the same day and year, his observations thereof to several of the said traitors and conspirators did relate and impart, to wit, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid; and the aforesaid Charles Cranburne the same day and year there in order, the same execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing of our said lord the king, by the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, the more readily and boldly to execute, perpetrate, and commit, advisedly, knowingly, and traitorously did bear and carry among divers of those traitors and conspirators forwards and backwards, from some to others of them, a list of the names of divers men of those who were designed and appointed our said lord the king, so as aforesaid, by lying in wait, to kill and murder, against the duty of the allegiance of them the said Christopher Knightley, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne; and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity, as also against the form of the statute in such case made and provided. Upon this indictment he has been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the country, which country you are; your charge is to inquire, whether he be guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty: if you find him guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge: if you find him not guilty, you are to enquire whether he fled for it; if you find he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty: if you find him not guilty, and that he did not fly for it, you are to say so, and no more: and hear your evidence.

Mr. Mountague. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; this is an indictment of high-treason against Robert Lowick, prisoner at the bar; and the indictment does charge him with compassing and imagining the death of the king, and endeavouring to subvert the government, and enslave this kingdom of England, and bring it under French tyranny and slavery; and the indictment sets forth that Robert Lowick, the prisoner at the bar, the 10th of February, met several false traitors, and there consulted and treated how to assassinate his Majesty; and agreed that forty beramen do get together, some to attack the guards, while others were to assassinate the king in his coach; and the indictment charges him likewise with getting together arms and arms for this purpose; to this he hath pleaded Not Guilty. We will call our evidence, and prove the facts against him; and we do not doubt but you will do your duty.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen that are sworn, this is an indictment of high-treason, in conspiring and compassing the death and destruction of the king; the nature of our evidence against the prisoner at the bar is this.

You will hear, gentlemen, by the witnesses, that about Christmas last a conspiracy and design was set on foot to assassinate the king; and accordingly to accomplish it, there were several persons sent over from France by the late king James, who were part of his guards; and particularly sir George Barclay was to be the head of them; he was a lieutenant of the guards there, and he was sent over in January last, and there were a great many troopers sent over, who were to be under his direction, particularly Mr. Harris, who will give you an account, that he was sent over by order of king James, and he was told particularly king James had a service for him to do in England, and he hoped it might be an opportunity to advance him. He was to observe the orders of sir George Barclay, and by what token he should know him; he was to meet him in Covent-garden, and he was told he might find him there twice a-week in the square, about six o'clock, after it was dark; and that he might know him, he told him, he would have his white handkerchief hanging out of his pocket; accordingly Mr. Harris came over, and Mr. Hare came with him, and they came and did meet with sir George Barclay; and they, together with sir George Barclay, and several others here in England, Mr. Porter, Mr. Charnock, and sir William Perkins, did enter into consultation how to effect it: There were several meetings about it, and you will find the prisoner at the bar was at several meetings to that purpose; and they did undertake among them to provide so many men as might make about the number of forty, which they thought sufficient for the execution of this design.

Gentlemen, you will hear that the prisoner at the bar did treat with several persons to be engaged in it; particularly about the 5th of February, he sent to one Bertram, and asked him if he would be engaged in a design for king James's service, that was quickly to be executed, without asking of questions; and afterwards, I think, he undertook he would: So about the 14th of February he met him again, and that was the day before the first time they intended to attack the king, and then being so near the time when it was to be executed, he thought it proper to acquaint him with the thing he had engaged him in; and he did acquaint him, that the next morning they were to be ready to attack the king and his guards, and bid him be sure to get his boots and other things ready for that purpose, and he gave him a guinea in order to it. Bertram, it seems, on the 15th of February did not come, and the king it seems did not go abroad that day, so they were disappointed at the time; but the Sunday after Bertram met him, and Mr. Lowick complained that he had not come upon the Saturday, according as he had undertaken; and he told him it would have been the same thing, he would have disappointed them if thinking had been in the field.

Gentlemen, you shall find, that as he thus engaged Mr. Bertram, so he was to provide several others; and did declare, that at his own charge he had got two or three; he complained of it as a hardship put upon him, that whereas Mr. Harris had 6s. a-day subsistence, and was only to take care of himself, he, Mr. Lowick, had at his own charges engaged and provided several.

You will find, gentlemen, that Mr. Rookwood, who was tried yesterday, had several meetings about it with Mr. Lowick and Mr. Harris; they did think it to be a barbarous thing: but however, they were resolved to obey orders, and the prisoner in particular said he would obey orders, though he thought it a very wicked thing.

Gentlemen, you will find by the evidence how the matter was carried on; the prisoner was to be engaged in it, and did not only embark himself in person, but engaged others, and did treat with them about it. We shall call our witnesses, who will give you a full account of it, and then we shall leave it with you, who we question not will do justice. First call George Harris. [Who appeared, and was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Pray will you give an account to my lord and the jury, what you know of the intended assassination, and what part the prisoner at the bar had in it?

Mr. Conyers. Begin from the first, and tell your whole knowledge as you did yesterday.

Harris. On the 14th of January, new stile, I was ordered to wait on king James at dinner; after dinner was over, I was called in, where was col. Parker and Mr. Hare at the same time, and king James told me he was very sensible of the good service I had done him; and now he had an opportunity of doing something for me: I was to go into England, and there to be subsisted, and I was to follow the orders of sir George Barclay; the king told me I should find sir George Barclay in Covent-garden, with a white handkerchief hanging out of his pocket, on Mondays and Thursdays between the hours of six and seven in the evening, and that was the sign I was to know him by; and he ordered me to go to Mr. Carroll, that is secretary to the late queen, and col. Parker went along with me, and he ordered me ten lewidores, and Mr. Hare as much, which Mr. Carroll gave us; and if that were not sufficient, or if we were wind-bound at Calais, we had orders to apply to the president of Calais to be furnished with what we wanted: accordingly we went, and the wind not serving when we came to Calais, we were forced to stay there, and our charges were paid to our landlord by the president of Calais, according to the order we received at St. Germain; when the wind served fair, we went on board, and came to Rumney-marsh, to one Mr. Hunt's house, and from thence he furnished us with a couple of horses; and we came the sandy way to one Mr. Tucker's, and from thence to Mr. Cross's, and from thence to Gravesend, and from thence to London; we came up in the night-tide, and being late when we came to town, Sunday night, we lay at an inn at the lower end of Gracechurch-street; the next day we went to look for sir George Barclay, but not finding him in Covent-garden, according to what king James told us, I admired at it; but one Mr. Berkenhead meeting my comrade the next day, said, sir George Barclay desired to see us, and appointed us to meet him, which we did that night; where sir George Barclay asked us how the king and queen, prince and princess did; he told us at that time he had no money for us, but in a few days we should have money; and accordingly he sent us money. We had five guineas, but it was at twice: two guineas at one time, and three at another, and this was for a month's subsistence at five shillings a-day, guineas going then at thirty shillings. And afterwards when major Holmes delivered the horse, upon Saturday the 15th, we had another guinea, that made up what we had to be six shillings a-day when we had horses, and five shillings a day when we had none: and as for Mr. Lowick, the first Saturday which was designed for the assassination, I happened to be at Mr. Couater's lodging's in Holbourn, a confectioner's; and there I see Mr. Lowick come in.

Mr. Conyers. Who lodged there, pray; Sir?

Harris. Sir George Barclay and Mr. Couater had lodgings there; and Mr. Lowick came in there, but I cannot say he staid there any time, I think he went out presently afterwards. The next week I met Mr. Lowick in Red-lion-fields, and discoursed with him there about this matter, and I told him what a barbarous and inhuman thing it was that we should be the murderers of the prince of Orange, and that it would render us odious to the world, and that we should be a continual reproach to ourselves; he did agree it was so: but in conclusion, Mr. Lowick said he would obey orders, and he said sir George Barclay, he was sure, would not do it without orders. That day when we were walking out, we met sir George Barclay and major Holmes riding in the highway up towards Islington, and we spoke to him, for Mr. Lowick told me the thing was discovered, and his name was given up, and other gentlemen's, and I think another; and so he told me that one Harrison told him of it, and forewarned him that night from lying in his lodging; and he told him that he believed it would not be safe for the rest to lie in their lodgings, or to that effect.

Att. Gen. When he said he would obey orders, what was the discourse about?

Harris. We were talking of murdering the prince of Orange: and not only that, but I de-believe that Mr. Lowick is so sensible that what I say is true; and he is a man of so much conscience and honour, that he will not contradict any thing that I affirm or have said here. On Saturday the third we dined at the Castle, a tavern or a coffee-shop, at the end of Red-hon street. I was much in a sweat; and he asked me what made me so? I told him I had been getting captain Rookwood's party ready; and I told him (laughing) that captain Rookwood said I should be his aid de camp, and so I was getting the men together: says he to me, You may very well do it, for you have six shillings a-day, and I have nothing. Mr. Lowick, you know what I say to be true; I know not why you lift up your hands; but you did tell me I might very well do it, having six shillings a-day, and you had nothing, and yet brought a couple of men at your own charge, and that their horses could not be discharged unless you went. These were his words, my lord, or to this effect.

Att. Gen. What do you mean by being discharged?

Harris. I mean this, that I believe he paid for them; and they were waiting at a house till he came.

Mr. Congers. Why were they to be discharged that day?

Harris. The reason why they were to be discharged that day, was, because captain Rookwood had told him before, that the prince of Orange did not go out that day; and therefore we went together to walk towards Islington.

L. C. J. What day was that?

Harris. The second Saturday that it was to have been executed. I was not a spy upon any man's actions: I cannot tell what they did any more than I tell you: I do not wrong you any way in the world, Sir, I am sure on it.

L. C. J. When was it that you spoke with Mr. Lowick about murdering the king?

Harris. It was Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday, I cannot be exact to the day, but it was one of these days, after the first Saturday; I cannot be positive what the day was.

L. C. J. Well, it was between the two days?—Harris. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. How did you know of that design of murdering the king?

Harris. I was informed of it by captain Rookwood the first Saturday, and I met Mr. Lowick, and had this discourse about it: and afterwards they informed me that Mr. De la Rue did not lie at his lodgings, and the thing discovered, and they believed that Mr. De la Rue had discovered it: And I desire you will call Mr. De la Rue as to this matter; for I believe he will own it.

Sol. Gen. How came you to treat him with such a discourse?

Harris. Because we met there at Counter's lodging, and we had several times discourses of it; there was major Bernard and capt.

Rookwood besides; and I always declared against it as a barbarous and inhuman thing, not to be answered before God or man, and that we should be odious to all the world if this thing were effected, as I believed it would not be. I would never show my head after such a thing.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember who began the discourse of this matter?

Harris. I cannot tell that. I cannot come to every particular.

Sir B. Shower. You said just now, you apprehended Mr. Lowick to be a man of conscience and honour; pray what were his sentiments about it?

Harris. His sentiment was, that he would obey sir George Barclay's orders; and he was sure sir George Barclay would not do it without orders.

Sir B. Shower. Did not he declare it to be a barbarous design?

Harris. I cannot remember every particular thing that he said; for I am not a spy upon any man's actions.

Lowick. When you were talking of that design that you speak of, pray, did I consent to any such thing?

Harris. I tell you how far you consented; you said you would obey sir George Barclay's orders, and you was sure he would not do it without orders.

Mr. Mompesson. Did you see any of sir George Barclay's orders?

Harris. No, I did not, I was to follow his orders; but what orders he had I cannot tell.

Sol. Gen. What did sir George Barclay tell you you were to do?

Harris. Sir George Barclay declared, on the first Saturday, that we were his Janissaries, and talked of attacking and bringing away the garter: I cannot say this gentleman was by then; and afterwards sir George Barclay went out and returned, and came in again into the room, and declared that we were men of honour, and that we were to attack the prince of Orange.

Mr. Mompesson. Did sir George Barclay give the prisoner at the bar any orders?

Harris. I do not tell you hard.

Mr. Mompesson. You say you met sir George Barclay and major Holmes upon the road going to Islington: How do you know the prisoner was there?

Harris. Why, was not I with him? I am very sorry to come upon this account; but you know it is truth all that I say; and I am sure you are sensible I do you no wrong: He met sir George Barclay and major Holmes, and he went down and said something to sir George Barclay in the highway, what it was I do not know; but I stood, and captain Rookwood and Mr. Bernard said something to him, which you very well know.

Att. Gen. What was it?

Harris. I cannot tell, Sir.

Att. Gen. We do need you to tell what you cannot tell: Is this all you know?

Mr. Montague. Tell all at present that I am content.

Sol. Gen. There was one Mrs. Bertram; which was done.

Mr. Comper. Pray will you give an account to my lord and the jury what you know of this intended assassination, and how far the prisoner was concerned in it.

Bertram. My lord, about the beginning of February last, major Lowick came to me, and asked me if I would espouse a thing with him that might be for my advantage; I told him that I thought I might espouse any thing that he thought fit to engage in.

Mr. Montague. Whom did you tell so?

Bertram. Major Lowick: and he told me it was well, and desired me to ask no more questions: I did not; but it went on to the 14th of February, when he desired me to be at his lodgings at 12 o'clock. I was so about that time, but he was not within, and I stayed till he came in, and he took me up into his chamber, and told me he believed they should ride out in some little time; and he told me he believed the king was to be seized in his coach, and he gave me a guinea to buy me necessities.

L. C. J. What necessities?

Bertram. I cannot say he named any.

Att. Gen. But for what purpose were those necessities?

Bertram. I do not know that he named any thing, indeed.

Att. Gen. Well; did he tell you when you were to be ready?

Bertram. If you please to give me leave, I will tell you: he desired me not to be out of the way; and the next morning I was to meet him at the purl house in Hart street. I did not meet him; and the next time I saw him, I am not positive whether it was the next day after the fifteenth when I was to meet him at Hart street, but did not so; but the next time I saw him, he asked me why I did not meet him according to his appointment? I told him, I had some reason for it; and he answered me again, that he believed, if the king had been in the field, I would have done the same; but I have not seen him since, till I saw him at the bar.

Att. Gen. Had you no discourse of horses that you were to provide?

Bertram. I do not remember any particular thing more than I have told you.

Att. Gen. Did he not tell you what the design was you were to go about?

Bertram. He did not tell me of any other design than as I tell you, for he believed I knew of it: I thought so at least: The first time I knew of it was from Mr. Charnock.

L. C. J. What did he tell you was the design that you should engage in for your advantage upon Friday the 14th, when he gave you the guinea?

Bertram. He told me, he believed they should ride out very suddenly, and that the king was to be seized in his coach.

L. C. J. Did he tell you when the king was to be seized?

VOL. XIII.

Bertram. No, he did not tell me when; but this was the 14th, the next morning I was to meet him at Hart-street, but did not.

Sol. Gen. Who did he tell you the king was to be seized by?

Bertram. He did not nominate any one else, for he obliged me not to ask him questions, nor I did not.

Sol. Gen. Did he name himself to be concerned?

Bertram. He named himself so far as that he believed he should ride out very suddenly.

Sol. Gen. Was it the next morning, or the next day?

Bertram. I cannot say that he named any particular time.

Att. Gen. Will they ask him any questions?

Sir B. Shower. No, I think we shall not.

Mr. Mountague. Pray, Mr. Bertram, will you answer me one question, What did he say to you when he checked you for not coming according to his appointment?

Bertram. I took it as a kind of a check: he told me, that if the king had been in the field, he believed I would have done the same.

Sir B. Shower. There is one thing we must a little examine this gentleman to: were not you under a necessity before that time that he gave you the guinea? Pray what condition were you in?

Bertram. Under necessity, Sir! I was never very plentiful of money of late.

Sir B. Shower. Did he never give you a guinea or two before in charity, and out of compassion to your necessities?

Bertram. He has given me money several times before: and I believe if I would have asked him for any money, he would have given it me.

Att. Gen. Was this money given you for charity, or for any other, and what purpose?

Bertram. I did not ask him for any thing: but he gave it me, and said, there is a guinea to buy you necessities.

Att. Gen. What was the discourse before that?

Bertram. I told you, he said, he believed they were to ride out very suddenly, and he believed the king was to be seized in his coach, and he desired me not to be out of the way.

Mr. Comper. And when he gave you the guinea to buy you necessities, was it immediately after this discourse?

Bertram. Sir, it was at the same time.

Lowick. Did not I give your wife a guinea two months before this?

Bertram. Yes, Sir; I acknowledge I was informed you did, I was not in town then.

Lowick. Pray let the court know that.

L. C. J. Did he tell you the king was to be seized in his coach, before he told you they were to ride out very suddenly?

Bertram. No, afterwards; and then he gave me the guinea.

Sir B. Shower. His words are not coupled together, they have no relation to one another.

L. C. J. No; but he told him they were to ride out very suddenly, and the king was to be seized in his coach, and gave him a guinea to buy him necessaries at the same time.

L. C. J. Treby. There is no doubt he was engaged in the design with those other persons.

Mr. Conyers. And afterwards he rebuked him because he had not met him; and he said, it would have been the same thing if the king had been in the field.

Mr. Mountague. What day in the week was it that you failed him?

Bertram. It was on a Saturday.

Juryman. Pray, my lord, we desire to know, who he did understand by the king that was to be seized.

L. C. J. What did he call the king?

Bertram. He said nothing but the king.

L. C. J. Who did you understand by that?

Bertram. I leave it to the court, I am not to interpret things.

L. C. J. Treby. Did he name the prince of Orange, or king James? Did you think king James was to be seized?

Bertram. My lord, I tell you what he said, I am not to interpret his words.

Att. Gen. Do you believe he meant king James, or this king, that was to be seized?

Bertram. I believe it might be the king here.

L. C. J. Take the words as they are; he asked him before, Whether he would engage in a design that might be for his advantage? On Friday the 14th of February he meets him at his lodging, and tells him, he was to ride out suddenly, and that the king was to be seized in his coach, and appointed him to meet him the next morning, and gave him a guinea to buy him necessaries.

Mr. Mompesson. Pray, has not Mr. Lowick given you clothes, linen and other things at any other time?

Bertram. Sir, you have been always ready to serve me, I must acknowledge, and you have been very kind to me.

Lowick. If you please to give an account of my character, whether ever I was guilty of any bloody thing?—Bertram. No, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. How long have you known Mr. Lowick?

Bertram. I believe I have known him this 20 years.

Sir B. Shower. What behaviour has he been of?

Bertram. He has always had very good behaviour, and the best; he has had the best character of all mankind.

Sir B. Shower. Did you ever know him inclined to do a rash action?

Bertram. Never in my life.

Sir B. Shower. Did you ever know him do a malicious action?

Bertram. No; but he had always the character of a good man, and was always ready to serve any man in his necessities, and to do good; he has that general character abroad.

L. C. J. Where does he live?

Bertram. He lived last at Brownlow-street, but he has no wife nor family, and so has no fixed being.

L. C. J. What was his way of living?

Bertram. He was bred a soldier, and has been abroad.

L. C. J. Where?—Bertram. In Ireland.

L. C. J. In whose service?

Bertram. In the service of king James.

Lowick. He knows particularly, that once I was upon a party, and saved five officers from being killed in cold blood.

L. C. J. What countryman is he?

Bertram. Yorkshire.

Mr. Mompesson. Was he accounted of a cruel or a bloody nature?

Bertram. No; of a quite contrary.

Juryman. My lord; I desire to know for what cause he gave him or his wife a guinea.

Bertram. I know not what that guinea was for that he gave me the 14th of February, any otherwise than as I have told you.

Mr. Mompesson. What was the guinea given to your wife for?

Bertram. For that guinea given to my wife, it was out of his own kindness and goodness to my family and me.

Att. Gen. What was the other guinea for? You are upon your oath.

Bertram. Indeed, Sir, I cannot tell; he gave it me to buy me necessaries.

Att. Gen. Was there nothing else mentioned, what necessaries those were to be?

Bertram. No, Sir; upon my oath there was not any particular mentioned.

Att. Gen. What made him so kind to you, pray?

Bertram. We were both born in a town, and I believe we are near related.

Sir B. Shower. You say you are townspeople, and have been long acquainted, and you knew him in Ireland; pray, did you ever know that he saved any people's lives?

Bertram. I was not in that action myself, but all that were in it gave that relation, that he was very favourable, and did save people's lives, particularly one captain Harlow, and brought him and other prisoners, and I remember the thing: it was about a fortnight before the business of the Boyne, upon a Sunday morning, that they took those prisoners, and he did persuade several parties that he commanded, to decline killing as much as they could: I was not in this action, but this I heard of all that were in it, and from the prisoner.

Sol. Gen. When he gave you that guinea, did not he speak any thing of a horse that was to be provided for you?

Bertram. Not a word: I never did see a horse upon that account, nor was I master of a horse, nor was I told I should have a horse in any respect whatsoever.

Juryman. How could you ride out, as you say they were to do, without a horse, or without knowing any thing of a horse to be provided for you?

Bertram. I did not know of a horse.

L. C. J. But he said you were to ride out speedily.

Bertram. No: he said in general, we should ride out suddenly.

Att. Gen. Who was there besides yourself?

Bertram. Nobody.

Att. Gen. Then that 'we' must mean you and him. And how were you to ride out without a horse? Pray mind what you swear.

Bertram. I was to meet him the next morning, but did not.

Att. Gen. Pray, what could you understand by that, that you were to ride out suddenly, and had no horse?

Bertram. That was understood, that if I did ride out, I must have a horse.

Att. Gen. Who should you have it from? Had you a horse of your own?

Bertram. No, I had not.

Att. Gen. Did you intend to hire a horse?

Bertram. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. Did not you ask where you were to have a horse?

Bertram. No, I did not ask nor inquire, nor was it promised me I should have a horse.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you where you were to ride?

Bertram. The next morning I was to meet him.

Att. Gen. For what? To ride out was it?

Bertram. I cannot really tell whether it was upon that account or not.

Att. Gen. Whether did he tell you where he was to ride?—Bertram. Indeed, he did not.

Juryman. It is very strange that you did not ask him where he was to go, nor ask him for a horse.

Bertram. I was so senseless, that I neither did ask him about a horse, nor ever knew of any that was to be provided for me.

Juryman. Did you understand what was meant by the riding out suddenly?

Bertram. I did take it to be about the business, the seizing of the king.

Juryman. Did he compare it to attacking him in the field?

Bertram. No, he did not; but he said, he believed the king would be seized in his coach; he made no comparisons.

Mr. Mountague. Pray, Mr. Bertram, why did you not meet him? What reasons had you for not doing it?

Bertram. I thought it not requisite to meet him.

Mr. Mountague. What! had you no mind to the thing?

Bertram. No, I had not; because I thought the thing very unlawful.

Att. Gen. Pray what was that thing you speak of, that you thought was unlawful?

Bertram. I thought it was about seizing and killing the king.

L. C. J. Pray, mind; there is nobody desires you should speak more than the truth; but on the other side, being upon your oath, you are to speak the whole truth; for if you conceal any part of the truth, though you have a kindness for your countryman, Mr. Lowick, who has been kind to you, you will forswear yourself, for you make a different representation of the matter, and make it appear quite otherwise than it is; pray do not strain one tittle, but let us have all the truth.

Bertram. I do not believe I strain one bit.

Mr. Mountague. Then tell my lord why you did not meet him?

Bertram. I did believe it was about seizing and killing the king, and I did think it to be illegal.

Mr. Mountague. Why did you think it was about that?

Bertram. Because Mr. Charnock had told me of it before.

Att. Gen. How did you know that was what Lowick spoke to you about?

Bertram. I did suppose it to be the same, because he desired me at first to ask no questions, no more did I; but I took it always to be the same thing.

Att. Gen. What did he say to you?

Bertram. He told me he had a business to propose to me, if I would engage in, that would be for my advantage, but I must ask no questions; talked of riding out suddenly, and that the king was to be seized in his coach; and having heard of it from Charnock, I thought it was the same business.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we have one witness more. Call capt. Fisher. [He did not appear.] If he does not appear, we shall let them go on, and when he comes in, we can examine him afterwards.

L. C. J. Is he a material witness?

Sol. Gen. We do apprehend he is a very material witness.

L. C. J. If you think him a material witness, it will not be proper for them to enter upon their defence, till they have heard the whole accusation.

The Court staid for Mr. Fisher's coming for near an hour, and at last he came in and was sworn.

L. C. J. Who is this?

Att. Gen. This is one captain Fisher.

Sol. Gen. Pray, captain Fisher, do you know Mr. Lowick, the prisoner at the bar?

Fisher. I have not talked with Mr. Lowick since the 8th of February, and then he talked that he would be ready to serve his master to the uttermost of his power.

Att. Gen. What master?

Fisher. King James.

Att. Gen. What particular service?

Fisher. He named no particular service, but only that he would be ready to serve his master to the uttermost of his power.

Att. Gen. Where was this?

Fisher. At the Cock in Bow-street.

Att. Gen. Who was in company?

Fisher. There was Mr. Harrison.

Att. Gen. Pray, give an account of what you know of this barbarous, bloody design.

Fisher. I believe there was a design to seize the prince of Orange.

Att. Gen. What do you know of it? You say you believe it.

Fisher. I believe it by my knowledge, because I was concerned in it.

Att. Gen. By whom was that design carried on?

Fisher. By sir George Barclay and Mr. Harrison.

L. C. J. What was the design?

Fisher. We were to fall upon the prince of Orange.

L. C. J. You called him so, the prince of Orange?—Fisher. Yes, mylord.

Att. Gen. Well, tell us what happened.

Fisher. It was to have been done the 15th of February, and we met accordingly the 14th, but the king not going abroad, it was put off.

L. C. J. Who met on the 14th?

Fisher. I met only Mr. Harrison and sir George Barclay, then it was put off till the 22nd; upon the 21st, we met at the Three-Tuns in Holborn, and from thence we came to the Sun-tavern in the Strand, and there was nobody but Mr. Harrison and I together, and sir George Barclay came to us; I believe there were about 14 or 16 in the house; there sir George Barclay told me, Mr. Lowick was to meet me and two more at an inn by St. Giles's Pound, and that we were to go together to seize the prince of Orange the 22nd.

L. C. J. Did you meet him?

Fisher. I did not meet him, it being put off by the king's not going abroad.

L. C. J. This does not affect Mr. Lowick at all.

Att. Gen. It does not, we acknowledge; but at that time which you speak of, the 8th of February, had you any knowledge of the assassination?

Fisher. There was no assassination at that time, at least, it was not then declared.

Att. Gen. What was your discourse about then?

Fisher. There was notice of the king's preparing to come for England.

Att. Gen. You say Mr. Harrison was there?

Fisher. Yes, and talked very little about the matter, but only that there were preparations for the king's coming.

Att. Gen. What did Lowick say to you?

Fisher. I have told you all that Mr. Lowick said to me.

Att. Gen. Repeat it again.

Fisher. He said he would be ready to serve his master to the uttermost of his power.

Mr. Cowper. Had you no discourse about an act of parliament?

Fisher. Mr. Lowick said it was not convenient to talk with more than one at any time, for there was an act of parliament on foot, that under two witnesses nothing should affect a man's life in treason.

Att. Gen. The act of parliament was then a-making.

L. C. J. When Mr. Lowick said he would serve his master, what discourse had you about it?

Fisher. Mr. Lowick said not a word within, but at the door he said he would serve his master to his power.

Att. Gen. What was that they would not talk with above one at a time?

Fisher. Nothing that was thought treasonable practices should be discoursed before above one at a time; so I understood it.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, we have done.

Sir B. Shower. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; I am of counsel in this case for the prisoner at the bar, and we do hope here is not evidence sufficient to convict him of high treason; the question is not, Whether there was a plot or a conspiracy to assassinate the king, or to prepare for an invasion; but all that you are to consider, gentlemen, is, whether the evidence against Mr. Lowick be sufficient to convince you, that he did design to seize and assassinate the king; there are three witnesses produced; but we think this last witness, Fisher, his testimony does not hurt him in the least. We know your lordship will declare and direct the jury, that the evidence in a case of treason ought to be plain, not only with respect to the fact, that it was done, but also of such facts as are the evidences of a man's intentions; and those are not to be construed by strains and intendment, or implications, unless they be such as evidently, naturally, and to common understanding express the intention, it cannot be good evidence in treason: now we say, that captain Fisher has said nothing at all that will affect the prisoner; for all that he says is, that the 8th of February he said he was ready to serve his master to the utmost of his power, and any words as well as these may be construed to make a man guilty of treasonable intentions; for it might be a recollection of favours received, or it might be a grateful intent to serve him upon particular occasions; but that is no evidence upon this indictment. Suppose it was to serve him upon the supposed intended invasion, yet, with submission, that is not evidence of the overt-act laid here; here is no overt-act mentioned of preparing arms, or encouraging men, or seducing the king's subjects, in order to the better restoring of the late king James, or the expected landing of the French, or the like. All that is laid to the prisoner's charge is, the compassing the king's death, and a design to assassinate him in his coach; and in order to the assassination, he was to buy arms and horses: now all that he says is quite of another nature, of a quite different strain, and has no tendency to this matter; and nothing he says that Lowick should say, but is applicable the other way, and tends more naturally to the invasion, than to the assassination. Your lordship observes, there was some notice taken of what Mr. Lowick should say, concerning the act of parliament, that he would not talk with above one at a time: how far, when life is concerned, such loose discourse ought to be inforced before a jury, I must leave to your lordship; though a man may be innocent, yet he may be cautious, and the more innocent, perhaps the more cautious; but that is applicable to the invasion too, and has no relation to the treason in this indictment more than any other. It shows he was more wary than others were, but it is not applicable to the fact that he now stands charged with. Then the whole of the evidence depends upon the testimony of Mr. Harris and Mr. Bertram; and we think they are not two witnesses to one thing, and what they say must be strained, and intended, and presumed, to make evidence of treason; for what Mr. Harris says about the discourses between him and the late king James, about receiving orders from sir George Barclay, and his passage over from France, and the several stages he and Mr. Hare travelled, and the discourses between sir George Barclay and him: your lordship will acquaint the jury, that is no evidence to affect Mr. Lowick, nor what Berkenhead and Hare agreed upon does any way affect Mr. Lowick; for those things may be all true, and yet Mr. Lowick innocent of what he stands charged with in this indictment; he says, That upon the first Saturday he saw Mr. Lowick at the confectioner's, but he cannot say he staid there at all; there was not a word spoken by Mr. Lowick that he remembers then, but what he says that seems to touch, and the only thing that touches Mr. Lowick in all this evidence is, that upon Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday, it is a pretty large time, between the 15th and the 22nd, he was talking with Mr. Lowick about the barbarity of this business, and that Lowick after all said he would obey orders: now with submission, my lord, to make that to have relation to the assassination must be by a forced, strained intendment; he does not declare what the orders were; nay, he does not affirm there were any orders for the assassination, but only that he would obey orders; here is no order by writing, no order by parole that Mr. Lowick declared he would obey. As to what Lowick declared about his intention of riding out and seizing the king in his coach, that cannot be intended; the order that he was to obey to assassinate the king, that order does not appear; there are no footsteps of it in all the evidence; so that there is nothing in testimony that will hurt Mr. Lowick: then upon the 22nd, when they dined together, Mr. Harris says, that there was a discourse of two men; but it does not appear, nor does the witness give any account what those two men were to be for: it is true, two men he was to get discharged; but that is not evidence that these men were to make a part of those forty; neither the words before nor the words after can have that construction; nay, it does not appear it was for any purpose at all: now in the case of life, where a man stands at the bar, we hope such an evidence shall not be construed to make a proof of a treasonable intention, that these were to assassinate the king, or to make part of the forty that were to do it; when it does not appear they were there, nor who they were, nor any sort of notice taken or given upon what account they were provided. And then as to Mr. Bertram's evidence, it is palpable that his evidence, and whatsoever he says, cannot amount to make one witness to prove an overt-act within this statute, and that there must be two witnesses the law requires. What does Mr. Bertram say, to prove any man guilty of treason, but only by intendment, thought or suspicion? it is true, Mr. Bertram's evidence would be good enough to commit a man upon suspicion of treason, but to convict him it cannot be. He says, that in the beginning of February he spoke to him, and told him he would employ him in a business that would be for his advantage, but he must ask no questions: This is very dark, for the meaning of it does not appear what was intended by it; it might be one thing as well as another; it might be to employ him in his family, or it might be to send him of a journey, or it might be the taking of a farm; but to apply that as an evidence of a charge of high treason, that we think is very hard, and we hope your lordship will think so too: but then he comes and tells you further of a discourse upon the 14th, of his riding out suddenly, and that the king was to be seized in his coach; but he does not say that he was to seize him, nor that he would be concerned in it, nor that he knew of it, nor did declare at what time it was to be done, nor any thing certain whether it was a prophecy, or a dream, or a story that he related again, or what it was; there is no connection between the riding out suddenly, and the other words of seizing the king in his coach: Then he says he gave him a guinea to buy him necessities; the man acknowledges Mr. Lowick several times, had given him in charity, money, cloaths, and other things, and gave his wife a guinea, as you observe, in charity; but he gave him this guinea on purpose to buy him necessities; and it is hard that a man's charity to a countryman, to a townsman, to an ancient acquaintance of twenty years standing, to a person that he had been familiar with formerly, and known to have lived well, should be misinterpreted and strained, to make it a giving him money as subsistence, and a reward for the doing, such a mischievous bloody act: we say, his charity to this man formerly is inconsistent with the supposition that he could be privy to such a barbarous design now; and we hope the jury will consider the character that that very man has given to my client; for the same witness gives you an account of his behaviour all along, that he was not given to rash and barbarous actions, nor guilty of any malicious thing; nay, that he prevented mischief, and the killing of people in cold blood. We must leave it to the jury's consideration, and your lordship's direction. All these things that they say may be true, and Lowick be not guilty; and the acquitting of Mr. Lowick will be no reflection upon the witnesses, nor any discredit to the testimony that has been given of this conspiracy; but we hope it is doing justice to this man, the witnesses not coming up to the proof of what is laid in the indictment. We must beg your lordship's patience a little longer, and call some witnesses to give you an account how long they have known Mr. Lowick, and what his real character is; they will tell you he is a peaceable, good man, and shew you that his temper and inclination was rather to a sober, quiet life, than to lead him to such action, and that they cannot think him likely to be tempted to be concerned in such a design; and then we must leave it to the jury. Call Mrs. Yorke.

Lowick. I believe there is nobody here that knows me, but will give me that character. [Mrs. Yorke came in, and was sworn.]

Sir B. Shower. Pray, Mrs. Yorke, how long have you known Mr. Lowick?

Yorke. About a dozen or fourteen years.

Sir B. Shower. What sort of disposition is he of?

Yorke. He is a civil, honest man as ever I saw in my life, or ever knew of; and I never heard otherwise from any one that knew him.

Sir B. Shower. What was he in his actions? Was he malicious, or good-natured?

Yorke. As good a natured man as ever I saw.

Mr. Mompesson. Has he the reputation of a cruel, bloody-minded man?

Yorke. Quite the contrary. He lodged in my house half a year; it is not quite a year ago since he lay at my house. He was the most obliging man that ever lay in my house. He was so civil to all the lodgers, that they admired him for his goodness, and made them in love with him.

L. C. J. How came he to lodge at your house?

Yorke. He came from his other landlady; they could not agree; his other landlady was a sort of a shrew, and therefore he did not care for staying there; and I desired his company, because I knew him to be so obliging and civil a man.

L. C. J. Where is your house?

Yorke. In Bloomsbury.

L. C. J. What is his way of living? Is he a man of an estate?

Yorke. I cannot tell; I did not enquire into that.

L. C. J. Had he no employment to get his living by?

Yorke. I do not know any thing of that; I never enquired into it; he paid me very honestly for my lodging, and he is a very good man, for any thing I know.

Sir B. Shower. Then call Mrs. Mosely. [She came in, and was sworn.]

L. C. J. Well, what do you ask this gentleman?

Sir B. Shower. Pray, Mrs. Mosely, will you tell my lord and the jury, do you know Mr. Lowick?

Mosely. Yes, Sir, I do.

Sir B. Shower. How long have you known him?

Mosely. Near twenty years.

Sir B. Shower. Pray give an account, upon your knowledge, what disposition and temper he is of, whether he is rash, malicious, bloody, and ill-natured.

Mosely. He is a peaceable, virtuous, honest man, and a man that I never heard or saw that creature that could speak any ill thing of him in my life; nor I never heard him speak any thing maliciously of any creature in my life, to do them a prejudice: so far from that, that he is a man has a character, perhaps, above any man that I could speak or hear of in my life. I speak it even above my own relations; they may have some passions; but I never see that gentleman in a passion in my life. He has lain in my house several times, and he has had company come to him, but never any that was scandalous one way or other. I never saw him fuddled; nor ever heard him swear, nor any one accuse him of any of those things.

Mr. Mompesson. Call Dr. William Mew. [He did not appear.]

Sir B. Shower. The prisoner has something to say for himself, my lord; but we must submit to your lordship's consideration, and the jury's, whether there be any evidence but what is dark, and favours of suspicion only; suspicious it is; but whether there be any evidence that is plain and direct as the law requires in cases of high-treason, we must leave it to your consideration, for we apprehend there is none.

Lowick. My lord, as to this business, the thing that I stand accused of, the Assassination, I know nothing in the world of it, nor never did, directly or indirectly; and if I am convicted, and could, to save my life, be the death of the poorest child in the world, I would not save my life to do it.

L. C. J. Look you, I would put you to make answer to some things; you were at sir George Barclay's at the confectioner's in Holborn; and it is sworn he came over upon such a design. Then you were with Mr. Harris at Red-Lion-Fields, and there he was speaking to you of the horridness of the design that was to be executed upon the king's person the Saturday before, and he told you he did mislike it; and thereupon you answered that you would obey orders, and that sir George Barclay had orders for it, otherwise he would not do it.

Lowick. Sir George Barclay never spoke one word of it to me.

L. C. J. Every body knows now upon what design he came over from France, and when Mr. Harris shewed dissatisfaction with the thing, you made that answer to his discourse.

Lowick. He never said one syllable to me of it. I trust to your lordship's judgment and the jury's mercy.

L. C. J. And then I would have you answer to another thing; when you dined together on the Saturday the 22nd, what were those two men that could not be discharged without you?

Lowick. My lord, I know nothing in the world of two men.

L. C. J. You went to discharge them, for the king did not go abroad that day.

Lowick. I know nothing of it.

L. C. J. He swears this, and that is as to him; but then as to Bertram, what design was that that you were to engage Bertram in for his advantage, and he was to ask no questions?

Lowick. My lord, he is a poor man, and my countryman, and I have at all times, from time to time, for this seven years, helped to subsid him and his family, that he will not deny; and I have several times given him both clothes and money.

L. C. J. Then I would ask you again, When he came to your lodging on Friday the 14th of February, and you told him the king was to be seized in his coach, and said that we were to ride out very suddenly, and you appointed him to meet the next morning; and because he did not meet you blamed him, and said, it would have been the same thing if the king had been in the field. Look you, I would have you give answer to this if you can.

Lowick. I remember nothing in the world of it, not a word I assure you; and to the best of my remembrance, I did not see him in two days after.

Att. Gen. My lord, I must beg leave to answer to the objection that the counsel for the prisoner have made, that there are not two witnesses to prove the overt-act laid in the indictment, and so the law is not satisfied. In answer to that, I desire your lordship's favour to observe how the evidence is, and then we shall see whether there are not plainly two positive witnesses of the overt-act, by agreeing to assassinate the king. The first witness is Mr. Harris; your lordship observes, that Mr. Harris gives an account that Mr. Lowick was at sir George Barclay's lodgings the first day that it was to have been executed; and that afterwards between the 15th and the 22nd, those being the first and second days that this was to be done, when he and Rookwood, and the prisoner Lowick, were walking together in Red-Lion-fields; and there had some discourse about the intended assassination, and the barbarity and bloodiness of it, and Mr. Harris and Mr. Rookwood were averse to it. Mr. Lowick said he would obey orders, and he was sure sir George Barclay would not do it unless he had direct orders for it; that was twice repeated by him, as Harris swears: and afterwards Mr. Harris tells you, that the 22d he dined with Mr. Lowick, and Mr. Lowick observed that Mr. Harris came in in a great sweat, and asked him how it happened; he said he had been about to get Rookwood's party that were to seize the king; for he was to have one party. Says Mr. Lowick to him, you need not grudge to do it, you have six shillings a day, I have nothing; and yet I, at my own charge, am to provide two. This is as positive evidence as well can be of his being privy to the design; and his engaging people at his own charge, shews a great deal of forwardness and zeal in the prisoner to the business. My lord, I think this is positive and plain evidence; and not only made out by inferences and constructions, as sir B. Shower says, but plain, positive proof. The first day he was with several of them, and when they discoursed of the thing afterwards, he declared he would obey orders; and what could those orders be but for what they were discoursing of? And nothing was discoursed of but this design they were engaged in, and this was to justify the thing, and take off the apprehension of the barbarity of it: This is Harris's testimony. The next witness is Bertram, and he tells you, that the 5th of February the prisoner sent for him, and when he came to him, he asked if he would engage in a business that might be for his advantage, and ask no questions; so at that time he did not acquaint him what the thing was, but that shews it was a thing that was to be kept secret at that time, in regard he did not think fit to acquaint him at the first instance. But the 14th of February when he met him again, the day before the first time that it was to be put in execution, Bertram swears he told him that they were to ride out the next morning: that must be Lowick and Bertram, for there was nobody else there; and that the prince of Orange was to be seized in his coach. Was it possible the prisoner could be ignorant of it? when he engaged him to go upon a design without asking questions; sent for him the day before, acquainted him they were to ride out the next morning, and that the king was to be seized in his coach, and bid him be ready against next morning, and gave him a guinea at that time; the witness says it was for necessaries, but he does not pretend that it was for charity, as formerly. And that must be for necessaries for that purpose that they were then discoursing of, when he desired him to be ready the next day, and gives him money to buy him necessaries: what can that be, but necessaries for what he was to be ready for? And then he did not come the next day, and he tells you why, because he thought it a very wicked and unlawful thing, and so he disappointed him; and the next time Lowick chid him, and told him, he would have served him so if the king had been in the field. This is plain, though I believe Bertram does speak as tenderly as he can, being his friend and old acquaintance, and is willing to say as little as he can of him: so that I believe nobody thinks but what Bertram says against the prisoner is true, and what he swears is plain and positive. To shew that Lowick did engage in the design, he acquainted him with it the 14th, by telling him the king was to be seized, and they were to ride out, and he was to be ready the next day.

L. C. J. He does not say they were to ride out the next day.

Sir B. Shower. No, the words were, We are to ride out suddenly.

Att. Gen. I think he did say they were to ride out the next morning.

L. C. J. No, call him in again.

Mr. Cowper. The words were, We shall ride out suddenly, and bid him meet him next morning; and afterwards chid him for not meeting accordingly, and told him it had been the same thing if the king had been in the field.

L. C. J. If you cannot agree upon the evidence, you must call in the witness.

Mr. Mountague. My lord, we are agreed upon the evidence, it was suddenly.

L. C. J. Well then, there is no occasion; have you done on both sides?

Counsel. Yes, my lord, we submit it to your lordship.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, this prisoner at the bar, Robert Lowick, is indicted of high-treason, for compassing and imagining the death and destruction of the king by an assassination; you have heard what evidence has been given upon this indictment. And in the first place, it is proved to you that there was a design to assassinate the king, which was to be carried on under the conduct and management of sir George Barclay. The question that you are now to consider of is, Whether the prisoner at the bar was concerned or engaged in the prosecution of that design? There have been two witnesses produced, who have given their evidence, and have been very strictly examined, and observations have been made upon the testimony they have given.

The first witness is Mr. Harris; and he gives you some account of the original of this design. He tells you how he was at St. Germain, and introduced to the late king James, who did express a great kindness for him, and told him that he had an opportunity of doing something for him that would be for his advantage: and that he and one Hare, who was present at that time, should go into England, (for it seems they were both together introduced by colonel Parker) and should be subsisted in England, and thereupon directions were given them what course they were to take; which was to go to Calais, and to each of them ten lewidores were given for their charges; and they were acquainted, that if it happened that if they should lie there so long for want of a wind to bring them over hither that their money was spent, provision should be made for their supply there. They had farther directions, that when they came into England, they should apply themselves to sir George Barclay, and follow his orders, with instructions how to find him; being told that Sir George Barclay would be walking in Covent-garden every Monday, and every Thursday night, about the hours of six or seven o'clock, and that they should know him by a white handkerchief that was to hang out of his pocket.

Mr. Harris further tells you, That they did come to Calais in order to embark for England, and there they happened to stay a considerable time, even so long that their money would not defray their expenses there, and they found it true as it was promised them; for the president of Calais paid the reckoning for them at the place where they lodged; and afterwards they came into England, and landed in Kent, and went to Rochester, and from thence to London.

About the latter end of January, old stile (for it should seem it was the 14th new stile, which is the 4th old stile, they were at St. Germain), he tells you that he did go, the first Monday after their arrival, into Covent garden, to look after sir George Barclay, but then missed him. But afterwards his companion, Mr. Hare, met with one Berkenhead, and complaining that they had not met with sir George Barclay according to the directions they had abroad; whereupon, by the means of Berkenhead, they were brought to the speech of sir George Barclay, who gave them reception, and owned that he had authority to subside them: but said he had not then money, but shortly should, and when he had, they should be sure to receive their subsistence. He tells you, that after this, sir George Barclay gave them subsistence money, paying them at the rate of five shillings a day when they had no horses, and when they had, six shillings a day: so they put themselves altogether under his command and conduct. He has given you an account what discourse he had with Mr. Rookwood, from whom he discovered what the design was in which he was to be engaged. And the design to assassinate the king was first intended to be put in execution on Saturday the 15th of February; at which day Mr. Harris and others being at sir George Barclay's lodgings, sir George said, they were his Janisaries, and afterwards caressed them, and said they were men of honour, and told them that they were to attack the prince of Orange and his guards; but it seems the king not going abroad that day, they lost that opportunity.

Truly, then Mr. Harris began to be a little troubled, when he understood the meaning of his being under sir George Barclay's conduct. And he says that after that first Saturday the 15th, and before the next Saturday the 22d, he met with Lowick, Rookwood, and Bernarde, and he was complaining of his being engaged in such a design as this was. He called it then the murder of the prince of Orange, and said it was a barbarous thing, and he did not like it, nor Rookwood neither; but as for Lowick, whether he disliked it, or no, I know not, but he made answer to him, I will obey orders: says he, sir George Barclay has orders for it, or otherwise he would not do it.

Then you are told farther, that after this, on Saturday the 22d, Mr. Harris dined with Lowick at a cook's at the end of Red-lion-street, and being there together, Harris being in a sweat, and was asked the reason by Lowick, he said he had been giving of orders for the getting some men together that were to go under Rookwood; and Lowick told him he might very well do it, for he had pay 6s a day; but says he, I am to subside two men, and have nothing at all. Mr. Harris wished him to go to sir George Barclay, and complain of it to him, but he said he would not; but it seems, it being then understood by them that the king did not go abroad that day, Lowick said he must go and discharge the two men.

and what about it. This is the same and substance of Mr. Harris's evidence against Mr. Lowick.

The next witness is Bertram, and he tells you, that some time before the 10th of February, which was, as I told you, the very last day that they did design to assassinate the king, Mr. Lowick said for him, and told him, that he would put him upon a business that should be for his advantage; if he would undertake it without asking any questions; this was some time before, but the certain day Bertram does not remember; but he tells you further that on Friday the 14th of February, he was with Lowick at his lodgings, and he said unto him, that the king, he did believe, was to be seized in his coach, and was to ride out suddenly; and then he gave him a guinea to buy him necessaries, and wished him to meet him at the pump house in Mark street next morning; and Bertram tells you, he had understood what this design was, for he had it before from Charles, and did forthwith go the next morning, because he did dislike it. After this Mr. Lowick met him and chid him for disappointing of him, in not meeting him as he directed, for, says he, it would have been the same thing if the king had been in the field. This is the sum and substance of the evidence that Bertram has given against him.*

Now Bertram being cross-examined on the behalf of the prisoner, says, he hath known him a great while, and that he is a man of a peaceable and fair disposition, very charitable, and that he has given him money before, and particularly a guinea to his wife in his absence.

Indeed I might have mentioned the evidence of Fisher to you, but that is but circumstantial, and does not come home to the case; but being given it may be mentioned; and that is, about the 8th of February, Fisher had some discourse with Lowick, and it seems there was notice taken of the intended invasion, and Lowick said he would serve his master faithfully; and that the witness thought was meant of the late king; and he said at another time, that he would not discourse with any one at a time, because of the late act of parliament that was then a passing, relating to high treason, that required two witnesses. Now, I say, this is not any proof against the prisoner, but is a circumstance that may show his inclination to the taking.

The counsel for the prisoner have insisted upon the insufficiency of the evidence that has been given on behalf of the king, and have said, that the law as of parliament requires two witnesses, which is true, but not two witnesses to any one event not; but if there be two witnesses, one to one and another to another event, that is sufficient; but they say that is not so in this case.

In the first place, they object against the evidence that is given by Harris, they say it is short, and mostly left to your consideration; whether the evidence that is given by Harris concerning Mr. Lowick, does prove to your satisfaction, that he conspired and agreed to the assassination of the king, you are to weigh the evidence; when it is sworn that when Harris, Bertram, and the prisoner were walking in Red Lion fields, and talking of this horrid design, and Harris complained that it was a barbarous thing to murder the prince of Orange, as they called him, you must consider what answer Lowick did make about obeying of orders; then his subsisting of men at his own charge without pay, and complaining of his having no pay, and his discharging them the last day that the assassination was intended, that I must leave to you, whether or no this is not an evidence, if you believe the witness, to satisfy you that he was engaged in this design.

Then, gentlemen, he has also been desired to give an answer to this question, and to tell upon what design he was to employ Bertram that should be for his advantage; but he was to ask no questions; and afterwards whether he did tell him the king was to be seized in his coach, and they were to ride out suddenly, and bid him meet him the next morning, and when he did not meet him, he said, it would have been the same thing if the king had been in the field. If this be an evidence of Mr. Lowick's engaging in, and agreeing and consenting to the design, then here will be another witness against the prisoner besides Harris.

Gentlemen, you are to judge of this matter and of the evidence. It is true, we are not to put in the case of a man's life, any forced and violent constructions upon any words or discourses; but if the evidence be plain and clear, though he did not say in express words, that he did design to assassinate or kill the king; yet, if upon the whole discourse that past between them it appears plainly, clearly, and satisfactorily to you that he did consent and agree to this design, or was engaged in it, here is another witness, I say, to prove him guilty, besides Harris; you are to consider the whole evidence, the subject matter of discourse, and if you are satisfied, I say, that he was engaged in such a design by the proof of Bertram, as well as of Harris, then there are two witnesses, which is as much as the law requires.

But, indeed, the counsel have called several witnesses to prove that the prisoner has lived very peaceably and quietly; one woman says, she has known him twelve years, and that he lodged at her house, and that he was a man of great temper and candour, and not disorderly, but had a general good nature and character; And then there is another, Mrs. Manley, that proves the like, and says, she has known him these twenty years, and she says no man has a better character; And Mr. Beccum hath said, that he was not of a rash or bloody temper.

Now, gentlemen, I must leave it to you upon the evidence that you have heard, there are these witnesses that have been produced, and then you are to consider whether the answer of Mr. Lowick, does prove to your satisfaction,

James that he had given, that the prisoner, Mr. Lowick did consent to, and engage himself in that design of assassinating the king, then you must find him guilty; if you are not satisfied, you are to find him not guilty; you have heard your evidence, and had best consider of it.

Then an officer was sworn to keep the jury, who withdrew, and staid out about half an hour, and then returned.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen of the jury, answer to your oath. George Ford.

Mr. Ford. Yes. (Answered the rest.)

Cl. of Ar. Are you all agreed on your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Forwards.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Lowick, hold up thy hand, (which he did). Look upon the prisoner; how say thou, 'Is he guilty of the high-treason which of he stand indicted, or not guilty?

Jury. Guilty, my lord.

Cl. of Ar. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements had he at the time of the treason committed, or at any time since?

Jury. None to our knowledge, we do not find any.

Cl. of Ar. Then hearken to your verdict, as the court hath recorded it. You say that Robert Lowick is guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no goods, chattels, lands or tenements at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since to your knowledge, and so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

L. C. J. Discharge the jury.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen of the jury, the court discharges you, and thanks you for your service.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, will you have the prisoners set to the bar?

Att. Gen. Yes, if your lordship please.

Then the keeper of Newgate brought Rookwood and Cranburne, and all three were set to the bar.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please to give judgment against the prisoners that are convicted.

L. C. J. Ask them what they have to say for themselves in arrest of judgment.

Cl. of Ar. Robert Lowick, hold up thy hand; you stand convicted of high-treason, in conspiring the death of the king by assassination, what can you say for yourself why the court should not give judgment against you, as the law directs?

Then the Keeper bid him stand.

L. C. J. No, no, he need not stand; if you have any thing to say, Mr. Lowick, we will hear you.

Lowick. I shew myself upon the king's mercy.

Cl. of Ar. Answer me, what you have to say, (which he did). You stand convicted of the same high-treason, for conspiring the death of the king by assassination; what can you say for yourself, why the court should not give you judgment to die according to law?

Rookwood. All that can be said has been said already, and so I shall say no more.

Cl. of Ar. Charles Cranburne, hold up thy hand. Then standest convicted of high-treason, in conspiring the death of the king by assassination, what canst thou say for thyself, why the court should not give thee judgment to die according to law?

Cranburne. I have nothing to say but what I have said already.

Cl. of Ar. Then, cryer, make proclamation!

Cryer. O yes, all manner of persons are commanded to keep silence while judgment is in giving, upon pain of imprisonment.

L. C. J. You, the prisoner at the bar, Robert Lowick, Ambrose Rookwood, and Charles Cranburne, you have been indicted, and upon full and clear evidence have been convicted of high-treason; a treason that was advanced to the highest degree both of malice and mischief against the king and kingdom; you designed to assassinate the king with an intent to subvert the state, and by the introducing of a foreign power to destroy the ancient liberty and constitution of England.

Our French and Popish enemies, by which you were employed in this bloody enterprise, did very well know, that the wisdom and courage of his present majesty has rescued this kingdom from that slavery and oppression which they often threatened to bring upon us; they knew that under his government we have been protected in the enjoyment of our religion, laws and liberty for several years, and that his majesty is the head of the Protestant interest, and the protector and preserver of the liberty of Europe; and that upon the preservation of his life, and the safety of his person, the good and happiness of multitudes of people do depend, which the French king's pride and ambition has been ready to take hold of any opportunity to enslave and oppress.

Your being engaged in such a horrid design against so precious a life, and to be the bloody instruments to give that dismal stroke, which would have brought misery and desolation upon so many men, renders you worthy to undergo a greater and more severe punishment than by the law of England can be inflicted; but that there is no greater provided for such criminals, is to be imputed to the ancient honesty and integrity of Englishmen, who, when they framed this constitution of government, never imagined England should produce such degenerate wretches, as would endeavour by plots and conspiracies to betray their country to a foreign yoke, and subject themselves and their fellow-subjects to the slavish dominion of strangers.

Your crime being so great, it is not high time for you seriously to reflect upon it, and though you deserve to suffer the punishment of punishment, yet I have this compassion for your persons, that I will not say you shall make use of that opportunity which is now put into your hands, to repent. And since you are adjudged by the law unworthy to live here, that you will make preparation to appear at another tribunal, where you must have another trial, and, without an hearty and sincere repentance, receive a more severe sentence. I hope this calamity, and the judgment that is to fall upon you, will be an admonition to you to take better advice in the last part of your lives which is left you, than you have done in the whole course of your lives, and that you will be wiser than to follow the direction of those guides whose principles and doctrines have so far perverted and corrupted you, as to engage you in such a bloody design. I shall leave you to make that preparation for another world which is proper for men in your condition, and pronounce the judgment of the court, which the law hath appointed and the court does award:

That all of you be conveyed from hence to the prison from whence you came, and from thence every one of you is to be drawn upon a hurdle to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged by your necks, and to be cut down while you are alive, your privy-members are to be cut off, and your bowels are to be cut out of your bodies, and burnt in your view; your heads are to be cut off, and your bodies to be divided into four parts, and your heads and quarters are to be disposed where his majesty shall appoint. And I pray God to have mercy on all your souls!

Cranborne. I humbly desire the liberty of my wife and relations to come to me, and such divines as I shall desire may have free recourse to me.

L. C. J. You shall have that liberty that is allowed to all persons in your condition.

Roekwood. I must beg the same favour to have some few friends and relations come to see me without a keeper.

L. C. J. You shall have a warrant for your friends to come to you.

Roekwood. I beg your lordship that you would please to specify it in the warrant, because they would not grant it hitherto without a keeper being by.

L. C. J. You mean, you would have your brother permitted to come to you.

Roekwood. Yes, and some few relations.

L. C. J. What is usually done in such cases, let it be done.

Lowick. My lord, I desire the same thing, that my sister may come to me, and that the little time I have, I may be in private with my friends.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, they may give the names of those they would have admitted to them, and then the keeper will attend your lordship for your direction.

Lowick. That the keeper must take care of, but they allow such a liberty as may endanger no escape, for their being there may prove a dangerous thing.

Att. Gen. It is reasonable they should tell

L. C. J. You allow them, I suppose, to have private discourse in the same room, if a keeper be by.

Cranborne. No, my lord, we never had.

Att. Gen. Such as your lordship thinks proper to be admitted to them may have discourse with them in private, if the keeper be in the room, but no others but such as your lordship shall allow; for we know what has been the effect of a liberty of access to some prisoners.

L. C. J. Let us have a note of those names that you would have come to you, and we will give directions that shall be proper in it.

Ch. of St. Dunstons of Middlesex, you must take them into your custody till execution is done.

Then the Keeper took away the prisoners.

On Wednesday, April 22, Ambrose Roekwood, Robert Lowick, and Charles Cranborne, were drawn to Tyburn, where the two former delivered the following Papers to the sheriff.

Mason Lowick's Paper.

In the name of the Holy Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Amen. In the first place, I die in the religion I was baptised, viz. Roman Catholic, and humbly beg the prayers of all good people for a happy resurrection, and of all Catholics for the good of my soul.

As for being engaged in this for which I die, it was never so positive that I had a word from the beginning to the very last, nor never see any allowed me, or the two men I was to provide, as was sworn against me at my trial; nor had I any on that account; nor was I at any of their meetings when they settled any such thing. And as for any order or commission from king James, I never see any since I came last into England, which is now about five years; and I am confident none that knew king James will believe he would give any such order.

I indeed, I must confess, I believe king James was a-coming to assert his own right; and I should, if on shore, have done any thing in my power to have assisted him; and in order to that, I should have been very glad to have had a horse, but never had any.

And as for being concerned in any bloody affair, I never was in my life, but have done my endeavour to prevent, as much as I could, or all occasions; and if the killing the most miserable creature in the world, or greatest enemy, would now save my life, restore the king, and make me one of the greatest men in England, I first would choose to die, because against the Law of God.

If any who are now concerned on this account, think I have been too forward, and a promoter to this design, I do now declare it was never my inclination to do any such thing. However, I beg their pardons, and of all the world I have attended either in thought, word, or my action whatsoever, and do freely forgive my enemies, and hope, through the mercy of my Saviour Jesus Christ, to have remission of all my sins. Good God preserve the king, queen, prince, and princess, and all that royal blood of Stairs; and may England never want one of that direct line to govern them, and make them once more happy! I have had the honour to serve my royal master in several commissions, and the last as major, and always ever to serve him to the best of my power, and ever to be just to those whom I had the honour to command. Lord Jesus, into thy hands I recommend my spirit! O Jesus, receive my soul!

ROBERT LOWICK.

BRIGADIER ROOKWOOD'S PAPER.

Having committed the justice of my cause, and recommended my soul to God, on whose merits, through the merits of Jesus Christ, I wholly cast myself, I had once resolved to die in silence; but second thoughts of my duty to others, chiefly to my true and liege sovereign king James, moved me to leave this behind me.

I do therefore, with all truth and sincerity, declare and avow, that I never knew, saw, or heard of any order or commission from king James for the assassinating the prince of Orange, and attacking his Guards; but I am certainly informed that he, the best of kings, had often rejected proposals of that nature when made unto him.

Now do I think he knew the least of the particular design of the attacking the Guards, at his landing, so much talked of, in which I was engaged as a soldier, by my immediate commander, much against my judgment; but his soldier I was, and as such I was to obey and act according to command.

These twelve years I have served my true king and master, king James, and freely saw lay down my life in his cause. I ever abhorred treachery, even to an enemy; if it be a guilt to have complied with what I thought, and still think, to have been my duty, I am guilty. No other guilt do I own.

As I beg all to forgive me, so I forgive all from my heart, even the prince of Orange, who, as a soldier, ought to have considered my case before he signed the warrant for my death. I pray God may open his eyes, and render him sensible of the much blood, from all parts, crying out against him, so to prevent an heavier execution hanging over his head, than what he inflicts on me.

AMMONS ROOKWOOD.

After which they were executed as traitors, according to their sentence.

389. The Trial of PETER COOK, at the Old-Bailey, for High Treason:

8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.

Saturday, May 9, 1696.

THIS day being appointed for the trial of Mr. Peter Cook, upon an indictment of high-treason found against him by the grand jury for the city of London, upon the commission of gaol-delivery of Newgate, holden for the said city, upon which indictment he had been arraigned, and upon pleading not guilty, issue had been joined; and the court having been adjourned unto this day for the trial by public proclamation in usual manner, the court was resumed, and the names of the men returned to serve on the jury having been called over, according to the panel, and the defaulters recorded; the court proceeded as follows:

Cl. of Arr. Set Peter Cook the prisoner at the bar. [Which was done.] You prisoner at the bar, those men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak to them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Cook. Sir, I desire you would not name them to me, for my eyes are very bad.

Cl. of Arr. John Ewer.

Cook. What name I signify myself to, Sir? I desire to know whether he is a freeholder in London?

Cl. of Arr. I know nothing to the contrary, Sir, he is returned as such by the sheriff; you had best ask him himself, he can best tell.

Cook. Are you a freeholder in London, Sir?

Ewer. Yes, sir, I am a freeholder.

Cook. Sir, I challenge you.

Cl. of Arr. Henry Sherbrook.

Cook. Sir, are you a freeholder in London?

Sherbrook. Yes, Sir, I am.

Cook. I challenge you.—No, Sir, I beg your pardon, I do not challenge you.

Cl. of Arr. Then bid Mr. Sherbrook the book: [Which was done.] Look upon the prisoner: you shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner at the bar, whom you shall have in charge according to your evidence. So help you God.

Cl. of Arr. Joseph Billers.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, sir, in London?

Billers. Yes, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. John Brand.

Cook. Pray, sir, don't go too fast? Are you a freeholder in London, Sir?

Brand. I am he freeholder in London.

L. C. J. Truly. What say you, Mr. Attorney?

At. Gen. (Sir Thomas Trevor.) My lord, & would not have any body that is not his brother serve. So he was set by.

Cl. of Arr. William Hull.

Hull. My lord, I am a freholder in London.

L. C. J. Treby. Why, what cause have you?

Hull. What I have, is in James.

L. C. J. Treby. What wants for years, or leaves for lives?—Hull. Leaves for years, Sir.

L. C. J. Then he cannot serve upon the jury.

Cl. of Arr. Edward Leeds.

Cook. Hold, Sir, let me see; are you a freholder in London, Sir?

Leeds. Yes, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Thomas Clark.

Cook. Hold, Sir, I pray let me look upon my paper. I challenge him.

A Stander-by. He does not appear.

Cl. of Arr. Nathan Green.

Cook. Where is he, Sir? Are you a freholder?

Green. Yes, I am, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Thomas Emes.

Cook. Are you a freholder, Sir?

Emes. Yes, I am.

Cook. Were you one of sir John Freind's jury?—Emes. Yes, I was.

Cook. Then I challenge you for cause, and I give you my reason.

Serj. Darnall. I pray, let us hear your reason; give your reason for your challenge.

Cook. It is for being of sir John Freind's jury.

Serj. Darnall. Then you challenge him for cause.

Cook. Yes, that he was of sir John Freind's jury.

L. C. J. Treby. Well, brother Darnall, how is that a cause of challenge? You are the prisoner's counsel, let us hear what you say to it?

Serj. Darnall. My lord, what we have to say to it, is this; here are some persons returned upon this panel, that were formerly jurors in a cause that was tried for the same species of treason that this gentleman, the prisoner, is charged with in this indictment; and I think the witnesses at that trial did mention in their evidence my client, as being present at those very consults; about which they gave their evidence; these gentlemen gave credit to those witnesses, and found the verdict against the person then accused. We humbly submit it to your lordship and the court, whether we may not for this cause challenge this person as not indifferent, it being for the same cause and consult that the other was tried for.

Att. Gen. Sure Mr. Sergeant is not in earnest in this objection.

Serj. Darnall. My client thinks it a very good objection, that he is not indifferent, and I think he should be admitted to it.

Att. Gen. If he thinks so, he may except against him; but if he cannot upon this cause of challenge, we desire you would put the case, and my lord challenge him as usual.

Serj. Darnall. I have said you will the challenge.

L. C. J. Treby. But you hear the king's counsel object upon it, to have you make it out in point of law.

Serj. Darnall. My lord, I have stated the case of my client's counsel, and we submit it to you.

L. C. J. Treby. Well, there is nothing in it.

Serj. Darnall. Then my client, if he will not have him serve, must challenge him peremptorily; which he did.

Cl. of Arr. Francis Byer.

Cook. Sir, are you a freholder?

Byer. Yes, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. James Deane.

Deane. I am a freholder.

Cl. of Arr. Henry Hunter.

Cook. Hold, hold, my lord, I challenge him as being one of sir John Freind's jury.

Mr. Baker. Nay, that was not allowed in Mr. Emes's case; but you challenged him peremptorily, and so you must now, if you have a mind to it.

Cook. I challenge him.

Cl. of Arr. John Hall.

Cook. Are you a freholder in London, Sir?

Hall. Yes, I am, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. John Cullum.

Cook. Sir, are you a freholder in London?

Cullum. Yes, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. John Cox.

Cox. My lord, I am no freholder in London.

Cl. of Arr. John Hedges.

Cook. Hold, I pray, Sir, let me look upon my paper, Sir: are you a freholder in London?

Hedges. Yes, Sir, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Thomas James.

James. My lord, my name is not Thomas.

Sher. Buckingham. He is returned, it seems, by a wrong name; we did not know it.

Serj. Darnall. Then you cannot swear him.

Cl. of Arr. Thomas Poole.

Cook. Are you a freholder in London, Sir?

Poole. Yes, Sir.

Cook. I challenge him, as being of sir John Freind's jury.

Att. Gen. That has been over-ruled already.

Cook. I challenge him.

Cl. of Arr. Peter Parker.

Cook. Are you a freholder in London?

Parker. Yes, Sir, I am.

Cook. I challenge you, Sir, as being one of sir John Freind's jury.

Mr. Baker. Nay, you cannot offer it again.

Cook. I challenge him.

Cl. of Arr. George Grove.

Cook. Where is he? Are you a freholder in London, Sir?

Grove. Yes, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Nathaniel Wyeridell.

Cook. Are you a freholder in London?

Wyeridell. Yes, Sir, I am. [Challenged.]

* See the seventh Resolution in the Case of the Right Hon. Vol. 2, p. 523, and the Case of Charles Gresham, p. 521 of this Volume.

Cl. of Arr. Samuel Blewit.

Cook. Hold, pray, are you a freeholder, Sir?—Blewit. Yes, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. John Wolfe. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Joseph Wolfe. [He did not appear, and was said to be no freeholder.]

Cl. of Arr. William Smith.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Smith. Yes, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Edward Fenwick.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Fenwick. Yes, Sir, I am.

Cook. I do not challenge him.

Cl. of Arr. Then swear Mr. Fenwick.

[Which was done.]

Cl. of Arr. Benjamin Hooper.

Cook. Stay, Sir, pray stay a little, where is he?—Cl. of Arr. There he is, Sir.

Cook. Which is the gentleman? Are you a freeholder in London, Sir?—Hooper. Yes, Sir.

Cook. I challenge you.

Hooper. I thank you, Sir.

Cl. of Arr. Nathaniel Long.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Long. Yes, Sir.

Cook. I challenge him as being one of sir John Freind's jury.

Cl. of Arr. The court has adjudged that no cause of challenge; therefore I take no notice of it, but as to a peremptory challenge.

Cl. of Arr. Richard Chiswell.

Cook. Are you a freeholder in London, Sir?

Chiswell. Yes, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. John Child.

Cook. Hold, pray, a moment; I have not crossed these last in my paper, but I challenge this man as being one of sir John Freind's jury.

Mr. Baker. You have had that answered over and over again, as no objection; it is nothing but a peremptory challenge.

Cl. of Arr. William Walker.

Walker. I was one of sir John Freind's jury.

Cook. I challenge him for the same reason.

Att. Gen. But that is no reason at all.

Cook. Then I challenge him.

Cl. of Arr. John Wells.

Cook. Sir, are you a freeholder?

Wells. Yes, Sir, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. John Hibbert.

Cook. Which is he, Sir?

Cl. of Arr. He stands upon your left hand; the man in the black peruke.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Hibbert. Yes, I am, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Daniel Wray.

Cook. Stay, Sir, are you Mr. Wray?

Wray. Yes, Sir, my name is Wray.

Cook. Are you a freeholder in London, Sir?

Wray. Yes, Sir.

Cook. I challenge you.

Wray. I thank you, Sir.

Cl. of Arr. John Pettit.

Cook. Which is he?

Pettit. I am the man, Sir.

Cook. Are you a freeholder in London, Sir?

Pettit. Yes, Sir. [Challenged.]

Tryal of Peter Cook,

[316]

Cl. of Arr. John Stredwick.

Cook. I challenge him, as being one of sir John Freind's jury.

Mr. Baker. But you have heard that denied to be an exception over and over.

Cook. I challenge him.

Cl. of Arr. Stephen Blackwell.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Blackwell. Yes, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. William Hatch.

Cook. Pray give me time to mark them; pray, who is this man you now call?

Cl. of Arr. William Hatch.

Cook. Sir, are you a freeholder?

Hatch. Yes, I am. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Arr. Henry Beadle.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Beadle. Yes, I am.

Cook. I do not except against him. [Was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. John Stredwick.

Stredwick. My lord, as I apprehend, I am no freeholder.

L. C. J. Treby. Why do you apprehend so?

Stredwick. It is my wife's estate, not mine.

Cl. of Ar. Then your wife has a freehold, it seems.—Stredwick. Yes, she has.

L. C. J. Treby. That is freehold enough; for you have an estate for your wife's life.

Mr. Baker. And after that too; for it is not given over to any body else, and she won't give it from him.

Cook. Sir, are you a freeholder in London, or no?

Stredwick. I apprehend, Sir, I am not.

Mr. Baker. He says he has an estate for his wife's life.

Cl. of Ar. Then he is a freeholder, What do you say to him?

Cook. Are you positive you are a freeholder in London, upon your word?

Stredwick. I think not.

Mr. Baker. Why, your wife's estate is yours for your life.

Cook. My Lord Chief Justice, if your lordship pleases, here is a man that says positively he thinks he is no freeholder; I desire your lordship's judgment, whether he be a freeholder or not?

L. C. J. Treby. Why, let him put his case, if he make a doubt of it.

Stredwick. I am not possessed of an estate myself.

L. C. J. Treby. But is not your wife an inheritor?

Stredwick. Yes, my lord, she is.

L. C. J. Treby. Then you are seized of a freehold in her right; and, Mr. Cook, your own counsel will tell you, and satisfy you, that that is a freehold sufficient for this service.

Mr. Baker. His wife's father settled it upon her and her heirs.

L. C. J. Treby. No question, it is a sufficient freehold if the wife be living.

Mr. Baker. Yes, she is.

Cook. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. William Princes.

Cook. I challenge him, as being one of sir John Freind's jury. Prince. I thank you, Sir.

Cl. of Ar. John Simmons.

Att. Gen. We challenge him for that king.

Cl. of Ar. Robert White.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

White. Yes, I think so.

Cook. Pray tell me whether you are, or not?

White. Indeed I think so, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Ar. Edward Brewster.

Cook. Where is Mr. Brewster? Are you a freeholder, Sir, in London?

Brewster. Yes, Sir.

Cook. I challenge him. Pray, Sir, I desire to know how many I have challenged?

Mr. Baker. You have challenged 33.

Cook. How many besides those that are of sir John Freind's jury?

Mr. Baker. You have but two more to challenge, Sir.

Serj. Darnall. I thought you had heard the opinion of the court, Mr. Cook, that it will not hold as a cause of challenge that he was of sir John Freind's jury; therefore those are all reckoned among the peremptory challenges, and you can challenge but two more in all.

L. C. J. Treby. Not without cause, but as many more as you can have good cause against.

Cl. of Ar. John Reynolds.

Cook. I except not against him. [Was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. Joseph Brookbank.

Cook. I have nothing to say to him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. Adam Bellamy.

Bellamy. My lord, I am no freeholder.

L. C. J. Treby. Why, what estate have you?

Mr. Baker. He has estate enough, I know, for value.

Bellamy. I have only a lease.

L. C. J. Treby. A lease for years?

Bellamy. Yes, my lord.

Cl. of Ar. David Grill.

Grill. I am no freeholder, my lord.

Cl. of Ar. William Rawlins.

Cook. I except of him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. Samuel Roycroft.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir?

Roycroft. Yes, Sir. [Challenged.]

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Parker.

Cook. How many have I to challenge, do you say?

Cl. of Ar. But one, Sir; What say you to Mr. Parker?

Cook. I do not except against him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. James Robinson.

Cook. I have nothing to say to him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. Joseph Morewood. [Challenged.]

Mr. Baker. You have challenged all your number now.

Chief Ser. My lord, we have gone through the panel, we must now call the defaulters again. Thomas Clark—Clark. Here.

Sir B. Shower. Was he here when he was called over?

Att. Gen. That is nothing, he is here now.

Sir B. Shower. But if there be a default of the jury, and the king's counsel have challenged any one, they ought to shew their cause; therefore we desire that they may shew their cause why they challenged Mr. Simmons?

L. C. J. Treby. The king has power to challenge without shewing cause till the panel be gone through; but if there be a default of jurors when the king challenges, the king's counsel must shew cause.*

Sir B. Shower. Here is a default of jurors, my lord.

L. C. J. Treby. Nobody is recorded absolutely a defaulter, if he comes in time enough to be sworn.

Cl. of Ar. Swear Mr. Clark. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Treby. When there is an apparent default of jurors, then they must shew their cause: but here his appearance, it seems, was recorded, and so he was no defaulter; and you might have challenged him for cause still.

Cl. of Ar. James Dry.

Dry. My name is not James.

Serj. Darnall. Then you cannot swear him: here are three mistaken in their names.

L. C. J. Treby. That is in the copy in your brief, brother, it may be.

Serj. Darnall. No, my lord, the officers admit it.

Att. Gen. My lord, we desire those gentlemen, that say they are no freeholders, may be sworn to that matter. [Which was accordingly done. And several of them that had stayed, did deny the having of any freehold upon oath, and some were gone away.]

L. C. J. Treby. Pray take care to estreat the issues, and return greater issues the next time.

Just. Rokeby. Truly, the court must put some great penalty upon them for trifling with the court in respect of their duty that they owe to the king and country, in regard of their estates.

Cl. of Ar. Pray let the officers be called who summoned this jury, Mr. Sheriff. [Which was

The words of the Ordinatio de Inquisitionibus (29 Edw. 1.) are, "Of inquests to be taken before any of the justices, and wherein our lord the king is party, howsoever it be, it is agreed and ordained by the king, and all his council, that from henceforth, notwithstanding it be alleged, by them that sue for the king, that the jurors of those inquests, or some of them, be not indifferent for the king, yet such inquests shall not remain untaken for that cause; but if they that sue for the king will challenge any of those jurors, they shall assign of their challenge a cause certain, and the truth of the same challenge shall be inquired of according to the custom of the court."

done, and they examined concerning their names, those who made default, and the names of those who were recorded as defendants were ordered to be arrested;]

As the Court not being able to proceed for want of a jury, they ordered another panel to be ready against Wednesday next, to which time, at eleven in the morning, the court was by proclamation adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1696.

The Court being met according to the adjournment, the panel was called over, and the defendants recorded, and several excused for absence upon sickness, and being out of town before the summons. Then Mr. Serjeant Darnall desired, before the Jury was called, to move something against the panel; and made his motion thus:

Serj. Darnall. If your lordship pleases, I have somewhat to offer to you before you go upon this new panel, and I confess I think it is my duty to the court, as well as to the prisoner, to state the case as it is, and submit it upon the reason of law, and the authorities that I shall offer, whether the proceedings upon this new panel will not be erroneous? My lord, the question is, Whether, as this case is, the prisoner has had a copy of the panel of his jury by which he is to be tried, according as the late law requires? He had a copy of the former panel, and upon that panel nine were sworn, and their names all entered upon record, and made parcel of the record. Therefore now the question is, Whether he can be tried upon a new panel? We are in a case that rarely happens; and in a case of life and death, I know your lordship will be careful not to vary from the ancient practice, or to make a new precedent, because of the consequences. It must be agreed in this case, that the old panel upon which the prisoner took his challenges, and of which nine were sworn, is parcel of the record. Now, my lord, to add a new panel, upon which twelve more shall be sworn, and all this appear upon record, and the prisoner tried upon the last panel, will not this be error? I offer this before the jury be called and sworn, because we desire to be fairly tried; and we design to rest upon the fact in this case. If it should appear, That he is tried upon a panel that is lawfully made and returned, that will be of no consequence one way or other. And can this be duly made, if another appear upon record before it? And as my lord say it is a question of law? Or can it be so? My lord, in Shower's Pleas of the Crown, p. 156, it is said, "If any of the panel die after the return, and before the jury appear, so that there are not enough left to make the jury, yet the panel shall nevertheless stand, and it is abated, because some have given a tale." And accordingly Lord, in his charge to the jury, when he challenges, which Shower gives the prisoner liberty to make, there are not enough left, that the tale shall not be a new panel, but that a Tale shall be granted; for if it be not granted might be made. And as appears who were challenged, and who were admitted. And if your lordship pleases to consider, the intention of the law in giving the prisoner power to challenge, is, that he may have an indifferent jury; but that would be prevented by such a practice as this; for when it has been discovered upon the old panel within the prisoner's choice, and when he challenged upon the new panel, the persons challenged may be not first, and those that were chosen may be omitted, or so postponed, that none of them whom he thought equal to try him, can serve upon the jury. And truly, my lord, if I am rightly informed, that is the case upon this new panel; some of those that were admitted and sworn are left out, and most of them, I think, are put last in the panel whom he thought equal men to try him, and all those whom he challenged particularly are the first men in the panel. This, my lord, is the case before you; and if this be admitted, the use and end of challenges, which are in benefit and favour of life, would be defeated. And for authorities in this case, besides the reason and ground of the law, many cannot be expected, because it is a fact that rarely happens. I find none of the ancient practicers ever knew it, but I find that a Tale ought to be granted; so it is said in several books, as in Stamford, 155, 156. whenever upon the principal panel all the jury does not appear, or so many of them do not, that there are not enough left to make a jury, which is our very case; then in such case the panel shall not be quashed or abated, but a Tale granted; so is 14 H. 7. 7. there the question was, Whether there should be a greater number returned upon the Tale than were in the principal panel? And there the difference was insisted upon, and agreed, That where it is between party and party, where life is not concerned, it shall not; but where life is concerned, and the prisoner has power to challenge 35 peremptorily, there the judge may award as many upon the Tale as he pleases, that there may be enough to remain after the challenges; so that if this old panel be not abated, and could not be quashed, and a Tale might be granted to consist of any number, I conceive the prisoner cannot be tried upon this new panel, but it will be erroneous. and I humbly submit to your lordship whether you will proceed upon it.

Sir B. Shower. If your lordship pleases to spare me a word of the same side, with submission, We think there ought to have been an Habeas Corpus, with a Tale, such as had been before sworn being or be part of the jury now, and that is the proper way to bring the prisoner to his trial in the case; the king's counsel cannot expect we should produce many precedents, for I believe this is the second of the kind that ever happened, at least within memory; that a trial in treason was put off 'pro defectu iuramentorum,' though I have a precedent that I think is express in the case; but we insist, in the first place, that a Tales does lie at common-law in the case of life; and so the book that Mr. Sergeant cited in Stanford is express; and then we say, that the answer which we expect, that we are now before justices of gaol-delivery, is not sufficient, because the justices of gaol-delivery, though they do not usually award process by way of writ, but before their coming, they command the sheriff to have his county ready there, and so in fact it is a parol precept; yet when it is returned, then it is entered upon record, either 'Præceptum est Vice Comitum quod venire faceret;' or, 'illeo venit Juratus;' and the jury are entered upon record; so that take it to be before justices of gaol-delivery, yet the sheriff having returned a pannel, and that being upon the file, as appears before your eyes, in obedience to your command, and that copy of the pannel being delivered to us two days before Saturday last, we humbly submit it to your lordship, whether by force of the common-law, and of the late act of parliament, we ought not to be tied by that pannel: we insist upon it, that the act intends, and expressly designed, that not only the prisoner should have a copy of the pannel that the sheriff returned at any time after, but that he should be tied by the pannel that we had a copy of at first; for it is not said a copy toties quoties the court shall think fit to award a precept for a new pannel, but the words of the act are, a copy of the jury duly returned by the sheriff; now this we had, and your lordship knows it is not a returned pannel till it be in court, and then it becomes part of the record: my lord, I do agree, the justices in some cases have quashed and set aside pannels and juries, and ordered new ones; and I confess there was an extraordinary case in the time of king Charles the second, which was upon the indictment against Whitebread, where, after the jury charged, and evidence given, the jury was discharged, and a new pannel made the next sessions, upon which Mr. Whitebread was tried and convicted; how just or regular that was, I will not insist upon now, but I am sure there were great complaints of that practice, and few precedents can be shewn of the like: but besides, the parties themselves waived it there, no objection being taken against it; but we insist upon it in this case, that this being upon record, is part of the record, and so appears to the court: if the record indeed were to be made up upon a Writ of Error, perhaps it would be no Error, because it may be they would leave it out; but here it appears there was a pannel of record before you, and this must either be quashed, abated, or continued on by process; you have power to quash it, if it be widely retarded by the sheriff. If there be any evil practices for procuring the pannel, either by the presenter or the prisoner; if there be no freeholders returned, or the same happen in any other respect not to be legally done according to the command or precept of the court; but because there is a default of appearance of jurors, no pannel was ever quashed upon that account. Then say we, if it be not quashed, this pannel must continue; for, what shall become of it? Why should it not continue? It is not within the act of parliament that gives the justices power to make a new pannel, as in the case of a grand jury when they are guilty of concealments, or refuse to find bills upon great evidence, but we have no such case before you, nor do I know any such rule as can reach this; so that, we take it, there is no difference between this case, as before justices of gaol-delivery, and other justices; that process does lie against the jury that does not appear even in treason and felony, there is no dispute; and, it is very properly so, if it be before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer; first, a Venue Facias, and then upon default, a Habeas Corpora, that is the proper way; then take it before justices of gaol-delivery, there it is entered upon record, 'Præceptum est Vice Comitum,' &c. and here is a pannel returned by virtue of this precept, and some of the jury do not appear, and so there are not enough to try the prisoner after a great many sworn and challenged, and this entered upon record. What shall become of that pannel, it cannot be quashed nor abated? My lord, there is case that does warrant that opinion of a Tales in a case of felony; and if there may be a Tales, then there may be a Habeas Corpora, and there are directions how the jurors shall be sworn again, upon their appearance on the Habeas Corpora, and that is Wharton's case in Yelverton 23.

* In the Case of Perry and another, 2 S. 1502, in this Collection, it was decided, that where a special jury is ordered, the first special jury struck and reduced according to law, must try the issue joined between parties.

Just. Powell, jun. Do not dispute that; it is plain, that a Tales does lie in felony, upon a commission of Oyer and Terminer; but can you shew me, sir Bartholomew, any where that upon a commission of gaol-delivery a Tales does lie?

Sir B. Shower. Sir, I can only shew the reason of the law, and I cannot find that does contradict what we now contend for.

Just. Powell. I tell you, sir Bartholomew, there is no Tales but with a Habeas Corpora to bring in the first jurors; and that comes by upon a parol precept on a commission of Oyer and Terminer, there goes a Venue Facias, which is a writ upon which the Habeas Corpora may be grounded, but there is no Venue Facias upon a commission of gaol-delivery.

Sir B. Shower. Why should there not be a precept in nature of a Habeas Corpora for a jury returned, and process upon it?

* See in this Collection, the Case of Whitebread, vol. 7, pp. 190, 211. And the Note on vol. 7, p. 467.

Just. Powell. No, it never was done; the commission of gaol-delivery is a general commission which does authorize the sheriff to impanel, and have a jury ready at the day appointed for the delivery of the gaol to try the prisoners; it doth import in itself a general power for that purpose, before issue joined, which the sheriff cannot do in the case of a commission of Oyer and Terminer, but must have a writ of Venire Facias, after issue joined.

Att. Gen. (Sir John Hawles.) In all cases that they cite, there is a writ of Venire Facias, upon which the after-process, by writ, may be grounded; but here is no foundation for any after-process by writ, because it is only by placet process.

Att. Gen. Sure these gentlemen don't think what they say; the pannel is not part of the record, and there is no record of it; nothing but the clerk's entry in a paper, or note, for his own memorandum.

Just. Rokeby. Brother Darnall, have you any book that says, justices of gaol-delivery must award a tales upon default of the jurors?

Serj. Darnall. No, my lord. I cannot say so.

L. C. J. Treby. Suppose all the jury had been challenged or died.

Just. Powell. There could be no quashing of it, but it would fall of itself, for want of a jury.

Just. Rokeby. If, according to your doctrine, we must keep to the first pannel, the consequence would be, there would be no trial at all.

Sir B. Shower. Stamford makes no difference that I can see.

Att. Gen. But these gentlemen have been told the difference upon which this matter is grounded; a Tales cannot be without a Habeas Corpora, and a Habeas Corpora cannot be without a Venire Facias; but a commission of gaol-delivery cannot award a Venire Facias, because that is not to be awarded till issue joined.

Baron Powis. The return of this pannel before justices of gaol delivery, is an act of the sheriff, by virtue of the commission, and nothing appears of record till the jury are sworn.

Just. Rokeby. They object that it is upon record.

L. C. J. Treby. By the record, they mean the clerk's note.

Att. Gen. If you please to look upon the Rolls, there is no entry at all, and that is all the record before you.

Just. Powell. Does it appear upon record, whether were sworn?

Mr. Baker. No, there is nothing upon the Rolls.

Cl. of Ar. It does not appear till the record is made up, and nothing is entered till it are sworn.

Serj. Darnall. There will be a great inconvenience if a pannel may be changed at any time.

Just. Powell. This is a case that never happened before, and may be never may again.

Sir B. Shower. The law will hold the same, as when it does appear upon record, as well as where it does not: but waving a pannel returned in court is a record.

Just. Powell. No, it will not; because, when a jury does appear, and the twelve are sworn, then it becomes parcel of the record; and therefore Whitehead's case was quite another case, and was indeed held to be an extraordinary case; but that comes not up to us, for there a full jury was sworn, and evidence given.

Serj. Darnall. It may be the same jury will not be returned.

Just. Powell. But if you have a copy of the jury, you are at no mischief.

Serj. Darnall. Some that were in the former pannel are quite left out.

Sher. Buckingham. There are none left out, but what were not freeholders, that I know of.

Baron Powis. He says the fact is not true, as you have alledged it.

Sher. Buckingham. And Mr. Serjeant Darnall has been pleased to reflect upon us, as if we had packed this jury, by altering the places of the names, which, my lord, we do utterly deny, and we only left out those that were not freeholders.

Baron Powis. The sheriff says he has not postponed any of them, and only left out those that were not freeholders.

Serj. Darnall. If the law were as plain with us as the fact in that case, we should have a very good case of it.

Sher. Buckingham. Mr. Serjeant, I have both the pannels here, they may be compared.

Serj. Darnall. I said no harm, Mr. Sheriff, nor meant any reflection upon you.

Sher. Buckingham. Mr. Serjeant was pleased to say, the excepted men were put in the front, and those that were sworn were put last.

L. C. J. Treby. There is nothing at all in the objection.

Just. Powell. Really because it was opened as a reflection, it will be proper for the sheriff to clear it.

Sher. Buckingham. My lord, the answer I give to it, is, That particularly one that was sworn last time, is now at the very beginning of the pannel; and, in general, they are mixed promiscuously, without any design or study in the least. He says we have left out those that served before: I solemnly protest, I know not one man returned upon the last pannel that is left out, unless it appeared that he is no freeholder; and we had no reason to put in them, that we knew could not serve.

Serj. Darnall. That cannot appear to us, that they are not freeholders.

Just. Rokeby. But it appears to him, and therefore he did well to leave them out.

Sher. Buckingham. What I say, I am ready to give upon my oath.

Serj. Darnall. I say there is one Henry Beadie left out, and he was one that was sworn.

Sher. Buckingham. I will not say for a particular man; I protest that I did not know he was left out; if it be so, it was by mistake; for I know Mr. Beadie very well, and I take him to be a competent and very well affected to the government of any country.

Serj. Darnall. We desire it be tried by men that are honest and well affected to the government.

Sher. Buckingham. There you have of them, Sir.

Serj. Darnall. Those that were sworn are put last of all, and there is not above one of them that is within possibility of coming on again.

Sher. Buckingham. It will appear by Mr. Cook's challenges, and the other panel, that they stood late before; and Thomas Clark, who was sworn the last time, stands tenth man upon the panel.

Serj. Darnall. He was sworn after we had gone through the panel, and took all our challenges, not appearing at first.

Sher. Buckingham. I tell you, they stand for the most part as they did, for ought I know.

Serj. Darnall. There is but one in threescore and ten, that can be sworn now, of them that were sworn before; and there were nine of them then sworn.

Att. Gen. That is a mistake. Indeed there are a great many added to the panel, because there was a defect the last time, and therefore now they may perhaps stand later.

Serj. Darnall. I do not speak to reflect upon the sheriff: I go according to my instructions.

Just. Powell. If it had been so, it had been well enough; for you must be contented, the court must take it as the sheriff returns it, and you have a copy of it.

Att. Gen. Here are four of them that were sworn before, that stood above sixty off in the old panel.

Sher. Buckingham. The first man that was sworn, Mr. Sherbrook, stands within the first twelve now, as well as before.

Just. Powell. If they had been all new, there had been nothing in that.

Just. Roby. Truly, I cannot see but that the sheriff hath done like an equal, just, fair, and honest officer.

Att. Gen. They may challenge as they will.

L. C. J. Trelly. You are to consider, that this happens because you run out as far as you can presumptuously, and divers others for cause, so as not to leave enough for a jury; and from that alone arises a necessity of increasing the number of the panel.

Serj. Darnall. It was our client that challenged them, we do not advise him whom to challenge.

Just. Roby. But you must take the consequence of it, which causes this addition to the panel.

L. C. J. Trelly. What do you complain of? They that are returned, are put in the same order as they were before; they that were sworn, were (for the most part) late in the panel then, and so they are now. I do not find any thing done to the prejudice of the prisoners.

Serj. Darnall. If the challenge were not made, there had been perhaps enough to try the prisoners.

L. C. J. Trelly. That is good argument for a new panel, because the thirteen names were mistaken before.

Just. Powell. It was by defect of jurors, and therefore there was an absolute necessity of a new panel.

L. C. J. Trelly. I am of the same opinion. Wigton's case is well known. It was moved as to another point in Bushel's case. It was a trial at the King's bench, but at Westminster by a jury of Kent, upon an indictment of a murder. And I think you try the case of H. 7. was between party and party in appeal. And I believe Stamford's discourse, in the place cited, relates chiefly to appeals.

I shall not deny that a Tales may possibly be upon an indictment before justices of Oyer and Terminer; though it is not usual, nor do you shew, or our experienced clerks know any such precedent. I agree, that in the mentioned cases a Tales was proper; for in both cases (viz. of Appeal and Indictment removed into the King's bench), the process for the jury, was as it ought to be, by writ of Venue Facias, &c. upon which a full jury not appearing, there must be a Tales. But in proceeding to trial before justices of Oyer and Terminer on such indictment as is here, though I will not say but they may proceed by writ of Venue Facias; and the usage is, that after (and never before) the prisoner hath pleaded not guilty; there goes a precept to the sheriff, under the seals of the said justices of Oyer and Terminer, returnable at such day as they shall adjourn to, for returning a jury to try it; (as was done lately, upon advice, in the Case of Rockwood, &c.) and upon the return of that, if after challenges, there are not enough left to make a jury, whether those justices shall issue a precept in nature of a Habeas Corpora, or Distringas, with a Tales, or another precept in the same form as before, and without taking notice of the former, is a question not in judgment before us. For we are about proceeding to a trial on an indictment in this court of goal delivery, (which is the court wherein generally all capital crimes are tried, as well as the place as at the justices) and I think, here cannot be a Tales; I am sure it is not necessary. For first, Here is never any writ of Venue Facias, &c. Secondly, Nor ever a precept for returning a jury to try a particular issue: but the court takes the panels of jurors returned by the sheriff, without any particular precept to him.

The course of proceeding by return of a commission of goal delivery, which is the law in this case, is this, viz. There is, antecedent to the coming of the justices, a general commandment or precept made, in writing to the sheriff by the said justices, to return juries against their coming, for the trying of all and singular prisoners in their goal, whether they have pleaded before, or shall after. And in that personally requires the sheriff to summon, out of a panel of his country wherein the prisoners are, a great number of freeholders not a kin, to the prisoners, or he strikes time and place appointed for holding the court. The sheriff, by virtue of this general provision, summons such space for jurors, and prepares divers several panels of their names, either at first, or afterwards, as appears necessary, and returns and delivers in one or more of these panels, from time to time, as the court does need, and call for any. This, we know, in fact is frequently done where the sessions of great delivery lasts several days, and there is occasion. Though, in supposition of law, all these panels are returned, and the trials thereupon had the first day of the sessions; and, in law, it is intended to be but that one day only. The return of this precept is thus, viz. 'Excoctio Juratorum Precepti posit in quibusdam Panelis huius precepto annexa,' and the panels are annexed, and there are often filed here divers panels upon the same general precept, though sometimes but one. These panels are thus delivered into court, and a jury taken out of them as there is occasion, only upon a Pauci Avert, that is, by the court's calling for the name, without writ or precept in writing, or going any day for the doing it. For this precepting is immediate, for the speedy delivery of prisoners; and the entry, after setting forth that the prisoner being arraigned pleads not guilty, is, 'Ideo immediate veniat inde Jurata,' or 'stat inde Jurata.' And this court's being instituted for the speedy delivery of prisoners, and warnings being given long before, of their coming, and the causes why it has been always held without doubt, that justices of great delivery might inquire and try the same day.

If it fall out, that by reason of defaults, deaths, or challenges, there cannot be a full jury had out of a panel, (as here there wanted three) which is an accident that the court cannot know, till they have gone through the panel; I think in this case, that panel goes for nothing, is utterly lost and void, and to be cast away or cancelled: for it does not answer the award of the court, which was to have a jury to try the prisoner presently. It is meant an effectual panel that should afford a full jury of twelve unexceptionable men; and every panel that comes short in this, is to be laid aside as a void thing; and then the court takes and makes use of another immediately, which may not be deficient, whereby the award is observed, and the present service dispatched.

Objection. It is objected, That the old panel is parcel of the record in court, and, upon that, was sworn, and their names are all entered upon record; and now to add a new panel, upon which twelve shall be sworn, and thereby destroy all this appearing upon record, is to nullify the award.

Answer. This Objection stands upon two suppositions, which adding, does not answering the question, is a question of great delivery, and Justice Facies, or precept and panels in other points.

1. It supposes that here will be two panels, which will appear to relate to the trial of this prisoner, Mr. Cook.

2. It supposes that, both, these will become records, or parcel of the record in court.

If either of these suppositions prove to be a mistake, it will destroy the objection. I think both are mistaken.

1. There is not, nor will be, say, there ought not to be any panel purporting to be returned for the trying of Mr. Cook, or any particular prisoner or prisoners. For the precept in this case is (not like a Venue Facies, which always respects a particular issue between parties therein named, but) general, requiring the sheriff to return jurors enough to try all the prisoners, not naming any. And the return, which is the answer to it by a panel or panels, is as general; the title of every panel being 'Nomina juratorum ad triundem pro domino rege,' and no more; or 'nomina juratorum ad triundem inter dom. regem et prisonerum ad barram,' without naming any of the prisoners, and it were absurd if it should be otherwise: for the precept goes to the sheriff before the sessions, and his return is supposed to be made at the beginning of the sessions, when it is not known who of the prisoners will be indicted; or, if indicted, who will plead not guilty, or guilty, or a pardon, or other plea.

When, for the trial of a particular prisoner (or divers prisoners that are thought fit to be put upon trial by the same jury), a jury is about to be taken out of any panel, the clerk, as he goes along, may take a note in paper of the name of every one that is sworn; or he may (and usually doth) write jur. on the said panel, against the name of every one sworn: but this note or mark is no part of the record; it is not ex institutione legis, it is but a voluntary memorandum for the help of his memory. If he could safely trust to the strength of his memory, he need not write at all on this occasion; I mean, not till a full jury is sworn, who try the prisoner. But then, indeed, the clerk must (from his notes or memory) write the name of all the twelve, entering them on the record of the indictment, in this manner, viz. just after the 'Ideo immediate veniat inde jurata eorum prefatis justis.' &c. adding, 'et juratores juratos illius, &c. scilicet A. B. &c. &c.' And it is by this only, that the names of those that are sworn, come to be of record; and it is this entry upon the body of the indictment alone, that is the record, that shows who were jurors sworn, to try this, or that, or other prisoner or prisoners.

So that if the old panel were filed, and were a record, as the prisoner's counsel would suppose, yet it would not thereby be made appear, that the said panel was returned, or used for, or in aid to the trial of this prisoner.

2. The old panel is not filed among the re-court of the court; nor ought to be. When such a panel does not produce a jury, the clerk may and will throw it by as a useless thing. But, however they use it, we cannot allow it to be a record. It was received de bene case; it is abortive and comes to nothing. And it is not every thing that passes in court in order to a record, that comes to be so. A frivolous plea that is rejected, is not recorded. A presentment or bill of indictment, before it is found, is not a record: And if an ignoramus be returned upon a bill of indictment, it never can be a record; and thereupon, the clerks do sometimes throw it away, though sometimes they keep it and put it on the file, only taking care to cross it; but if they do forget to cross it, yet it is not a record.

By all this it is apparent how great the difference is between a precept and panel in this court, and a Veneris Facias and a panel returned thereupon, which is ever issued after nonne joined, and doth always mention the particular parties and matter it relates to, and is a record, and a ground for an Habeas Corpus with a Faite, to be returnable at a certain future day. But, in this case, in this court, it is quite otherwise.

Sir B. Shower. Then, my lord, since there is a new panel, we hope we stand in the same condition upon the act of parliament, to take exceptions to the indictment before this jury sworn, as we did before the other jury sworn, since all that is quite set aside.

L. C. J. Treby. Yes, truly, I think that may be.

Att. Gen. But these gentlemen would have done well to have given notice of their exceptions.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, I shall not stand upon an exception which I think I might take to the word 'Turner' in the indictment, which, whether it be troops of men, or horses, or what it is, does not appear; but, I think, we have an exception to the chief overt-act laid in the indictment, and that, we presume, if my brief be right, will be sufficient to set aside this indictment: that Mr. Cook did agree with other traitors to send Mr. Charnock into France to the said late king James, and king James is never mentioned before in all the indictment; that is one exception that we have; that there is no late king James mentioned in the indictment before this, if my copy be right, if it be otherwise, I suppose they will find it: it is laid, That Mr. Cook did agree to send Charnock as a messenger into France, 'Eidem nuper regi' 'James', and so 'Rex Jacobus' is mentioned before. Then there is another exception, and that is this: they seem and say, That whereas there was a war with France, which is only in the indictment by way of recital or recital of an history, 'Quod cum per magnam temporis' 'fuit et modo sit' &c. Mr. Cook, the prisoner knowing, did compass and imagine the king's death; and did adhere to the said king's enemies such a day. Now, my lord, I do think that this can never be maintained, for that 'Quod cum' &c. &c. being an historical narrative, is not positive enough; for adhering to the king's enemies being one of the treasons laid in the charge, there ought to be a war at the time of the adhesion, and of necessity then that ought to be presented by the jury; for though your lordships can justifiably take notice of war or peace, yet you cannot take notice of it at such a particular time, and the reason is from the notion that is in my lord Coke in his third Institutes, cap. Treason, That adhesion to rebels is not adhesion to the king's enemies, for a rebel is not said to be an enemy; but it must be adhering to such an enemy, as between whom and the king there was war at that time; and consequently it ought to be more positively averred in the indictment than it here is; but as to the overt-act of Mr. Cook's consulting and agreeing to send Charnock over to the said late king James, to give him notice of what was agreed upon between them, when king James is not named before, that can never be got over, with submission.

Mr. Baker. It is a mistake of your copy, sir Bartholomew Shower.

Att. Gen. I have looked into the record, and it is 'Jacobus secundo nuper regi,' not 'dioco.'

Sir B. Shower. Then, with submission, my lord, they cannot try us now, for we ought to have a true copy of the indictment.

Mr. Baker. Upon demand. But you never demanded it.

Sir B. Shower. Yes, it was demanded.

Mr. Baker. Who demanded it?

Sir B. Shower. Our solicitor Barleigh.

Mr. Baker. No, he did not; I gave it him officiously.

Att. Gen. With submission, my lord, it is no objection at all, that their copy is wrong. That should have been before the prisoner had pleaded; for the words of the act are, That he shall have it so many days before, to enable him to plead, and he cannot be put to plead unless he have a copy of the indictment so long before: and at Hookwood's trial it was said by the court, it could not be alleged after plea pleaded.

Mr. Barleigh. The copy was given to me publicly in court.

Sir Gen. Why did not your solicitor compare it with the indictment?

Att. Gen. They might have compared it by the clerks reading it to them; but they will not admit the prisoner's solicitor to see the original, because the act expressly says they shall not have a copy of the witness names.

Sir B. Shower. The officer is to deliver a true copy of the indictment.

Att. Gen. No: the party is to demand it by himself or his agent, and then he is to have it; and if he be denied, he ought to apply himself to the court, who will order the delivery of it; but we stand upon it, that they cannot take this exception now after they have pleaded, for the intent of the copy is to enable him to plead.

L. C. J. Treby. The copy, by the act of parlawest, is to be delivered to the prisoner, his attorney, agent, or solicitor, if they require the same; and here it seems there was no requiring of it, but it was voluntarily given; and that you have lapsed your time of making the exception of wanting a copy, by having pleaded to the indictment, whereby you have in effect admitted and declared, either that you had a true copy of it, or that you did not think fit to require one; for the use of the copy is to better enable the prisoner to plead. But when you did plead, you took upon yourself to be well able to plead without the help of a copy, which you might have had upon the asking for.

Sir B. Shower. Then, my lord, there is another thing in the indictment, that in this overt-act there is a new time, and a new place, and a new verb, and a new fact alleged, and no nominative case: it is alleged, That Peter Cook, at first, with others, did so and so: and then the first of July to bring the treasons aforesaid to effect there et alibi &c. (which is very loose, for I know not whence the venne must come) did traitorously with Charnock, Friend, &c. consult to procure 'Diversas Turmas et Legiones, &c.' to join with them in England, and then it comes et ulterius such a day, year, and place, did traitorously agree so and so, and not say who: Now this is neither by express words, nor rule of grammar to be referred to the prisoner at the bar; it does not say 'ipse idem Petrus Cook;' now, my lord, that the king's counsel thought it necessary in every overt-act is plain, because those words are put in every other clause of the indictment, in those clauses that go before, and those clauses that come after; then if they will take it, that this clause must refer to the next antecedent, that will not do, for the next precedent nominative case is either Friend or Charnock: So that this is without a nominative case, and the precedents in my lord Coke's entries 361, and all the other books have the nominative case repeated, where there is a new time, and a new place, and a new fact alleged: Now it might be true, that the prisoner at the bar might be present, and this same treason might be discoursed of and agitated, and there might be a consult about this business; and yet it is not necessarily implied that he must consent and agree to send Charnock into France, upon which the great stress of the indictment lies: therefore we say, these words having no nominative case, the indictment cannot hold.

Att. Gen. My lord, as to this objection, it will receive a very plain answer. Our indictment begins and sets forth, that Peter Cook, the prisoner at the bar, did imagine and compass the king's death, and did adhere to the king's enemies, and these are the treasons: and then it sets forth the overt act, that is the consultation of the traitorous companions, imagination, and adhesions aforesaid, 'Ipse idem Petrus Cook, together with sir William Parkyns, sir Charnock, sir John Friend, and others, did imagine and compass to procure from the king's army forces to invade this land; &c. &c.' where, he and they did agree to send Charnock to the late king James.

Just. Roebury. There is the first turning of James the second, late king of England, and there is no idem Jacobs, I promise you.

L. C. J. Treby. Well, that mistake is over. Pray go on, Mr. Attorney General.

Att. Gen. My lord, as to this objection of sir Bartholomew Shower, he would have ipse idem Petrus repeated over again; and he says, that we lay a distinct overt act with a different time and place: now that is a mistake too; it is not a different time and place, but the same time and place; and it mentions that 'cum R. Charnock, J. Friend, &c. et cum aliis Proditoribus conveniebat, consultabat, &c.' which he says may refer to sir John Friend or Charnock: but if you look into the frame of the sentence, that can never be.

Just. Roebury. Petrus Cook is the nominative case that governs all the verbs.

Att. Gen. And there is no other nominative case in all the indictments, but Petrus Cook, except it be in a parenthesis, and that saves the rule of grammar, if there were any thing in it, that it must refer to the last antecedent.

Sir B. Shower. When it comes to the clause that he did procure horse and arms, there the nominative case is repeated.

L. C. J. Treby. It would not have made it worse, if they had made it so here; but the question is, whether it be necessary?

Sir B. Shower. Indictments ought to be precisely certain; but this we say is not so.

Att. Gen. But here is as much certainty as to the person, as can be, that he did consult with such and such about such things; and further, the same day did agree with the same traitors to do so and so.

Just. Powell. Indictments, it is true, ought to be plain and clear; but I do not see but here is as much certainty as can be, that he did such a day consult, and further, the same day did agree with the same persons.

Sir B. Shower. Who did agree, my lord?

Just. Powell. He that did consult with them before, and that is Peter Cook.

Att. Gen. You would have had us to put it to every verb, I believe.

Sir B. Shower. In indictments no presumption ought to be used, but the facts ought to be directly and positively alleged.

Just. Powell. It is true, there should be no presumption; and there is none here, for certainly this is a plain assertion of fact.

L. C. J. Treby. Here are two things that are set forth: First, That Peter Cook did meet with sir John Friend, sir William Parkyns, and others, and then and there did consult with them, and consent to procure an invasion, and join an insurrection thereto. And secondly, further with the said traitors did agree to send Charnock into France. Now, what is the nominative case to this agreement? Is it sir John Friend, and sir William Parkyns? That is impossible: for they could not be said properly to meet and consult with themselves, every one of them with his own self and the rest. And then the number, if it had referred to them, should have been plural; but here it is singular, [agrees] and the sense is no more than this: that then and there Mr. Cook did meet with such persons, and did consult with them about such and such matters; and further did agree with them to do thus.

Sir B. Shower. The meaning is not to be forced and strained by inference or presumption, but it ought to be express and plain.

L. C. J. Treby. Nay, you cannot express it better; you may make a tautology of it, if you will.

Sir B. Shower. The paragraph is long, my lord, and therefore requires the more care to have those repetitions that are necessary.

L. C. J. Treby. Your objection to this paragraph is, that it is too long; but repeating the same nominative case to every verb would make it much longer.

Sir B. Shower. It cannot be understood to mean Peter Cook without presumption, which ought not to be in an indictment.

Att. Gen. And as to sir Bartholomew Shower's first objection, his copy is right too, and he mistook the place.

Sir B. Shower. You should have given me that for an answer.

Att. Gen. Nay, you should have taken more care, and not have made the objection.

L. C. J. Treby. Truly, I think it is hardly possible to have made this better, if it had been otherwise than it is.

Serj. Darnall. My lord, we think we have a good fact of it, which we rely upon, and therefore do not so much insist upon these exceptions; though, in duty to our client, we mention that which we think is necessary, and we submit to your lordship.

Cl. of Ar. Set Peter Cook to the bar. (Which was done.) You, the prisoner at the bar, these good men which you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if therefore you would challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Cryer. Call sir John Sweetapple.

Sir John Sweetapple. Here.

Cook. My lord chief justice, if your lordship please, I am advised—

L. C. J. Treby. Pray, Sir, speak out, that we may hear what you say: and let the Cryer make proclamation for silence. (Which was done.)

Cook. My lord, before the jury is called, I am advised, that if any of the jury have said already that I am guilty, or they will find me guilty, or I shall suffer, or be hanged, or the like, they are not fit or proper men to be of the jury.*

* See the objection to Mr. Raikes in the Case of O'Connor, O'Donogh, Dinns, Leary, and At-

L. C. J. Treby. You say right, Sir, in a good cause of challenge.

Just. Rokeby. That will be a sufficient cause, if when they come to the book, you object that, and be ready to prove it.

Cook. Which is sir John Sweetapple? (He was shewn to him.)

Cl. of Ar. There he is.

Cook. I challenge him.

Cl. of Ar. William Walker.

Cook. Sir, have you said any such thing, that you believe me guilty?—Walker. No, Sir.

Mr. Baker. My lord, he is asking of the juryman the question.

Just. Rokeby. That is a fact the prisoner should prove upon him.

Att. Gen. My lord, he must not ask the jury that question, whether they have declared before, that they will find him guilty; that is to make them guilty of a misdemeanor.

Serj. Darnall. Is it any misdemeanor for me to say, I think or believe such a man is guilty?

Att. Gen. If he be summoned to be of a jury, and declare his opinion before-hand, it is a misdemeanor.

Serj. Darnall. But suppose it be before he was summoned?

Att. Gen. If you make any such objection, you must prove it, and not out of the juryman's own mouth.

Serj. Darnall. I think any man, my lord, that comes to serve upon the jury, may be asked any question that does not make him guilty of any offence or crime, or liable to any punishment: Now if any of these gentlemen that are returned upon this pannel, before the summons have declared their opinion that the prisoner is guilty, or ought to suffer; with submission, the prisoner may ask such a question, whether he have said so, yea or no?

Just. Powell. He cannot upon a Voyer Dire be asked any such question.

Just. Rokeby. It is not denied to be a material objection, but it must be made out by proof.

L. C. J. Treby. You put it too large, brother Darnall; you may ask upon a Voyer Dire, whether he have any interest in the cause; nor shall we deny you liberty to ask whether he be fitly qualified, according to law, by having a freehold of sufficient value; but that you can ask a juror or a witness every question that will not make him criminal, that is too large: men have been asked, whether they have been convicted and pardoned for felony, or whether they have been whipped for petty larceny: but they have not been obliged to answer; for, though their answer in the affirmative will not make them criminal, or sub-len at Maidstone, A. D. 1798, in this Collection. See too, Lerch's Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, b. 2, c. 43, s. 28; and the objection to the earl Mareschal, earl of Dumfries, lord Blantyre and lord Johnstone, vol. 3, pp. 600, 601 of this Collection. See too Peake's Law of Evidence, c. 3, s. 2. art. Witnesses discrediting them.

just there to punishment, yet they are matters of infamy; and if it be an infamous thing, that is enough to preserve a man from being bound to answer. A pardoned man is not guilty, his crime is purged; but merely for the reproach of it, it shall not be put upon him to answer a question wherein he will be forced to swear or disgrace himself. So persons have been excused from answering whether they have been committed to Bridewell as pilferers or vagrants, or to Newgate for clipping or coining, &c. yet to be suspected or committed in only a misfortune and shame, no crime. The like has been observed in other cases of odious and infamous matters which were not crimes indictable.* But to keep to our case, it is true, a juror may be challenged being an alien, or being a villain; but where the matter apparently carries crime or shame, it should be proved; the outlawry should be proved, and so should the being a villain. Yet that is no crime, though it be an ignominy.

Serj. Darnall. But, my lord, I take this to be no manner of infamy at all; there is nothing of crime, nor nothing of reproach, but only a declaring of a man's opinion.

L. C. J. Treby. Truly, I think otherwise; I take it to be at least a scandalous misbehaviour, and deservedly ill spoken of, for any man to prejudice, especially in such a heinous matter. I think it is a very shameful discovery of a man's weakness and rashness, if not malice, to judge before he hears the cause, and before the party that is accused could be tried. But it seems, by what the prisoner says, that he would ask all the jurors, whether they have not said that he was guilty, or that they would find him guilty, or that he should be hanged, or the like: which (presuming him innocent) is to ask, whether they have not defamed and slandered him in the highest degree; and to force them to discover that they have a mortal hatred to him, and come with a malicious resolution to convict him: which, admitting they are not punishable by our law, yet are things so detestably wicked and so scandalous, as are not fit to be required to be disclosed by and against themselves.

Serj. Darnall. Pray, my lord, what is more common than for a man to say, before he is summoned to be upon a jury, when he hears a fact reported concerning such a one, to say, I believe he is guilty, or, I am of opinion he is, and I am sure he will be hanged? and yet there is no crime in this.

L. C. J. Treby. Truly, brother Darnall, I know not how you may approve of such a man, but I'll assure you I do not. I take the question not to be concerning a man's discoursing speculatively; as, if upon hearing news, or a report of clear evidence, a man should say, supposing it to be true, such a man is guilty, and I should find him so if I were of his jury; to sufficient to not aside a juror;

For this has been a general discourse among the subjects upon occasion of this conspiracy; and it imports, that if evidence should not be true and clear, he would acquit him. And so he is, as he should be, indifferent. But if a man qualified for a juror, affirm positively that such a prisoner is guilty, and that he will find him so, whatever evidence or proof be given or made to the contrary; I think that may be a misdemeanor punishable as an swearing and encouraging of falsehood, perjury, and injustice, and a contempt and scandal to the justice of the kingdom: though I hope and believe that no man hath so demeaned himself.

Just. Powell. In a civil case it would be a good cause of challenge. If a man have given his opinion about the right way or other, may you not upon a Voyer Dire ask him whether he hath given his opinion one way or other? I believe it may be asked in a civil cause, because he may have been a referee; but if you make it criminal, it cannot be asked, because a man is not bound to accuse himself; now the difference lies in the nature of the cause; it is not criminal in a civil case for a man to say he was an arbitrator in such a case, and, upon what appeared before him, he was of such an opinion.

Att. Gen. But, my lord, it is a different case to give an opinion about the right between party and party, where a man has been an arbitrator and so in the nature of a judge, and where a man is to go upon a jury in the case of life and death, and before the evidence given, he declares his opinion without hearing the cause.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we know several of the trials have been printed, and the names of several persons mentioned, and upon reading of the trials, or conversing about them, men are apt to give their opinions one way or other.

Serj. Darnall. It is only an objection in case he has done it.

Just. Rokeby. But, brother, how can you ask him the question?

Serj. Darnall. If the court are of opinion that it is such a crime that it cannot be asked, as tending to make a man accuse himself of an infamous crime, then we submit it to you, and I confess we must not ask it; but we cannot apprehend that there is either crime or infamy in it, though we think it is an objection, and a good cause of challenge.

Baron Powys. I think, though it be not such a crime as infamous upon which a man is not to be credited, for that is infamy in the eye of the law, whereby a man is prejudiced in his credit; yet however, it is a shameful thing for a man to give his judgment before he hath heard the evidence; and therefore I think you ought not to ask him it, to make him accuse himself, if it be an opprobrious matter upon him.

Serj. Darnall. Truly, my lord, I always took it to be the rule, if the thing asked to the person returned be not criminal nor infamous, the party that is asked ought to answer to it.

* As to this matter, see Panks's Law of Evidence, chap. 3, s. 2.

L. C. J. Treby. I would like know, if you should ask any of the jurymen this question, whether he be guilty of all the crimes that are pardoned by the last act of grace, he be bound to answer it?

Serj. Darnall. Undoubtedly we cannot ask any such question; no, not to any one of the things therein mentioned.

L. C. J. Treby. But yet you will force him to discover a crime (if it be one) that is unpardoned.

Just. Powell. Certainly you go too far, brother, for no man is obliged to charge himself with what is criminal; but whether this be criminal to say, 'I believe such a one will be hanged,' is of another consideration.

Just. Rokeby. But I think it must be proved upon him, if any objection be made.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, it will be an easy thing to bring witnesses to prove this matter, and therefore we would have it from his own mouth.

Just. Rokeby. And it is a very hard matter for a man to be put upon proving every discourse that he has had about the public affairs of the time.

Recorder. The reason of your exception is, that he has declared his opinion before-hand, that the party would be hanged or would suffer, that is a reproach and a reflection upon a wise man so to do; and if they can prove it upon him, let them do it: but whether you should ask him such a question, whether he be a fool or a knave for the giving an opinion one way or other, that is the question before us.

Serj. Darnall. My lord, we do not offer it to the court as an objection that he is not a wise man.

Att. Gen. But what a man does utter imprudently, may occasion a prejudice against him, and therefore ought to be proved, and not he to prove it himself.

L. C. J. Treby. Especially being a freeholder of London, and taking notice of what is done in London; and if he does take notice of the fact, and does previously give his opinion of a matter which he may be called upon a jury to try, this is an imbecution and a reproach to him, and, I think, a misdemeanor.

Serj. Darnall. My lord, I acknowledge it is ill done of him, that is, indiscreetly and not wisely, and we would have discreet and wise men upon our jury.

Mr. Cooper. My lord, Mr. Serj. Darnall will make it so little a thing at last, that it will amount to no cause of challenge, if it were even proved against him, which we insist it ought to be, it being their objection, and the party not being bound to prove it against himself; but truly we think there is more in it than so, because it is an unjust prejudging of a man before he is tried and heard; and if so, it is a thing that he ought not to accuse himself of, and therefore we oppose the asking any Serj. Darnall. Our objection is not because it is an offence to declare a man's opinion upon a fact reported, but because it shows he has a settled opinion against the person of his guilt, and so he is not so equal a man to try him?

L. C. J. Treby. And is that like an honest man and a freeholder of London, (who ought to be indifferent) to come with a settled opinion against a man; when he is to be one of his jury?

Serj. Darnall. Well, my lord, we have been heard, and submit it to the judgment of the court.

L. C. J. Treby. Truly, I think it reflects both dishonesty and dishonour upon him, and therefore these questions ought not to be asked. The question is not, Whether a man (if ever such a man there were) that hath so resolved, and declared shall be sworn? No; he is not fit to serve upon a jury. But the question is, How this shall be discovered, by his own oath, or by other proof? I think it ought to be made appear by other proof, if true. A man attainted of felony, forgery, false verdict, or perjury, ought not to serve on a jury, yet he shall not be examined concerning the same on a Votre Dire. And if there be in a court a copy of such judgment carefully examined and kept by himself, he shall not be forced to answer whether it be a true copy; though his answer could not subject him to any further penalty.

Serj. Darnall. My lord, I hope no gentleman of the jury has done it.

L. C. J. Treby. I hope no freeholder of London is so indiscreet or so unjust. But if any man in this panel have any particular displeasure to the prisoner, or be unmindful, or have declared himself so, I do admonish and desire him to discover so much in general; for it is not fit, nor for the honour of the king's justice, that such a man should serve on the jury.

Serj. Darnall. We hope so too. We hope that all that are returned upon the jury are discreet and impartial men.

Cl. of Ar. Well, Sir, what say you to this gentleman, Mr. Walker.

Cook. I challenge you, Sir.

Cl. of Ar. Nathaniel Long.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we think he may ask if they have a freehold or no; because the law requires that qualification, and the prisoner not being able to prove the negative, it puts the proof of the affirmative upon the person himself.

Att. Gen. What does sir Bartholomew mean? Would he have the jury-men bring their evidences with them to prove their freehold?

L. C. J. Treby. No, sure, Mr. Attorney; but to ask the question was allowed him the last time, and we will not deny him the same just favour now.

Cook. Are you a freeholder, Sir, in London of the value of 10*l*. a year?—Long. Yes, Sir.

Cook. Were you of the grand jury when the bill was returned against me?—Long. No, Sir.

Cook. I challenge you, Sir.

Cl. of Ar. William Garbett.

Cardenall. My lord, I am no freeholder.
Ch. of Ar. What does he say he has no freehold?—Ch. of Ar. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Treby. Then he must be out aside.

Ch. of Ar. Joshua Foster.

Foster. My lord, I am no freeholder in London neither.

Att. Gen. My lord, we desire they may be sworn, whether they have a freehold or not.

Ch. of Ar. Hold Mr. Cardenall and Mr. Foster the book. [Which was done severally.] You shall true answer make to all such questions as shall be asked you by the Court. So help you God.

Att. Gen. Ask him if he hath not a freehold in London?

L. C. J. Treby. What question was that he asked him?

Ch. of Ar. Whether he were one of the grand jury that found the bill.

L. C. J. Treby. A very proper question: for an indictor ought never to be a juror.

[Then Mr. Sherbrooke was put into the place appointed for the jury.]

that found the bill, the attorney-general answered: "I believe he was upon one of the Indictments, but I think it was not this." To which the Chief Justice replied: "But if he were in either of them he cannot be so impartial." Upon the Trial of Richardson (see 2 in this Collection, vol. 8, p. 665) Major Wilkinson objected to serve on the jury, on the ground that he had in parliament voted the impeachment of Richardson for the same crime for which he was then to be tried; but whether this would have been a sufficient exception to his serving was not decided. It seems that he was not able for want of freehold in his own right. In 1681, 300, it is said, that in the case of the King against Rick and Ogden, it was granted that some of the grand jury who found the bill against him of the party jury. Bickley. My lord, I don't look upon myself as a freeholder.

L. C. J. Treby. Why so, Sir?

Bickley. I have a house for 51 years, my lord, of my house, and there is a very little piece of ground adjoining to it that was very convenient for me to lay to my house; there is no way to it but through my house; it is a thing that never was let for any thing, and it is not worth the building.

L. C. J. Treby. What estate have you in it? Do you pay a ground-rent for it?

Bickley. My lord, I bought that little piece of ground for the convenience of my lease.

L. C. J. Treby. But did you purchase it for a term of years, or to you, and to your heirs?

Bickley. Nay, I bought it for ever, my lord.

L. C. J. Treby. Then you have a freehold in it. What is the value of it?

Bickley. Truly very little, my lord.

L. C. J. Treby. I do not know any body can judge of the value of it but yourself. Is it worth 10l. a year?

Bickley. My lord, I cannot value it at 10l. a year, it never cost me 40l.

L. C. J. Treby. Then for estate you are well enough, but for value you are a little under.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Collins.

Cook. I accept of him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. John Watson.

Cook. I do not challenge him. [He was sworn.]

Cl. of Ar. John Pettit. [He was sworn.]

Crier, Countez.

Henry Sherbrook.

Crier. One, &c.

Cl. of Ar. John Pettit.

Crier. Twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your evidence.

The names of the twelve are as follows: Henry Sherbrook, John Culliam, Thomas Shaw, Richard Young, John Cooper, Jonathan Micklethwait, John Wolf, Thomas Collins, John Watson, Benjamin Hooper, Daniel Wray, and John Pettit.

Cl. of Ar. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O Yes, if any one can inform my lord the king's justice, the king's serjeant, the king's attorney general, or this inquest now to be taken of the high-treason whereof Peter Cook, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for the prisoner now stands at the bar upon his deliverance; and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and give their evidence, or they forsook their recognizance.

L. C. J. Tracy. You must make room for those twelve gentlemen that are sworn, that they may be at ease; and for those that are not sworn, their attendance may be spared.

Cl. of Ar. Peter Cook. Held up thy hand. [Which he did.] Gentlemen, you that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted in London, by the name of Peter Cook, late of London, gentleman; for that whereas an open and notoriously public and most sharp and cruel war, for a great while hath been, and it is by land and by sea carried on and prosecuted, by Lewis the French king, against the most serene, most illustrious and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William the Third, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. All which time, the said Lewis the French king, and his subjects, were, and yet are foes and enemies of our said lord the king that now is, William the Third, and his subjects; he the said Peter Cook, a subject of the said lord the king that now is, of this his kingdom of England, well knowing the premises, not having the fear of God in his heart, nor weighing the duty of his allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as a false traitor against the said most serene, most mild, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William the Third, now king of England, his supreme, true, rightful, lawful, and undoubted lord, the cordial love, and true and due obedience, fidelity, and allegiance, which every subject of the said lord the king that now is, towards him our said lord the king should bear, and of right is bound to bear, withdrawing; and utterly to extinguish, intending, and contriving, and with all his strength purposing, and designing the government of this kingdom of England, under him our said lord the king that now is of right duly, happily, and very well established, altogether to subvert, change, and alter, and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England, into intolerable and miserable servitude to the aforesaid French king to subdue and enthrall; the first day of July, in the seventh year of the reign of our said lord the king that now is, and divers days and times, as well before as after, at London, in the parish of St. Peter, Cornhill, in the ward of Lime-street, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously did compass, imagine, and contrive, purpose and intend, our said sovereign lord the king that now is, then his supreme, true, rightful, and lawful lord, of and from the royal state, title, honour, power, crown, empire, and government of this kingdom of England to depose, cast down, and utterly deprive, and the same our lord the king to death and final destruction to bring, and the aforesaid Lewis the French king, by armies, soldiers, legions, and his subjects, this kingdom of England to invade, fight with, conquer and subdue, to move, incite, procure and assist, and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of our said lord king William, throughout this whole kingdom of England, to make and cause. And further, that the said Peter Cook, during the war aforesaid, to wit, the aforesaid first day of July, in the seventh year abovesaid, and divers other days and times before and after, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, to the said foes and enemies of the same our lord the king, did adhere and was assisting: And his aforesaid most wicked and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, contrivances, intentions, and purposes aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, and in prosecution, performance, and execution of that traitorous adhering, he the said Peter Cook, as such a false traitor, during the war aforesaid, to wit, the same first day of July, in the year abovesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in London aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, and traitorously, and by force and arms, with one Robert Charnock, sir John Freind, and six William Parkyns, knights, (which said Robert Charnock, sir John Freind, and sir William Parkyns, were lately severally duly convicted and attainted of high treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said lord the king that now is) and with divers other false traitors to the jurors unknown, did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent, and agree to procure from the aforesaid Lewis the French king, of his subjects, forces and soldiers, then, and yet, foes and enemies of our said sovereign lord William, now king of England, &c. great numbers of soldiers and armed men, this kingdom of England to invade and fight with, and to levy, procure, and prepare great numbers of armed men, and troops, and legions against our said lord the king that now is, to rise up and be formed, and with those foes and enemies, at and upon such their invasion and entry within this kingdom of England, to join and unite, rebellion and war against our said lord the king that now is, within this kingdom of England, to make, levy, and carry on; the same our lord the king so, as aforesaid, to depose, and him to kill and murder: And further, with the said false traitors, the same first day of July, in the year abovesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, traitorously did consult, consent, and agree to send the aforesaid Robert Charnock as a messenger from him the said Peter Cook, and the same other traitors, as far as, and into the kingdom of France, in parts beyond the seas, unto James the Second, late king of England, to propose to him, and to request him to obtain from the aforesaid French king, the aforesaid soldiers and armed men for the invasion aforesaid to be made, and intelligence and notice of such their traitorous intentions and adherings to the said late king James the French, and the said other foes and enemies, and their adherents, to give and show, and shew to inform of other things, particulars and circumstances thereto relating, for the assistance, assisting, comforting, and aid of the said foes and enemies of the said lord the king that now is, in the war aforesaid; and to stir up and procure those foes and enemies the said lord to invade; the treasons, and traitorous contrivances, compassings, imaginings, and purposes of the said Peter Cook aforesaid to perfect and fulfil; also the same first day of July, in the seventh year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, he the said Peter Cook, divers horses, and very many arms, guns, muskets, pistols, rapiers, and swords, and other weapons, ammunition, and warlike matters, and military instruments, secretly, maliciously, secretly, and traitorously, did obtain, buy, gather together, and procure; and so to brought, gathered together, obtained and procured, did cause, and in his custody had and detained to that intent, to use the same in the said invasion, war, and rebellion against our said lord the king that now is, him our said lord the king, and from the regal state, crown, and government of this kingdom of England to depose, cast down, and deprive, and him to kill and murder; and the designs, intentions, and all the purposes of him the said Peter Cook aforesaid to fulfil, perfect, and fully to bring to effect, against the duty of his allegiance, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord that now is, his crown and dignity, against the form of the statute in each case made and provided.

Upon this indictment he has been arraigned, and thereto has pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you see; your charge is to inquire whether he be guilty of the high treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty; if you find him guilty, you are to inquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, he had at the time of the high treason committed, or at any time since; if you find him not guilty, you are to inquire whether he did for it; if you find that he did for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels as if you had found him guilty; if you find him not guilty, or that he did for it, you are to say so, and so move; and here your evidence.

Mr. Mansfield. May it please your lordship, and your gentlemen that sit with me in an indictment for high treason against Peter Cook, the prisoner at the bar, and the indictment set forth, that whereas there has been an open and cruel war for a long time, and still is between his majesty King William and the French king, the prisoner at the bar put upon this day of his arraignment, the former in the charge of the king's army, did and being in France and Germany, did put to his hands and arms, and the said group of the king's army, and shew to the king's enemies; and to fulfil these treasons the prisoner with Charles, and several other traitors who were mentioned there, and some of whom have been found guilty of treason, and executed for it, to send over to the late king James, to persuade the French king to send over soldiers and arms to invade this kingdom; and to raise an insurrection and rebellion in it, and to deprive and put the king to death; and to complete these treasons, if further sets forth, that the prisoner at the bar did provide several arms and horses, and this is laid to be against the duty of his allegiance, against the king's peace, crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided; to this he has pleaded not guilty, and for trial put himself upon the country; and, gentlemen, if we prove these facts laid in the indictment, it is your duty to find him guilty.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for high treason.

Cook. My Lord Chief Justice, if your lordship pleases, before the witnesses are examined against me, I intreat you that they may not be both in court together, that one may not hear what the other swears, though I suppose it is the same thing; for they have been together both now and the last day.

L. C. J. Trotter. Mr. Cook, I must tell you, it is not necessary to be granted for asking; for we are not to discourage, or cast any suspicion upon the witnesses, when there is nothing made out against them; but it is a favour that the court may grant, and does grant sometimes, and now does it to you; though it be not of necessity? They shall be examined apart, but at present this is not the time of examination: for the king's counsel are now to open the evidence before they examine the witnesses; but when the time comes for the witnesses to be called and examined, the Court will, in favour to you, take care that your request be complied with.

* It is noticed by Mr. Peake, Compendium of the Law of Evidence, ch. 3, s. 6, in a Note, that it appears that the present practice of ordering witnesses out of court during the progress of a cause, as an to prevent them from hearing the testimony of others, is very ancient; and he cites from Fortescue de Laudibus Legum Anglie, c. 26, the following passage: "Et si necesse sit, oportet Avocatum testes habere, donec ipsi deponant quicquid scilicet in eisdem litteris non debeat aut occasione commotionis ad committenda testificanda."

In the Case of Captain Thomas Vaughan, in the same year 1676, in this Collection, it is said, that a greater cannot insist on a right to the removal out of court of the witnesses for the crown during the examination of each side.

Mr. Peake (ch. 3, s. 6), seems not to notice the advantage of examining witnesses in the absence of each other, which indeed is well illustrated by the ancient maxim in the Anglo-Saxon, of Speccan and the Illust.

At, Gen. May it please your lordship, the prisoner stands indicted for high treason, in compassing and intending the death and destruction of his majesty, and likewise in authoring to his majesty's enemies; these are the treasons specified in the indictment: the overt acts that are laid to prove these treasons are, that he, with several other traitors named in the indictment, did meet and consult and agree to send over Charnock into France, to invite the French king to make an invasion upon the kingdom, and did provide arms for that purpose.

Gentlemen, the nature of the evidence that you will have produced to prove the prisoner guilty of these treasons lies thus: It will appear to you, that there has been for some time a conspiracy carried on by several traitors, and wicked persons, to subvert the established government of this kingdom, and destroy the constitution of England, by a foreign invasion of the French. You will hear that this conspiracy was laid wide, and consisted of several parts; one part was that of assassinating his majesty's royal person, and that was to be done first, as a preparation and encouragement to the French to invade the kingdom: the other part was the inviting the French king to invade us, and the prisoner at the bar is accused of being concerned in that part that relates to the invasion of this kingdom by a French power; and though it may be the other part, that of assassinating the king, be the blackest part of the conspiracy, yet if the prisoner at the bar has been engaged in the inviting a foreign power to invade the kingdom, my lords the judges will tell you, in point of law, that is as much an overt-act of the compassing the destruction of the king and the people of England, and the subversion of our ancient good constitution, as if he had been concerned immediately in the other part, the assassination.

But now, gentlemen, that the prisoner was engaged in inviting the French to invade us, you will hear proved by several witnesses, that there having been a design last year, just before his majesty went to Flanders, to expose his own person for our protection, and the protection of the liberties of Europe, there was a conspiracy to murder him before he went to Flanders, which, it seems, they were not ripe for then; but immediately after he was gone to Flanders, you will hear there were formal meetings of several gentlemen and persons of quality; among whom the prisoner at the bar was one: there was a meeting in May, last year, after the king was gone to Flanders; and this was at the Old King's Head in Leadenhall-street; and there were present my lord of Arundel, my lord Montgomery, sir William Russell, sir John Knight, Mr. Charnock, (all which gentlemen have suffered the punishment of the law for their treason already) and there were also Mr. Cook, the prisoner at the bar,

Mr. Potter and Mr. Goodman; these men did meet together, to consider of the best ways and means of encouraging and inviting the French king with an armed force to invade this kingdom; they considered that that was a proper opportunity, and did treat of several arguments that might persuade to it: First, That the king was gone to Flanders, and so was not in person here to defend us; and that the troops, to make good such defence, were in a great measure drawn thither, to assist the allies against the French power; they did think likewise that at that time there was a great discontent and dissatisfaction in the nation, though I think in that they were greatly mistaken; and I believe and hope they will always find themselves so, to think that the people of England are so little sensible of that which is the means of their preservation; as to hearken to any discontents to encourage a French power to come into England to destroy our religion and liberties; that indeed they did apprehend, though they were mistaken, and I believe they always will, when they go upon that ground.

Gentlemen, These persons thinking this a proper opportunity, did agree to send a messenger into France upon this message. To go to the late king James, and persuade him to desire and prevail with the French king to assist him with ten thousand men, 3,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons; and to encourage him, they promised their assistance here, as soon as he came over; and undertook, that between them they could furnish, and would raise 2,000 horse to meet him at his landing, and join upon such an invasion.

Gentlemen, At this meeting this was agreed upon by all that were there, whereof the prisoner was one; and they did agree to send Mr. Charnock; (who has since been executed, and a principal encourager of the design, and actor in it) he was the messenger that was appointed to go upon this errand, and Mr. Charnock was resolved to go; but desired another meeting of these gentlemen, to know if they continued in their former resolution, that he might have all the assurance that was reasonable to give the French king encouragement to make the invasion: accordingly another meeting was had of most of the same persons that were at the meeting before; particularly the prisoner at the bar was at that second meeting, which was in Covent-Garden at one Mrs. Mountjoy's, who keeps a tavern next door to sir John Fenwick's lodgings; there they met upon the same design, and upon consultation had, and the question asked, they did agree to continue in the former resolution; and upon that immediately Mr. Charnock went into France, to solicit forces from thence to invade us; but it happened, as it seems, that the French king's forces were otherwise employed, so that he could not spare as many at that time; and this return was brought by Charnock to the gentlemen that employed him; that he had spoke with the late king, who gave him this answer, That the French king could not spare so many men at that time, but he should thank them for their kindness.

Gentlemen, this will be the nature of our evidence, to shew, that the prisoner at the bar was concerned in that part of the conspiracy which relates to the French invasion; and if he be guilty of that, in point of law, he is as much guilty of the conspiracy to depose and murder the king, as if he had been concerned in the other part of assassinating his royal person; and I believe nobody can think, that those that were to act in the assassination, would have attempted to engage in such a desperate design, if it had not been for the encouragement of the French invasion that was to succeed them afterwards, if they succeeded; so that nobody can extenuate the crime of the invasion, because as to the horridness of the attempt, it is less black than the other; they are both crimes of a very high nature, and equally high-treason; and if we prove the prisoner guilty of this part, we hope you will find him guilty.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we will call our witnesses and prove the matter, as it has been opened. Call-captain Porter and Mr. Goodman.

Merj. Darnall. Now, my lord, we must desire that that may be done which our client desired before, and which your lordship was favourably pleased to promise, that the witnesses may be examined apart.

L. C. J. Treby. Let it be so: who do you begin with?

Sol. Gen. We begin with captain Porter, my lord.

L. C. J. Treby. Then let Mr. Goodman withdraw.

Mr. Baker. Let Mr. Goodman go up stairs, and we will call him presently.

Sol. Gen. Swear captain Porter: [which was done.] Captain Porter, Do you know Mr. Cook, the prisoner at the bar?

Capt. Porter. Yes, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember a meeting of some gentlemen at the King's-Head-tavern in Leaden-hall-street?—Porter. Yes, I do, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Then pray, give an account of the company that were there, the time when, and what passed?

Porter. My lord, the last year we had two meetings; the first was in May, the other was the latter end of May, or the beginning of June; the first was at the King's-Head in Leadenhall-street; there were my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Fenwick, sir John Freind, sir William Parkyns, Mr. Charnock, Mr. Cook, and myself; Mr. Goodman came in after dinner; at this meeting it was consulted which was the best way the quickest to restore king James, and for his return into England; several propositions and proposals there were; at last it was agreed to send Mr. Charnock in the late king, to borrow of the French king 10,000 men, 5,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 2,000 dragoned to be sent over into England to assist the king's restoration. Says Mr. Charnock thereupon, This the king can do without your sending, and I would not go upon a foolish errand. What wilt you do to assist in this matter? The company desired him to promise king James, that if he would send word when he landed and where, they would be sure to meet him at his landing with a body of 2,000 horse.

Att. Gen. Was the prisoner at the bar in the company, and present at this resolution?

Porter. Yes, he was.

Att. Gen. Did all the company agree to it?

Porter. Yes, they did.

Att. Gen. What signs were there of their agreement? Did they stand up severally and declare their agreement, or how?

Porter. My lord of Aylesbury and sir John Fenwick did rise up, and desired captain Charnock, that he would go upon this errand: and when the question was asked severally of all there present by Mr. Charnock, whether he might assure the king of what they had told him? every one said, Yes, you may; and Mr. Cook kneeled indeed, upon a chair, and said, Yes, you may.

Att. Gen. Did he give his consent to it?

Porter. Yes, he answered in those very words.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember any meeting of any company at Mrs. Mountjoy's?

Porter. Yes, that was a second meeting.

Sol. Gen. Pray tell my lord and the jury how you came to meet there then, what company were there, and what passed?

Porter. Mr. Charnock desired another meeting, to see if the gentlemen kept to their former resolution; and we met at Mrs. Mountjoy's eight or ten days after, and there were most of the company that was at the first meeting, and there all that were present did assure Mr. Charnock that they kept to their first resolution, and would abide to what was agreed upon at the former meeting.

Att. Gen. Who were present at the second meeting?

Porter. The prisoner at the bar was there at that second meeting.

Att. Gen. What was that second meeting for, do you say?

Porter. It was to give Mr. Charnock assurance, that we were agreed to stand by the resolution taken at the first meeting.

Att. Gen. What did Mr. Charnock do afterwards?

Porter. I went away from them; there was sir William Parkyns, sir John Friend and captain Charnock went to the Queen's-Head-tavern in Fleet-street, and captain Charnock told me he would go in two or three days, and I believe did so.

Att. Gen. When did you see him afterwards?

Porter. When I was a prisoner upon the account of the riot in Drury-Lane; about two or three days after I came to Newgate he came to see me, and said he had been in Porter. And that being James thanked us for our kind offer, but the French king could not spare us any more that year; and he told me he had been with my lord of Aylesbury, and the rest of the gentlemen that had employed him to go over, and had delivered them the several messages that he was ordered to from the king.

L. C. J. Treby. Captain Porter, who were present at the second meeting, do you say?

Porter. My lord of Aylesbury, sir John Freind, sir William Pulteney, captain Charnock, Mr. Cook, and myself; I cannot tell whether my lord Montgomery or Mr. Goodman were at that second meeting, or no.

Att. Gen. Captain Porter, I would ask you another question: you were concerned in the assassination with those other persons that engaged in it; Pray, what safety did you propose to yourselves after the assassination was over?

Porter. My lord, I asked sir George Barclay what we should do after the fact was committed; says he, You need fear nothing, I will go away that night, I have a ship ready, and the king will be landed in five or six days afterwards; if you will but keep yourselves close for so many days, all will do well.

Sol. Gen. If the prisoner or the counsel will ask him any questions, my lord, they may do it.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, Sir, can you recollect what time of day this was that this debate and resolution were had at the Old King's-Head in Leadenhall-street?

Porter. Truly, sir Bartholomew, I cannot tell.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, by what means do you recollect that this was in the month of May?

Porter. Because capt. Charnock was absent at the Dog-tavern riot, which was the 10th of June.

Sir B. Shower. Was it not in April?

Porter. No, Sir, to the best of my remembrance it was in May.

Sir B. Shower. What makes you think it was in May rather than April?

Porter. I have told you, Sir, because both meetings were before the Dog-tavern riot, the 10th of June, and Mr. Charnock was not there at that time; but he told me afterwards he had been in France, and, there were eight or ten days difference between the two meetings.

Att. Gen. My lord, if they have done with him, I would ask him one question, to settle this matter in point of time. Capt. Porter, Was the king gone to Flanders when you had these meetings?

Porter. The king was gone, Sir, before the first meeting.

Att. Gen. The king did not go till several days in May; was Mr. Goodman there?

Porter. He was at the first meeting, but I cannot tell whether he was at the second or no.

Serj. Darnell. Pray, what time was Mr. Goodman there at the first meeting?

Porter. He came up after dinner at the first meeting.

Mr. Baker. Then call down Mr. Goodman. [Who came in and was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Mr. Goodman, Pray will you give my lord and the jury an account what you know of an intended invasion upon this kingdom; what were the circumstances of it, and who were concerned in it.

Goodman. My lord, about the middle of May last, or thereabouts, captain Porter sent to me, and told me there was a meeting of some gentlemen of our acquaintance at the King's-head in Leadenhall-street; and he desired me that I would be there, because it was about business: I told him I did not know whether I could be there at dinner; but however I would not fail of coming thither after dinner; and accordingly I came. When I came into the house, I sent my name to captain Porter, and he came down and brought me up stairs, and there I saw my lord Montgomery, my lord of Aylesbury, sir John Fenwick, sir William Pulteney, sir John Freind, Mr. Charnock, and that gentleman at the bar, Mr. Cook: when we were there, the discourse was, that we did think king James's coming was retarded, and we would do any thing to facilitate his restoration.

Cook. My lord chief justice.

L. C. J. Treby. What say you, Mr. Cook?

Cook. My lord, if your lordship please, I desire the jury may not be talked to by any body; and I understand there are some talking with the jury.

L. C. J. Treby. Fy upon it! we will lay any body by the heels that do so; they must neither be disturbed, nor instructed by any body.

Cook. My lord, I am informed there was somebody talking to them, and telling them this was the same case with sir John Freind.

L. C. J. Treby. Do you but shew us the man, and we will find another place for him; we will send him to the goal, I will assure you.

Mr. Durlough. This gentleman, my lord, did hear such a discourse to the jury (pointing to a gentleman there) who stood up.

My lord, I cannot positively swear to the man, but I did hear some discourse that it was the same evidence as in the former trial.

L. C. J. Treby. If you can shew us who it was, we will take care to punish him: I suppose he stands corrected; and if we knew who he was, he should stand committed.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Goodman, begin again, and tell what passed at that meeting, because the jury were interrupted from hearing by people's buzzing about them.

Goodman. My lord, when captain Porter brought me up into the room, I told you what gentlemen I found there; after we were set down, there was a consultation, that considering the French king's wars retarded the affair of sending back king James, and the means of restoring him to the crown, it was fit we should find out some way or method to facilitate his restoration, and it was thought convenient to have a messenger to send over to king James with proposals for that purpose, to that effect, as near as I remember. That if king James could prevail with the French king to furnish 10,000 men, whereas 5,000 to be foot, 1,500 horse, and 1,000 dragoons, we would endeavour to meet him at the head of as many forces as we could raise, to sustain those forces to their landing; this was debated in order to raise a resolution; and much difficulty there was how many the number should be: the men pitched upon to be sent, was Mr. Charneck, and after some debate, how many thousand horse could be raised: says Mr. Charneck, do not let me be offer upon a foolish errand, but let me know what I have to say exactly? whereupon it was concluded by all, that 5,000 horse should be the number we could promise, and the king might depend upon them; and if we brought more, so much the better; and Mr. John Preted said, I believe he has so many friends here, that if he came himself, he might be welcome; but that we did not think fit to visit to, and nobody would advise any such thing. When the resolution of the thing and the number was then fixed, Mr. Charneck asked whether it were with all our consent? and that he might assure the king that this was our resolution thereupon? We all rose up, and said to him, Yes, you may, yes, you may, every one particularly; and I remember one thing particularly concerning the prisoner Mr. Cook, that he knelt upon the chair when he said, Yes, you may; and his elbows were upon the table: this is all that I know of that meeting. There was to be another meeting, as captain Porter told me; but I had business in the city; but whatsoever he promised on my behalf, as to the quest of men, I would be sure to make it good; and I was not at the second meeting.

Mr. Darnall. Did you see Mr. Charneck afterwards?

Goodman. Yes, I did, when he came back; and he told me the thing was not accepted, for the French king could not spare men, and that he had been with the several gentlemen to carry them the compliments that he had in charge from king James, who returned them thanks for their good affection; and, among the rest, he did me the honour to return me thanks too.

Mr. B. Shaver. Pray, Mr. Goodman, let me ask you a question: when was it that you saw Mr. Charneck after this?

Goodman. It was in Arundel-street, at his lodging.

Mr. B. Shaver. But I ask you, Sir, when it was? was it before or after the 10th of June?

Goodman. It was after the 10th of June, Sir.

Mr. B. Shaver. How long after, pray?

Goodman. I believe it was a month after the 10th of June.

Mr. B. Shaver. Did you see him here in England, before Mr. Cook was discharged from the city, and sent out of New-gate?

Goodman. I believe I did see him before captain Porter was discharged, but Serj. Darnall. Who were the persons that were present at that meeting?

Goodman. My friend Montgomery, my friend Kilday, Mr. John Preted, Mr. John French, Mr. William Parkyn, Mr. Charneck, captain Porter, and the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Cook.

Serj. Darnall. Were you at dinner with them, Sir?

Goodman. No, I came in after dinner.

Serj. Darnall. Pray, what house was it, do you say, this meeting was at?

Goodman. It was at the King's-head in Lendenhall-street.

Sir B. Shaver. Can you tell what day of the week it was?

Goodman. No, nor the day or the month.

Sir B. Shaver. Was you ever in the company of these gentlemen at any other time?

Goodman. No, this was the only time that I heard of this consultation. I was not at the second meeting.

Cook. If your lordship pleases, may I ask Mr. Goodman any questions?

L. C. J. Treby. Yes, by all means ask him what you will.

Cook. Mr. Goodman, you are upon your oath: but did you ever hear me speak ten words in your life? Was you ever in my company in any house, before or since?

Goodman. Yes, Sir, I was in your company at the Cock in Bow-street, where you came in accidentally.

Cook. Did you ever hear me talk of the government, or any thing of that nature?

Goodman. What the discourse was of, I cannot particularly say, but I am certain you was there: and as to the consultation that I now speak of, I remember very well you gave your consent in that manner as I have told the court.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done as the present.

L. C. J. Treby. Then, brother Darnall, what say you for the prisoner?

Serj. Darnall. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: I am of counsel, in this case, for the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Cook, who stands indicted of a very great offence, no less, gentlemen, than high-treason; and if he be guilty, his punishment will be as great; but because the punishment and the offence are both very great, the law requires exact positive proof, and that by two credible witnesses. There have been two indeed that have been produced to you; and if you believe both of these, after what we shall offer to you against them, and if what they swear be true, the prisoner is guilty; but if we satisfy you that either of them is not to be credited, so that you do not believe both of them, he must be acquitted.

There is no doubt, gentlemen, but there has been a villainous horrid plot; there is no question of it; and it was as it has been opened, exactly to annihilate one of the bravest men living; and to make the greatest proofs of the world, if they knew what they are doing.

most miserable people upon earth, by bringing them under French tyranny and slavery. Many of the traitors have been brought to just punishment for this treason; nay, they have owned the fact at their deaths, so that there is no question of the truth of it; and therefore, gentlemen, every honest man will endeavour to bring such as are plainly guilty of such an abominable conspiracy, to just punishment; but yet they will be as careful not to let an innocent man suffer; that, gentlemen, every honest man will take care of, and especially such as are upon their oaths: it concerns a jury highly to be satisfied that he is not innocent, whom they bring in guilty; for it is better that twenty guilty men should escape, than one innocent man suffer.

But, Gentlemen, if my brief be true, we shall give you such an account of one of these witnesses; first, as to the man himself; that he is not a man to be credited as a witness; and then besides that, as to the evidence he gives in this case, (I say, if my brief be true) it is false, and we shall prove it so; and when you have heard our evidence, if you are satisfied that one of these witnesses is not to be credited, or that what he swears is not true, you are to acquit the prisoner.

Gentlemen, here has been one Mr. Goodman produced as a witness, one that never was produced before at the trial of any of those that have suffered, so that the truth of their guilt does not at all depend upon his evidence, nor does it give any credit to it. This is this gentleman's first entry upon this stage; and yet (if my brief be true) this is not the first bloody or cruel part that he has acted; for we have a record of conviction against him, whereby it will appear to you, that he was indicted (for endeavouring to poison two great dukes) for giving 40 guineas to an Italian empiric, one Amydei, and promising 200l. more when it was effected, to poison the late duke of Grafton, and the present duke of Northumberland; and we shall shew you, that he was convicted of it, and fined a thousand pound for the offence; which, considering the meanness of his circumstances at that time, was as much as twenty thousand pounds; for he could as well have paid twenty as one then; and it appears too, that Mr. Goodman (say, it will not be denied by him himself) was in this horrid plot; and he that would be concerned to poison two dukes in a family, to which he had so many obligations—

Goodman. My lord, I desire leave to speak to this matter that the sergeant mentions.

Serj. Darnall. Pray, Sir, let me go on; you may talk upon; I have seen the copy of the record of conviction, and have it ready to produce.

Att. Gen. Mr. Goodman, be quiet, and stay till by and bye; you will be defended, no doubt on it; but in the mean time let them go on, and do not interrupt them.

Serj. Darnall. I say, my lord, he that would be concerned in so vile an act, as a contrivance to take away the lives of two great dukes,

(who were, in effect, his young masters) that he should go to poison them, in a family to which he had been so much obliged; and then, he that would be concerned in so horrid a plot as this was, to destroy his country, and take away the life of the king; sure it will be no difficult thing to think that this man will not stick little at the prisoner's life at the bar, especially when he has so great a temptation to it, as to save his own life by it.

But perhaps some of you may doubt whether it is to save his own life or no: but I believe there are none of you would give any credit to him, if you thought so: therefore, to satisfy you of that fact, we shall produce you evidence of his own opinion of that matter, beside the general known circumstances he lay under: as, that he was long in prison before he charged the prisoner with any thing, and the prisoner was at liberty, went every day abroad for a week after Mr. Charnock's trial, and never absconded one minute, but lived publicly, openly, and visibly to all his friends, and all strangers: but besides, gentlemen, that Mr. Goodman knew he must die, and justly and deservedly for this horrid plot and treason himself; and had no other way left to save his life, but to come in thus as an evidence and accuser, which we think will shake his credit with you.

I say, besides all this, (if my brief be true) we shall prove that he has said himself, That either he must hang Peter Cook, or he must be hanged himself. Thus, gentlemen, he swears to save his own life, by taking away another's.

This, Gentlemen, is as to the man himself, that he is not to be credited. But now further, as to the evidence that he has given: he tells you that he came into the tavern in Leadenhall-street, and that there he found such company; he owns he came in after dinner; and that the other gentleman, Mr. Porter, owns too; he says there were present at this meeting, my lord Montgomery, my lord of Aylesbury, Mr. Cook, and several other gentlemen; but (if my brief be true) we shall prove by three witnesses, that he was not there till they were gone; and that will make an end of all the pretence of his evidence.

Att. Gen. Nay, then we shall never have done.

Serj. Darnall. I'll assure you, Sir, I have the names of three witnesses in my brief, to prove that my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, and Mr. Cook, were gone before he came in, though if any, or either of them were gone, it destroys his testimony; and if we prove this to you, I would be loth to be one of the jury that should take away the prisoner's life upon this evidence; no, if he were the vilest man alive, and much less, the life of the prisoner at the bar; for we shall prove (if my brief be true) he is a man of morals, a man of virtue, one that has a great love for his country; and this we shall prove by evidence undeniable, persons of quality in their country, such as serve their country in parliament, as their representatives; we shall shew it by such evidence, that there will be no room to doubt of it: he is a man without any stain or blot upon him, till this accusation; he is the eldest son of his father, and heir to a great estate; his father is a great officer, and a great soldier, under this government; and can it be imagined or believed, that such a man would be guilty of the worst of treasons, to destroy the religion he professes, to overturn the state, to ruin his own estate, himself and his posterity, which must be the consequence of it? May, if two good witnesses could be produced to testify it, and if we had not had so much to take off the credit of Goodman, I could hardly believe it of any man that was in his right senses; he must have been a madman if he had done it, one that stood as well with the present government, and of a family never tainted with disloyalty.

Certainly, gentlemen, when we make out this to you against Mr. Goodman, the prisoner can be in no danger of his life from Mr. Goodman's evidence, though he is an unfortunate man to come under such an accusation; but I cannot believe that any jury, upon such a man's evidence, will bestow an honest faculty with the loudest, smart, blackest treason that ever was hatched; no, gentlemen, you are men of ability and understanding, and that is it we rely upon; we doubt not but that you will consider the evidence, and consider your oaths, and not let the prisoner's blood lie at your doors; therefore we shall go on and call our witnesses to make out what I have opened.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we desire to call our witnesses, and I shall reserve myself to make some observations after we have given our evidence. Mr. Sergeant has opened as much as we can prove, and we will now produce our evidence; First, we will shew the conviction of Goodman: Mr. Burleigh, where is the conviction?—Mr. Burleigh. Here it is, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. Where had you it, Sir?

Mr. Burleigh. Out of the Treasury at Westminster.

Sir B. Shower. Is it a true copy, did you examine it there?

Mr. Burleigh. Yes, it is a true copy, I did examine it with the record.

Sir B. Shower. Then read it, Mr. Tanner.

Et of Ar. [Reads].— Michaelmas Term: Thames secundum Caroli Secundi.

L. C. J. Treby. Read the record in English to the jury.

Et of Ar. [Reads]. Be it remembered, that sir Robert Sawyer, knight, Attorney General of our lord the king (that son is, who for the same our lord the king in this parliament, came here into the court of our said lord the king, before the king himself at Westminster, on Thursday next after three weeks of St. Michael, the same term; and for the same our lord the king, brought here into the court of our said lord the king, before the said king, then and there a certain accusation against Cardell Goodman, late of the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, which information follows in these words, to wit, Middlesex scilicet: He hath answered that sir Robert Sawyer, knight, Attorney General of our said lord the king that now is, who for the same our lord the king, in this behalf aforesaid, in his own proper person came here into the court of our said lord the king, before the king himself at Westminster, on Thursday next after three weeks of St. Michael that same term, and for the same our lord the king gives the court here to understand and be informed, That Cardell Goodman, late of the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, being a person of a wicked mind, and of an ungodly and devilish disposition and conversation, and contriving, practising, and falsely, maliciously and devilishly intending, death, and poisoning and final destruction unto the right noble Henry duke of Grafton, and George duke of Northumberland, and that the aforesaid Cardell Goodman, his most wicked, most impious, and devilish intentions, contrivances and practices aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, the 30th day of September, in the six and thirtieth year of the reign of our lord Charles the Second, now king of England, &c. and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, with force and arms, &c. falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, wickedly, and devilishly, by unlawful ways and means, did solicit, persuade, and endeavour to procure one Alexander Amydel to prepare and procure two flasks of Florence wine, to be mixed with deadly poison, for the poisoning of the aforesaid right noble Henry duke of Grafton, and George duke of Northumberland; and his most wicked, most impious, and devilish contrivances, practices and intentions aforesaid, to fulfil, perfect, and the more to bring to effect, the aforesaid Cardell Goodman, the day and year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, maliciously and devilishly, did promise and agree to give unto the aforesaid Alexander Amydel forty pieces of guinea gold, of the value of forty pounds, of lawful money of England, if he the said Alexander Amydel would prepare, procure and provide two flasks of Florence wine, to be mixed with deadly poison, for the poisoning of the aforesaid right noble Henry duke of Grafton, and George duke of Northumberland; and if the aforesaid poison with the wine aforesaid to be mixed, should effect the death of the aforesaid Henry duke of Grafton, and George duke of Northumberland; that then he the said Cardell Goodman would give unto the said Alexander Amydel the sum of 100*l.* and that beyond he he would maintain the said Alexander, all the days of his life, the said Alexander, to the evil and most pernicious example of all others in the like offending, and against the peace of our said lord the king that now sits his crown and dignity, &c. That here is process prayed by the Attorney General against Mr. Goodman, who comes, and by his Attorney pleads not guilty, and here is issue joined.

Ser. B. Shower. Well, now for the verdict.

Cl. of Ar. There was a trial at Nisi Prius, and the jury find that the said Cardell Goodman is guilty of the premises in the Information specified, as by the Information is supposed against him.

Ser. B. Shower. Now read the Judgment.

Cl. of Ar. Thereupon it is considered, that the said Cardell Goodman do pay to the king the sum of 1,000*l*. for his fine, imposed upon him for the occasion aforesaid, and that the aforesaid Cardell Goodman be committed to the Marshalsea of this court, in execution for his fine aforesaid, that he be safely kept there, till he pay his fine aforesaid; and before that the said Cardell Goodman is delivered out of the prison aforesaid, he shall give security to behave himself well, during his life, and also shall give security for the peace to be kept towards the said lord the king, and all his people, and particularly towards the right noble Henry duke of Grafton, and George duke of Northumberland.

Ser. Darnall. So, you hear the record of the information, conviction and judgment, for a very horrid abominable crime.

Att. Gen. But I desire they may now go on, and read the whole of the record.

Cl. of Ar. [Reads.] 'And afterwards, to wit, on Friday next after eight days of St. Hilary, in the 36th and 37th years of the reign of our said lord the king that now is, before our said lord the king at Westminster came the aforesaid sir Robert Sawyer, knight, Attorney-General of our said lord the king that now is, and acknowledged that the said Cardell Goodman has satisfied to our said lord the king that now is, of the judgment aforesaid against him, in form aforesaid given, therefore the said Cardell Goodman is thereof acquitted; and so forth.'

Ser. Darnall. Call Mr. Charles Edwards, William Cook, Christopher Crawford, Mary Crawford, and Mr. Huntley.

[Edwards appeared upon a Habeas Corpus, directed to the keeper of Newgate, where he was a prisoner.]

Mr. Baker. Where is the warrant of this commitment? What is he committed for?

Edwards. He is committed for suspicion of treason, and treasonable practices.

Mr. Baker. Is he not committed for high-treason?—Edwards. No, Sir, he is not.

Ser. Darnall. What discourse had you with Mr. Goodman concerning the prisoner at the bar? What did you hear him say?

Mr. Baker. He is not sworn yet, it seems the gentleman was Huntley's chaplain in Scotland.

Ser. Gen. If he be not sworn, he can give no evidence.

Ser. Darnall. My lord, we desire he may be sworn.

L. C. J. Treby. Swear him. [Which was done.]

Ser. Darnall. Pray, Sir, will you tell the court and the jury, what you know of any discourse of Mr. Goodman's concerning the prisoner at the bar.

Edwards. My lord, I desire to know, being ignorant of the law, whether I am brought here by the common course of justice or not?

Ser. Darnall. Sir, we have subpoenaed you for the prisoner at the bar, to give evidence of the truth of your knowledge here upon oath.

L. C. J. Treby. Would you have us tell you how you came here? We suppose you came by due process of law, as a witness.

Edwards. Then, my lord, I desire to speak but one word; that it is a strange thing to me to consider, how words should be carried away that were privately spoken; as if it were to expose me to the reproaches of all my friends; it is a thing that I did never expect to hear of again: however, seeing I am called here, and obliged upon my oath to declare what I know, I by God's grace will, to the uttermost of my power, tell what has passed in this matter.

L. C. J. Treby. Do not make any apology for telling the truth: you are obliged by your oath to do it, and the court expects it from you.

Edwards. Among other discourses that passed betwixt Mr. Goodman and me, I asked him when Mr. Cook was to be arraigned, and when he was to be tried: Says he, he is to be arraigned upon Monday, and he is to be tried upon Thursday. I asked him, whether it was for the Assassination-Plot, and he told me No. For what then? said I: as being concerned in sending Mr. Charnock into France? Who are the evidences against him? said I. Said he, captain Porter and myself. Said I, I believe two witnesses will be found good, or by way of demonstration in law; and I pity the poor gentleman's case. Says he, He swore against me. How comes it then, said I, that he is not come off, and has not a pardon, and would divulge nobody else?

L. C. J. Treby. Who had not a pardon do you mean?

Edwards. Mr. Cook. I asked, how he had not a pardon? Says he, He would give an account of nobody else but me, and that was the reason he had no pardon. Said I to him, Who are the evidences against him? Says he, captain Porter and myself. And after this, says he, He or I must perish; or, He and I must suffer; I believe the word was suffer. But, says he, it is a foolish thing to be hanged. All that is said of a man that is hanged, is, That he hanged handsomely, or hanged bravely. That's all the discourses that I can remember.

Ser. Darnall. He said it was a foolish thing to be hanged; and Mr. Goodman, it seems, had no mind to be hanged; and I believe so too: but he must not hang my client to save his own life.

Serj. Darnall. Now, by the same oath that I have sworn, I know nothing of being brought before me; all my words were carried away privately from me, and has been consulted of, and returned to me back again; and I was far from suborning or carrying away a discourse privately, to make any advantage of it.

Serj. Darnall. Now we will call Crawford, and Huntley, and Cock.

Att. Gen. I desire that gentlemen that was last examined may not go away.

[Crawford, Huntley and Cock were sworn.]

Sir B. Shower. Set up Mr. Crawford, (which was done). Pray, Sir, will you recollect yourself? Do you remember when my lord of Aylesbury and captain Potter died at the King's Head?

Crawf. Yes: it was about a twelvemonth ago.

Serj. Darnall. What company was there?

Crawf. My lord of Aylesbury, sir John Freind, sir John Fenwick, sir William Parkyns, captain Porter, and two or three more; I did not know their names.

Sir B. Shower. How many were there that dined there?—Crawf. I think about eight in all.

Sir B. Shower. Was the room shut while they were there, or did the servants and drawers go up and down commonly?

Crawf. Yes, they did go up and down commonly.

Sir B. Shower. After dinner, did any body come to them while they were there?

Crawf. No, not during my lord of Aylesbury's stay, and my lord Montgomery went away with him.

Sir B. Shower. About what time did my lord of Aylesbury go away?

Crawf. I think it was about four o'clock.

Sir B. Shower. How can you tell it?

Crawf. I did attend upon them the most part of the time.

Sir B. Shower. Did you see him go away?

Crawf. Yes, I did.

Sir B. Shower. Was that gentleman, Mr. Goodman, there when they went away?

Crawf. I did not see him there, to my remembrance: nobody came in there before they went away, saving their own servants.

Serj. Darnall. Do you know Mr. Cook, the prisoner at the bar? Was he one of the gentlemen that were at your house?

Crawf. Yes; I did not well remember or recollect, till I saw him on Saturday last.

Att. Gen. Was he one that went away?

Crawf. I do not remember, truly, Sir.

Att. Gen. Pray, how long was it after dinner that they went away?

Crawf. I think it was not an hour.

Att. Gen. Was you there all the time, from the time of the dinner?

Crawf. No; not all the while; I was not in the room, but going to and fro.

Serj. Darnall. How say Mr. Goodman did not come up till after they were gone?

Crawf. No, I did not see him.

Att. Gen. Did you see him at all?

Crawf. No, I did not see him at all.

Att. Gen. Just now it was said, he did not come till they were gone; and now it seems he did not see him at all.

Crawf. I do not know that he was there at all.

L. C. J. Treby. But, brother Darnall, you opened it, that Mr. Goodman came after my lord of Aylesbury was gone; and now you will prove it that he came not at all.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we do not pretend to falsify his evidence for any thing more than is material for the present. We say Mr. Goodman was not in the room where they dined till those persons went away: if in any particular we disprove him, it is sufficient for us: if we can show that he was not there till three of those that he has named were gone away, that answers our end. We are not concerned if he came at four, five, or six o'clock, and discoursed with Charneck till twelve o'clock at night.

Att. Gen. Pray reserve your remarks; but only observe now what he says, that Mr. Goodman came not at all thither; and that is more than you pretended to open.

Mr. Conyers. How many were there that were there at dinner?—Crawf. About eight.

Mr. Conyers. How many do you name that you know?

Crawf. My lord of Aylesbury, sir John Freind, sir John Fenwick, sir William Parkyns, and captain Porter; there were several others, two or three more, but I did not know their names.

Mr. Conyers. Did you see Mr. Goodman come in at any part of the day afterwards?

Crawf. I do not know that Mr. Goodman.

Mr. Couper. Mr. Crawford, you say, that for an hour after dinner you were sometimes in the room, and sometimes out; when you were out of the room, were you always in the passage up to the room?

Crawf. No, I was not.

Mr. Couper. Could any man come in or out without your seeing?

Crawf. I should have known him above stairs when I came in again.

Mr. Couper. Why, you say, there are two or three above that you did not know.

Crawf. I knew them by sight, if not their names.

Mr. Couper. Were you always in sight then?

Crawf. No, Sir, I tell you I was up and down.

Sir B. Shower. Was there any body come in before my lord of Aylesbury went out? that is any body besides those that dined there?—Crawf. No.

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we would be understanding now about a man's coming up without his knowledge; but whether any such man as Mr. Goodman came up and stood there during the consultation; and we shall know if there was nobody there all my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, and Mr. Cook were gone, but these that dined there: now I would ask a question again of him, Was there any body but who dined there, till my lord of Aylesbury went away?

Crawf. No, there was not.

Att. Gen. Why do you say so? How do you know that?

Crawf. I did not see any body.

Sol. Gen. Did you attend upon other rooms, as well as that, at the same time?

Crawf. Yes, I did.

Sol. Gen. Then how is it possible that he can swear that Mr. Goodman was not there?

Sir B. Shower. Do you remember when my lord of Aylesbury and they went away?

Crawf. It was about four o'clock.

Sir B. Shower. Were you there in the room when they went away?

Crawf. I went out with my lord to the coach.

Sir B. Shower. Did you see him come down stairs, or did you go up stairs then?

Crawf. I went up stairs when the coach was called.

Sir B. Shower. Was then any body there but such as dined there?

Crawf. I did not see any body there but those that dined there.

Mr. Cowper. But, my lord, he does not know all that dined there, neither.

L. C. J. Treby. Mr. Crawford, you say my lord of Aylesbury and others went away about four o'clock: pray how long did the rest of the company stay there?

Crawf. I cannot remember. They staid there pretty late: it is a pretty while ago.

L. C. J. Treby. About what hour did they part?

Crawf. I cannot remember what time the rest went away: our house is fuller at night than at noon; and I waited upon other companies. It was pretty late before they went away, that I am sure.

L. C. J. Treby. But he cannot remember whether it were five or six, or twelve, that they went away; only he can remember the hour of four, that my lord of Aylesbury and they went away.

Just. Rokeby. Was it light, or was it dark when they went away?—Crawf. It was dark.

L. C. J. Treby. Did you attend the company after my lord of Aylesbury was gone?

Crawf. I went up and down into that company as I did into others.

L. C. J. Treby. Was you there several times after my lord of Aylesbury was gone?

Crawf. Yes, I was there once or twice after my lord of Aylesbury was gone, I am sure.

L. C. J. Treby. And did you never see Mr. Goodman there?

Crawf. No, I never saw Mr. Goodman in my life before I saw him on Saturday last.

Sir B. Shower. Which is Mr. Huntley?

Huntley. Here I am, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. Pray recollect yourself, and tell my lord and the jury what you remember of any company that were with Mr. Porter, at the King's-head, and who dined there.

Huntley. My lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Fenwick, sir William Parkynb, sir John Freind, Mr. Porter and Mr. Charnock.

Sir B. Shower. That was the company, you say, that dined there: Did Mr. Goodman dine there?

Huntley. No, Mr. Goodman did not dine there.

Sir B. Shower. Pray, Sir, recollect yourself: when did any of this company part, or go away?

Huntley. My lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away about four o'clock.

Sir B. Shower. Sir, how do you know that?

Huntley. I went down stairs after them; I was above stairs when they parted from the rest of the company.

Serj. Darnall. Pray mind, Sir: was Mr. Goodman there at that time before they went away?—Huntley. No, he was not.

Sir B. Shower. Are you sure of that, upon the oath you have taken?

Huntley. Yes, I take it upon my oath he was not there.

Sir B. Shower. Did you attend them at dinner?

Huntley. Yes, I did attend them at dinner.

Sir B. Shower. Did you attend them all the while they were there?

Huntley. I was called frequently, and was in and out of the room very much after dinner.

Sir B. Shower. Do you think, if a fresh man had come in after dinner, you should not have known him?

Huntley. Yes, I should have known him.

Att. Gen. Pray, friend, let me ask you one question: was Mr. Goodman there all that day?

Huntley. That I do not know; I did not see him at all.

Sol. Gen. Did you attend upon any other rooms that day?

Huntley. No; I attended only upon that company.

Sol. Gen. Were you in the room all the time?

Huntley. No; I went up and down.

Sol. Gen. What time did the last of the company go away?

Huntley. It was about darkish; it was pretty late, to the best of my remembrance.

Att. Gen. Pray, did any body come to those gentlemen after dinner?—Huntley. No, Sir.

Att. Gen. Did you ever see Goodman before now?

Huntley. Never in my life, to my knowledge.

Just. Rokeby. Did all the company, but my lord of Aylesbury, and my lord Montgomery, stay until it was darkish?

Huntley. That I do not know.

Just. Rokeby. Did you know all the company that was that day at dinner?

Huntley. I knew all but one.

Just. Rokeby. And who was that?

Huntley. That was Mr. Charnock.

Just. Rokeby. And yet you cannot tell whether there was any body else that you did not know, how then can you tell that Goodman was not there?

Sir B. Shower. He did not know him at that time, but he might remember him afterwards.

Mr. Conyers. Did not the same company use to meet at other times, at your house?

Huntley. Not to my remembrance.

Mr. Conyers. How then came you, if they never had used to meet there, to know all these people's names?

Huntley. I have seen sir John Freind there, and sir William Parkyns.

Mr. Conyers. Was sir John Freind there, or no?—Huntley. Yes, he was.

Mr. Conyers. My lord, he was the only man that was not named before: you did not name sir John Freind before, as I heard: but pray, did you ever see Mr. Charnock there but at that time?—Huntley. No, I did not.

Mr. Conyers. How came you to know it was Mr. Charnock?

Huntley. I knew very few of them before that time; and I asked their servants the names of all those persons that were there.

Mr. Conyers. Did you know Mr. Porter, pray?

Huntley. Not before that time: I did see Mr. Porter, and I knew him again when I saw him: his black told me his name that day.

Sir B. Shower. You, Huntley, I would ask you one question more: was the door shut, or no?—Huntley. No, it was not.

Sir B. Shower. Did the servants go up and down as they used to do?—Huntley. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Sir Bartholomew would make it that there was no consultation at all.

Sir B. Shower. They were mad folks if they would consult at that rate with the door open. Pray call Mr. William Cock. [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Sir John Freind has owned it, that's dead.

Sir B. Shower. Sir John Freind's confession is nothing to the prisoner.

Att. Gen. Mr. Serjeant Darnall did open, that the confession of those that died was an undeniable proof of the conspiracy: but go on with your evidence.

Serj. Darnall. Pray, Mr. Cock, will you recollect yourself about the time when captain Porter and some other gentlemen dined at your house.—Cock. Yes, very well.

Serj. Darnall. Pray, Sir, can you tell who dined there at that time?

Cock. There were my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir William Parkyns, sir John Fenwick, sir John Freind, Mr. Charnock, captain Porter and Mr. Cook.

Just. Rokeby. Was that all the company?

Cock. Yes, it was.

Just. Rokeby. One of them said there were eight.

L. G. J. Treby. And he has named eight, brother.

Serj. Darnall. Can you remember when any of the company went away, and who went away first?

Cock. My lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away in a hackney coach; and their servants were frequently in the room, and waited afterwards in another room, after that they had waited at table at dinner; and though the door was shut, as it used to be when any company is there, yet nobody was forbid to come there at all.

Att. Gen. Do you remember when Mr. Goodman came there?

Cock. I never saw Mr. Goodman in my life before to-day.

Serj. Darnall. Did any body come to this company before my lord of Aylesbury went away that did not dine there?

Cock. I did not see any body there at all. and my lord of Aylesbury was about buying a hogshead of white-wine, but we could not agree about the price: and when my lord of Aylesbury went away, I went down with my lord, and waited upon him to the coach; and I told my lord, I hoped he would buy the wine still. But he answered, he could not tell whether he should or no.

Serj. Darnall. Who else went with my lord of Aylesbury?

Cock. My lord Montgomery. I do not remember any body else.

Just. Rokeby. Did all the rest of the company go away at once?

Cock. Truly, my lord, I cannot say they did.

Just. Rokeby. By what time did the rest go away?

Cock. I believe it might be eight or nine o'clock.

Serj. Darnall. You saw my lord of Aylesbury when he parted: was Mr. Goodman there then?—Cock. I did not see him.

Baron Powis. Did Mr. Cook stay till the last?

Cock. That I cannot tell truly.

Baron Powis. I find they all swear to four o'clock of my lord Aylesbury's going, and go no further.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, let me ask you a question or two: did you ever see Mr. Goodman before now?

Cock. No, I do not remember I did.

Att. Gen. When you went into the room after dinner, did you look about the room to see whether there were any new company?

Cock. I did look about the room several times, and so did my servants, to see if there were any thing wanting.

Att. Gen. Can you take it upon your oath, that he was not there whilst my lord of Aylesbury staid?

Cock. I do: and can take it upon my oath, he was not.

Att. Gen. Then, if you can, pray distinguish the time when he came in.

Cock. I do not remember that ever I saw him in my life before to day.

Att. Gen. Why are you not as positive that he was not there at all, as that he was not there before my lord of Aylesbury went away?

Cock. He might come in, and I not see him.

Att. Gen. Might he not as well come in before they went away, as after, to come in and you not see him?

Cock. No, I do not think he could.

Att. Gen. Why do you think so?

Cock. Because the servants were all about, and they did not go to dinner till 2 o'clock: and I believe those gentlemen that I named, came in a quarter of an hour's time to dinner.

Att. Gen. We do not say he came there before dinner; but could he not come in after dinner, before my lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away, without your seeing him?—Cock. No, Sir.

Sir B. Shower. Then, mark ye, Sir, I would ask you one question: did you see him, upon your oath, or not?—Cock. No, I did not.

Sir B. Shower. Might not Mr. Goodman come in to them without your seeing him?

Cock. It is possible; but I do not think it was so.

Just. Rokeby. How then can you be positive that he was not there till my lord of Aylesbury went?

Sol. Gen. You say you may be positive he was not there before my lord of Aylesbury went: can you be as positive now, that he was not there before Mr. Cook went?

Cock. I do not know when Mr. Cook went.

Sol. Gen. How can you be then positive he was not there before my lord of Aylesbury went?

Cock. There were no more than what dined there when my lord of Aylesbury went away.

Mr. Conyers. Pray, Sir, let me ask you a question: Were you in the room at any time after dinner?—Cock. Yes.

Mr. Conyers. Pray, Sir, how many times after dinner, were you there?

Cock. I believe half a dozen times.

Sol. Gen. And yet you do confess that Mr. Goodman might come in after dinner before my lord of Aylesbury went, and you not see him?

Sir B. Shower. Ay, but he could not stay there without his seeing him; if he was so often in the room: you do not take Mr. Cock's evidence right.

Att. Gen. You named eight persons that dined at your house: did you know them all personally before that day?

Cock. Yes, my lord, the most of them at least.

Att. Gen. Did they use to meet at your house?

Cock. Commonly sir John Friend did once a week. Mr. Charnock I knew when I was drawn, and so I did sir William Parkyns: The rest I knew by hearing their names.

Att. Gen. Did you know them before that day, Sir, I ask you?

Cock. I had seen captain Porter several times before that day; but I cannot say at my own house.

Sir B. Shower. Do you remember the treaty about the beguhead of white wine?

VOL. XIII.

Cock. Yes, Sir, very well.

Sir B. Shower. Were you by when my lord of Aylesbury went away, and spoke with him about it?

Cock. Yes, I was; and told him, I hoped he would buy the wine still.

Sir B. Shower. Can you be positive that any body was there before my lord of Aylesbury went away, that could stay there any time, and did not dine there?

Cock. I believe not, Sir; for I came in half a dozen times after dinner, and I believe if I had heard Mr. Goodman's name, or seen him there, I should have remembered it; but I did not see any body but those that dined there.

Mr. Camper. Where was you, when my lord of Aylesbury went away? Where did you meet him going away?

Cock. Upon the stairs: seeing my lord of Aylesbury, and my lord Montgomery coming down, I met them.

Mr. Camper. Where did you meet them? At the middle, or the top of the stairs?

Cock. My lord of Aylesbury was at the top of the stairs.

Mr. Camper. Did you meet him just coming out of the room?

Cock. Yes, Sir, I saw the coach that was called for my lord; and so I went up stairs, and met my lord at the top of the stairs coming down.

Sol. Gen. Now, how can you be positive who was in the room when he came out of the room?

Cock. I went up in the room after my lord of Aylesbury went away.

Sol. Gen. How long after my lord of Aylesbury went away?

Cock. It was presently after.

Sol. Gen. How long before my lord of Aylesbury went away had you been in the room?

Cock. I had been there just before.

• Serj. Barnall. Call Thomas Peachy.

[Who appeared, and was sworn.]

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we shall prove that after the plot broke out, and after Mr. Porter had made his discovery, there was no disturbance of Mr. Cook till a good while after Charnock's trial; and Mr. Cook was so far from being sensible, or conscious of any guilt, that he never absconded, but continued for three weeks in his father's house, where he was taken by a messenger. Pray, Mr. Peachy, will you tell my lord and the jury, where Mr. Cook was taken, and when, and by whom?

Peachy. He was taken at his father's house by a messenger, about 7 o'clock in the morning.

Sir B. Shower. What day of the week was it he was taken?

Peachy. Upon a Sunday morning, in his own room, in his father's house, at 7 o'clock in the morning.

Sir B. Shower. Did people come to him as they used to do?

Peachy. Yes; and he went frequently abroad as he went to do, and did never shew of his father's house.
• B

Serj. Darnall. Pray swear Mr. Treggana.

[Which was done.]

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Treggana, pray do you remember how long after the plot broke out did you see Mr. Cook?

Treggana. After Mr. Charnock's trial, a week, he was at my chamber; after the plot broke out, he was concerned in a trial at Winchester assizes, upon an issue out of Chancery, Mr. Nicholls was the clerk in court, and went down to manage it at the assizes; and Mr. Cook came to me a day or two after Winchester assizes was over, and asked me if I had any news from the assizes? This was long after the plot broke out: and I remember particularly, that I saw him twice after the plot was discovered, at my chamber.

Sir B. Shower. Swear Mr. Nicholls. [Which was done.] Sir, pray will you tell my lord and the jury, what you know of Mr. Cook's appearing abroad after the plot was discovered?

Nicholls. I was sent down to the trial: I was present, and did attend at two trials indeed, and I suppose some persons may remember that I attended at two trials at Winchester assizes.

Roman Power. Possibly you might, Sir: I cannot tell of the attendance at the assizes.

Nicholls. And after my return from Winchester assizes, Mr. Cook was with me several days, both at my office and chamber, and at his father's office. And I remember particularly, that he threatened me that I was in trouble when I was at Winchester, and therefore I remember it very well.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Nicholls, you know Mr. Cook very well; pray what are his morals?

Nicholls. Upon occasion of the cause in chancery that went to trial, I have had the knowledge of Mr. Cook five or six years; I always believed him to be as temperate a man as ever I met with: I think in five years time I was not above once with him in a tavern.

Sir B. Shower. Did you ever hear him swear?

Nicholls. No, never; nor vent a curse: I believe he drank as little as any man, and was a modest man. I never heard him speak a foul word.

Sir B. Shower. How do you know that, Sir, that he was so godly a man?

Nicholls. Upon occasion of this cause, I was several times at sir Miles Cook's, and at Mr. Cook's lodgings there, and we were to go about business, and after he was dressed, he has made me stay while he went into his closet and said his prayers. And he told me further, that he never went out of his father's doors without saying his prayers; and I was forced to stay at the door while he performed his devotions, as he told me, and I believe he did.

Serj. Darnall. Now, my lord, we will call upon other witnesses to prove his great affection to his country; how he constantly desired access to the fleet, and to the army.

Sir B. Shower. So that really he had not aversion to it. Swear Mr. Hammond.

[Which was done.]

Serj. Darnall. May, Sir, will you give an account what you know of the prisoner, concerning his judgment, and concerning his morals?

Hamond. I have been for some time acquainted with Mr. Cook, the prisoner at the bar, and to the best of my observation, I always took him to be a conscientious man, and I have heard him declare great detestation of a French force: and three or four days before he was taken into custody, I asked him what he heard of intelligence? He told me what was in the public prints, and heard no more, and knew no more; and he had a great abhorrence of the conspiracy, and thought it a very monstrous thing. I never heard him speak a disrespectful word of the king's person or government in my life. And I say again, I have heard him several times declare, in common conversation, that he had an aversion to French power, and he had a dread of it.

Serj. Darnall. What have you heard him say about our fleet, or army?

Hamond. My lord, I have heard him very much wish prosperity and success to our fleet.

Just. Roloby. What fleet, pray, Sir?

Hamond. To our fleet, king William's fleet against the French. Things to this purpose he frequently said.

Serj. Darnall. Then swear Mrs. Hunt [Which was done; but she was not examined.]

Sir B. Shower. My lord, we leave it here. But I must beg the favour, that if they give any new evidence, and there be occasion, we may have liberty to answer it. And I have an observation or two to make when the evidence is over.

Att. Gen. My lord, if they have done with their evidence, I beg leave to observe, that there is something arises upon that evidence that will give occasion to call a witness or two more. My lord, the first witness which they called was Edwards, and he is in custody upon suspicion of high-treason in Newgate, and he gives an account of some discourse that he had with Mr. Goodman; and for that, it will be necessary for us to call Mr. Paster again and Mr. De la Rue, to shew that this Edwards, the witness, as he is committed for suspicion of high-treason, so he was in the conspiracy for the assassination; he was one in the list that was brought back by Crumbe from Mr. Charnock to captain Porter, as one of Charnock's men, and he is in custody for it. Then as to the other matter, they have called three witnesses to prove, that Mr. Goodman was not in this place at this time. The counsel indeed opened it, that he was not at the court till after my lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery were gone away; but their evidone your father. That he was not there at all: and the master of the house says, he was not there to his knowledge at any time. So that if their evidence prove any thing, they prove that he was not there at all; they do not remember that they saw him there: so that the question will be, whether Mr. Goodman was there at that time? And it will be necessary to call Mr. Goodman again, and Mr. Porter, to confront these witnesses, who will tell you when he came in: and particularly as to my lord of Aylesbury, that he went with him to the stairs-head, and my lord would not let him go further, but he went back again when my lord of Aylesbury went down stairs. We will begin with the witnesses, as to this Edwards. Swear Mr. De la Rue.

[Which was done.]

Mr. Congers. Mr. De la Rue, Pray do you know Mr. Edwards that was here?

De la Rue. He goes by several names; I know him by the name of Douglas; and last Monday I came into the Press-yard, and saluted him by the name of Douglas, and he said he had taken his own name again, by which he was known at St. Germaine, and that was Edwards or Richards, as I remember, or some such name.

Mr. Congers. When was he at St. Germaine?

De la Rue. About three or four years ago.

Mr. Congers. Pray look upon him, see if you know him.

De la Rue. I know him very well, there he stands, that is the person in the black wig; he was reputed at St. Germaine to be my late lord Dundee's chaplain.

Att. Gen. What name did he go by at St. Germaine?

De la Rue. I cannot very well tell: but he said he had taken his own name again; and I think he said it was Edwards or Richards.

Mr. Congers. Did he go formerly by the name of Douglas?

De la Rue. Yes, here in England: Mr. Porter knew him to go by that name.

Att. Gen. What else do you know of him?

De la Rue. The list that Mr. Cranborne carried from Mr. Porter to Mr. Charcock, and which he brought back again from Mr. Charcock to Mr. Porter, had in it, among the other names, the name of Douglas, which I understood to be that gentleman.

Att. Gen. Did he go by that name at that time?—De la Rue. Yes, he did.

E. C. J. Freby. Pray repeat that again, Sir, that we may understand it, and see whether it be evidence.

De la Rue. Why, Sir, the list that Mr. Cranborne brought from Mr. Charcock to Mr. Porter, at the foot of the list which Mr. Porter had sent to him, there were other names written, as I believe, in Mr. Charcock's hand; and among those names there was the name of Douglas, which I understood to be this Mr. Edwards, as he calls himself. And moreover, when Mr. Porter went out of town, going to Dundee's Chambers I called so Mr. Charcock's, and he had a great deal of company with him, four or five troopers, and among the rest was Edwards or Douglas was there standing by him. Here is a gentleman that I was upon the bench, I think he is a Scotchman, that knew him at St. Germaine as well as I. I think his name is Macdonnel.

Just. Robtly. What countryman did you take this Edwards to be?

De la Rue. A Scotchman, and chaplain to my lord Dundee that was killed in Scotland.

Berj. Dornell. Did you see this gentleman in France, Sir?

Macdonnel. I never was in France in my life.

Att. Gen. You cannot ask him the question: you know it tends to make him either accuse or excuse himself of a crime. Pray, call Mr. Porter again. But in the mean time, till he comes, we will examine Mr. Goodman, because he is here. Mr. Goodman, you were by, and heard what these drawers said concerning your being at the Old-King's-Head in Leadenhall-street that day. Pray, give an account when you came in, whether you saw my lord of Aylesbury, and what passed between you as my lord of Aylesbury's going away?

Goodman. Mr. Porter brought me up; and when I came in they were all sitting; and after salutation I sat down: and when they had consulted some time, they came to a resolution, as I have told you already. The teltows are so far in the right of it, that my lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away first; for I took my leave of them at the head of the stairs. Says my lord of Aylesbury to me, Pray avoid ceremony, we will go away privately as we came, in a hackney-coach. And as to the master of the house, who says, he does not know me, I have dined several times there; four or five times with sir John Friend; and one particular day above all the rest, I remember I was met well, and I went down stairs to the bar, and said, I pray, can you get me a little brandy? He said, Yes; he would help me to some of the best in England. And he brought me up some which I liked very well; and thinking he had a quantity of it, I asked him what I should give him a gallon for a parcel. But he said, he had but a little: and I am sure he has seen me there five or six times.

Att. Gen. Then set up that master of the house, Cock, again, (which was done). Come, Sir, you hear what Mr. Goodman has sworn, and mind it; you are upon your oath. You said just now, that you never saw Mr. Goodman before.

Cock. No, upon my word, Sir, I do not know that ever I saw him before.

Att. Gen. Do you remember nothing of his being with sir John Friend at your house?

Cock. No, upon my word, Sir.

Att. Gen. Nay, you are upon your oath. Nor do you know nothing of your giving of him brandy?

Cock. No, upon my oath, I do not remember any such thing.

Att. Gen. That is a very safe way of proceeding.

Mr. Coopers. He remembers the particular time when he was sick, and you offered to sell him some brandy.

Att. Gen. No, he asked him what he should give him for it a gallon. But, Mr. Cook, did you ever see Goodman in your house since my lord of Aylesbury and they were there?

Cook. No, upon my word, Sir, I did not; and I never had but two gallons of brandy in my house at a time; and I never had any cash, or anything of that nature, to sell any out of.

Att. Gen. Who used to be with Mr. John Friend at your house?

Cook. There used to be Mr. Richardson, and Justice Cash; and Colonel Cook.

Goodman. Mr. Richardson was there that day; I could almost have remembered the particular day, but I cannot be positive; only we were in the same room where the consultation was at the further part of the room.

Att. Gen. You friend, the master of the house, you hear what Mr. Goodman says: he says he was with Mr. John Friend at your house, and being not well, he asked for some brandy, and you told him, you would give him some of the best in England. And he proposed to you then to sell him some of it; but it seems there was no bargain made: Do you remember any such thing of one that was with Mr. John Friend, that spoke of buying of brandy when he was sick?

Cook. No, upon my word, I do not.

Att. Gen. Then set up Mr. Porter, (who stood up). Pray, Mr. Porter, look upon that man in the black peruke; what name did he use to go by?

Porter. He used to go by the name of Edward.

Att. Gen. Had he any other name?

Porter. Yes, Douglas.

Att. Gen. He has so many names, that we do not know which is his true name. Mr. Porter, pray what else do you know of him touching his being concerned in the conspiracy?

Porter. I know not any thing of my own knowledge; but his name was put down in the List that Mr. Charnock sent me of his men, and Mr. De la Rue read his name there.

Sir Geo. Mr. Porter, you were a witness upon the trial of Mr. John Friend, and Mr. Wm. Beckins; did you give evidence that Mr. Goodman was in the room at the same time when the consultation was?

Porter. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Well, you hear that these people have sworn, that Mr. Goodman did not come till my lord of Aylesbury went away; say in fact, that he was not there at all.

Porter. My lord, upon my oath, he was there before my lord of Aylesbury went away, and Mr. Goodman followed, and took leave of my lord, and went out of them.

Att. Gen. What time did my lord go in a stage-coach away?

Porter. It was about one hour and a half or two hours after dinner; and this was in the room where my lord went away, for he took his leave of him at that dinner.

Mr. Gwynne asks you whether the statement of Mr. Goodman sitting in the stage-coach is true. Mr. Goodman went up his name to me, and I told the company, and testified for him, that he was a very honest man, and much in King James's interest; and then with their consent I went down and brought him up.

Just. Bant. How long time do you think there was between Mr. Goodman's coming in, and my lord of Aylesbury's going away?

Porter. I cannot tell that, I do not remember exactly how long it was.

Just. Powell. Was it a quarter of an hour, or half an hour?

Porter. A great deal longer; for we had discovered of the whole business after Mr. Goodman came into the room.

Mr. Coopers. How long were they there after Mr. Goodman came in?

Porter. It was very near two hours after he came in, before they went away; they did not go away till six o'clock, and he came in at four, as near as I can remember.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we have done.

Sir B. Shower. Then I beg the favour of a word or two, my lord. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of course in this case for the prisoner at the bar, and I must beg your lordship's patience, and your favour, gentlemen, to make a few observations upon the evidence that has been given; for we humbly insist upon it in point of law, that here is not sufficient evidence before you to convict the prisoner. You are, gentlemen, to have respect and regard to your consciences and the oaths which you have now taken to give a verdict; and make true deliverance between the king and the prisoner; you are not to go according to your own private opinions, nor according to public fame, nor according to common report, nor according to the verdicts in other cases, nor according to the confessions or dying speeches of criminals who have been executed, whether made by themselves, or by others for them; but you are to go by the testimony of credible witnesses; and if you have not the evidence of two credible witnesses before you, my lords, the judges will inform you how the law stands. That by the statute of Edward the 6th, and the new statute for trials of treasons, there must be two witnesses to prove the prisoner guilty of the overt act of the treason, that is laid in the indictment; and whether there have been two credible witnesses produced before you, in the question that you are to consider upon your oath and conscience; that is, whether you are satisfied here by two such as the law requires. The question is not merely whether Mr. Cook be guilty, but whether in your consciences he be legally proved guilty; whether there be evidence to satisfy your consciences, according to the laws of the land that he is guilty; and we insist there is not; and therefore I beg have to expiate what has been sworn against him, that we say the law for it reaches, and wherein it is defective.

Gentlemen, Mr. Porter here swears; that about the beginning or middle of May, he cannot tell which, there was this meeting at the Old King's Head Tavern in London Wall street; in which, I would observe to you; that he concludes himself to a certain month; the reason is very plain; and therefore I asked him whether it was not in April; for if he had said it had been then, there had been the danger to the prisoner, because of the act of indemnity, therefore he was careful to fix it in May; and he would not lay it in June, for the tenth of June is a famous day; and then, or soon after, Newgate had him; he was confined there for a riot on that day, and so they have restrained it to a month, and the only month that he is capable of swearing to, as to any act done the last year till they came in January to the assassination plot, which the prisoner is not accused to have had any concern in; but it should seem he cannot tell what day of the week, or of the month, but about the beginning or the middle of May eight persons dined at this place, and then after dinner Mr. Goodman came in, and they discoursed about this matter.

First, gentlemen, we insist upon it, that it is very improbable that English Protestants of pious conversation and good morals should agree, as he says, to send such a message to the late king, to invite over a French Popish force; we may easily see the horrid and mischievous consequences that would have followed, such as must affect every Englishman with a concern, so that it is improbable a man of virtue and piety could engage in such an enterprise; and if it be improbable, you will never believe it, unless the conviction or proof be irresistible: and if you have any other reasons to distrust this man's truth, then we hope you will go upon the side of probability; and not let popular prejudice, common fame, or any thing else but legal and undeniable evidence have the ascendancy over you. If you are not satisfied that Mr. Cook did assent (as from the character of the man it is not probable he should) to send Charasack into France, to persuade king Lewis and king James to send ten thousand men to invade our country, then he is not guilty.

In the next place, gentlemen, he is not guilty we say in the eye of the law, if they have not two witnesses; and for that we say you have but one that is to be believed; and if you have but one that is to be believed, that in law is but one, and consequently my client is not guilty; so the king's counsel agree, that if there be but one witness, he cannot be convicted, the law is plain in this case. Now to make it out that there is but one witness at most, we have offered your several objections, and made them not by evidence, against the testimony of Mr. Goodman; that he is not a person fit to be believed; and if he be out of the case, then does Mr. Porter stand alone, and all will amount but to one witness, suppose it should be granted that his testimony were true.

First, we have read a record of conviction against him, of a crime, one of the greatest next unto treason, that is known in our or any other law. That he hired a man to poison two dukes, branches of a noble family, to which he had such great obligations, as all mankind do know, and he himself cannot but acknowledge; and if there were not that aggravation in it, of his obligations to that family, yet to lie in wait to murder and poison, is such an offence as any age can seldom show the like. And the objection is not so very easily answered as they would have it; nor can it be so soon passed over as they think, by saying he is a witness of a confederacy with which the prisoner is accused, a crime greater than the thing objected. It is true, none can bear testimony in such a business but he that is a party: But, we say, if these persons who come and set up themselves for witnesses, were not probi Homines, and did not appear to be persons of indifferent credit between man and man, and did not stand impartial in the eye of the world in other respects before, then they are not to be believed, as to what they charge themselves and others to be guilty of. Now, if Mr. Goodman stand convicted of such an offence as this that is alleged against him, though he is pardoned by the act of parliament, or satisfaction acknowledged upon the record, though it be even the very next term, yet that does not purge him from the infamy and disgrace, or from the imputation of being concerned in so villainous a design. It is impossible that he should be a good witness that would be engaged in such a matter, especially when we have these various witnesses, and such a concurring testimony, that what he has sworn is absolutely false.

Gentlemen, if there were nothing but his own testimony in the case, there would be no question at all in it: And as to capt. Porter's testimony about his being there, we have produced three witnesses, who, if they be of credit, then Mr. Goodman is not to be believed; but is falsified throughout; for it is not the question, whether Mr. Cook went away before the consultation and the resolution; for if my lord of Aylesbury or my lord Montgomery went away, Mr. Goodman is falsified in that; and consequently you ought not to believe him in the rest; for he actually swears, that my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, and those other gentlemen, were all present, and at the consult, and did consent and agree to the Resolution, by using these words; Yes, you may; Yes, you may. Now, we say, there are three witnesses that swear, That my lord of Aylesbury was gone before he came there. I do not care whether he came there or not; that is not material: For if there were nobody there when my lord of Aylesbury was there but those that were at dinner, then Mr. Goodman was not there at any such consultation, as they would insinuate was at that time, in that place, and that company.

My lord, we have asked of you, Mr. Cook, oath and declaration, which we think ought to be a great way in satisfaction of his majesty; at least to induce you to the favourable side; for, gentlemen, you are not brought hither to convict a man, but to try and condemn him; and it is your duty to acquit as well as convict, according to the evidence given: It is your duty to go according to your conscience, and to declare whether he be guilty or not guilty, upon the evidence you have before you. You are to examine the facts of the fact in all its circumstances; and upon your own conscience to declare whether he is guilty or not guilty: now we propose it to you, and submit it to your conscience, that here are three witnesses that speak upon their oaths, against whom there is no objection that ever they were guilty of lying in wait to poison any body, nor in any plot for assassination; nor any conspiracy for inducing an invasion from France; nor any other objection against them but they stand upright in the face of the world, and they thrust swear, That he was not there at that time. The answer, that we expect, is, That he might be there, and they got near him; and because it was possible he might be there, and they not see him, therefore it is no evidence that it is so: that's no objection; for you will take it as the nature of the thing will afford, be no better evidence than this; that they and the matter itself allow. Now there can want in and out occasionally; the drawers, and the master of the house fire or six times himself, were in the room, and they say, there was no such person there. Why then it is very improbable, if not impossible, that any such man should be there. The one swears, he came down from my lord of Aylshury just before he went away; and another says, he followed him out of the room; and the master says, that he met my lord of Aylshury at the stairs head. All which falsifies Mr. Goodman in that particular, that he was with my lord of Aylshury at the stairs head, when he went away. These are incompatible; and if we falsify him in any one thing, he is not to be believed in any other.

Then, gentlemen, we offer to your consideration as answer to another objection. They say these witnesses seem to swear, that he was not there at all. We are not concerned whether he was there afterwards; or not: If you are satisfied, that he was not there, at our witness swear, while my lord of Aylshury was there, that's enough. But then they make an objection, How comes the master of the house to remember my lord of Aylshury's going away, more than any body else? Our answer, you know the nature of the thing shows, not only that it was more probable the master of the house should make his observation near the time of death, rather than after death at night, when there is more hurry; but also more probable he should take notice of a fact the quality of the person, from the discrepancy had with him about the witness time, when was a good method to refresh a witness's memory, by being present in his own trade, and that might make him call it to mind.

Therefore, gentlemen, we think these three witnesses stand free and clear in their oaths; and being so, are inconsistent with Mr. Goodman's testimony; and we hope in favour of life the credit inclines on their side, especially when the question is, whether a man shall be executed for treason, who ever fled for it, who was never charged with any treason or treasonable practices before; say not as much as with any particular crime or immorality. And whether three witnesses shall be believed against whom there is no objection, rather than two, against one of which there are such objections.

My lord, we are not now debating or attacking the evidence of the plot, or arraigning the former judgments against the conspirators that have suffered; but, gentlemen, we are putting you upon a serious enquiry, (as God and your own conscience shall incline you) whether our client be guilty or not guilty upon this evidence; that is, whether Mr. Goodman swears true, or not. We hope that we have given you sufficient satisfaction, that upon Mr. Goodman's part the evidence is insufficient; and we hope you will accordingly find our client not guilty.

Att. Gen. If Mr. Cook have any thing to say himself, I desire he may say it now, before we begin.

Sir B. Shower. No, pray go on, Sir.

L. C. J. Ivelly. Mr. Cook, would you say any thing yourself, before the king's counsel are up?

Cook. The little I have to say, my lord, I will speak now, or by and bye which you please.

L. C. J. Ivelly. You must do it now, because after they have summed up, there is nothing more to be said by you.

Cook. My lord, I thank God, I have lived a life, I hope, as good as any man, and have often received the blessed sacrament; I have done it constantly, and shall do it speedily, by the grace of God; as soon as I can have a minister come to administer it to me. I did offer it to my own father, when he came to me, and told me, If I would confess this thing I should not come to trial: I told my father, I would not for ten thousand worlds take away the blood of an innocent man to save mine. I thank God, I am in a very good way to die; I have, for at least this last year, frequently received the blessed sacrament; and how I have lived, every body in the court that knows me can tell, my life and conversation has been as regular as any man's, and I am as ready to die to-morrow, if execution was for it. (I thank God) as any man; I will receive the blessed sacrament upon it; and it is not for life that I would do any thing that is wrong or unjust: I do love my nation, and I love the quiet of the nation; I never was for disturbing the government that now is; and I ever was against foreign wars or an invasion, for I never thought of me, or heart of it, but with all reverence and devotion to God, I solemnly testify, I should be sorry to disappoint Mr. Porter's evidence; because I would have every body that was concerned in that horrid and barbarous crime to suffer in God's name, but then all suffer. I thank God, I never knew any thing of it, nor of a French assassin; and I would not care if I did, but that I should not hurt Mr. Porter's evidence, whose discovery of that bloody business has done so much service. As for Mr. Goodman, as I hope to receive the blessed sacrament, and may testify when I do it, if I speak an untruth, I would not for any thing, no, not for the good of my country, have innocent blood spilt; I would lay down my life to save my country; but I would not have my blood be lightly lost; and how little a man would I be, my blood will lie as heavy upon the nation as any the weightiest man's can do. I do not doubt your lordship's justice; nor the jury's; but I say, my lord, observe, though it seemed not to be things at the bar, yet do not make this denial as of course, but out of truth; and I do assure you, in the presence of the whole court, if I should suffer for this, I must at my last moments either confess or deny something: and, I say, I do assure, in the presence of the whole court, and I will take the blessed sacrament upon it, that I must, at my death, deny this whole matter, and that ever I did see Mr. Goodman at all there. I do not think I saw him: I do not remember I saw Mr. Goodman at all, except once in Germain-street, when the coach broke, and that must be but in passing by; neither, and he would have hurt or killed the coachman, and was kept him from it; and I walked with him half the length of Germain-street, before I knew who Mr. Goodman was. If ever a one of these gentlemen, that are men of credit and honour, can say I was any ways so inclined, or that they ever saw me, or knew me, that I ever bought a pistol or a blunderbuss, or the like, may God smite and strike me dead; and the blessed sacrament which I intend to receive be my curse and damnation, if I know of king James's coming, till after the whole town rang of it: I had no hand in the invasion; and, besides my abhorrence of introducing foreign force, I desire your lordship and the jury to consider the circumstances of my case, that I had but a very small allowance from my father, and therefore it is not probable I should take upon me to join with my lord of Aylesbury, and my lord Montgomery, and these other gentlemen to send Mr. Charneck into France to raise a foreign force; and I call God to witness I did not hand in it. I beg your lordship's pardon for all this trouble; I would not hurt Mr. Porter's evidence, for the reason that I have told you; but this is for my life, and I do not so much value that as I do truth and honesty; and I shall receive the blessed sacrament, if I die, that I never did do so. Indeed, never did take the oath, nor did I ever swear them, because they were never offered me; but I would make the oath now if they were offered me. My lord, I beg your pardon for this trouble.

L. C. J. Treby. Have you done, Sir? Have you said all you would say?

Good. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Treby. Then, you gentlemen of the king's council, will you conclude?

Sol. Gen. May it please your lordship and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this case for the king, and I could have been very glad this gentleman's defence that he has made had been stronger than is truth it has been; and I should have been very glad too, that his counsel had been able to have made it better for him; but that he and they may be satisfied, as much is done as the case will bear; they have had all the liberty in the world to make his defence they could desire, nay, more than in strictness could be allowed them.

Gentlemen, our evidence is very positive against the prisoner at the bar, and for the highest crime that the king's subjects can be guilty of, by the confession of the gentleman himself and of his counsel. We have, I say, two positive witnesses against him; they say they are not legal ones: I must own, if we have not two witnesses, we have never an one; for whatsoever falsifies Mr. Goodman's testimony, falsifies whatsoever Mr. Porter has sworn. Now, the evidence that Mr. Porter has given against him is this: he says, there was to be a meeting at the King's head-tavern in Lunden-hall-street, and there they consulted of the methods to bring back king James hither; and it was thought the best way to send to king James to invite the French king to send 1,000 horse, 1,000 dragons, and 2,000 foot, to land here in this kingdom, where they would meet him with 6,000 horse. They phoned upon a very proper messenger, Mr. Charneck, a person that has been attainted, and has suffered for high-treason; he was to be sent into France upon this errand; Mr. Cock, the prisoner at the bar, was one of the persons that were there at that time, and he was consenting to this message; and Mr. Porter gives you a particular token relating to the prisoner, for he remembers the prisoner did kneel upon the chair, and leaned his elbows upon the table when he consented.

Mr. Porter goes further, and tells you, that Mr. Charneck would have another meeting, to know and see whether all the company were of the same mind they had been; and, that afterwards they met at Mrs. Montjoy's house, and there the prisoner at the bar was present, and consenting to the same thing; thereupon Mr. Charneck went into France, and came back again, and said the French king could not spare so much force. Mr. Goodman gives the same evidence that Mr. Porter had given: It's true, he was not at Mrs. Montjoy's tavern; but he tells you withal, he spoke with Mr. Charneck when he came back from France, and Charneck returned him the same answer he did to Mr. Porter, that the French king not that they pursued this consultation, and came to a resolution to send Mr. Charnock into France, and the message was agreed upon which he should carry; and he was to go to the late king, and solicit him to obtain 10,000 soldiers from the French king, whereof 8,000 should be foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoon. These were to make up the 10,000 men to invade this kingdom. And they resolved also, when this force should land, they should meet and assist this invasion with a joint force, that should consist of 2,000 horse. And to accompany and assure him of this, was the message. But, he says, that Mr. Charnock was very cautious in it, and would not presently go upon this errand, but he would have further assurance that they were in earnest, and would make good what they did send him to propose, therefore he would have a second meeting; and a second meeting was had, and that was at Mrs. Montague's tavern, and there they did renew the same resolution; and there were present my lord of Aylesbury, sir William Parkyns, sir John Fenwick, sir John Friend, Mr. Charnock, the prisoner at the bar, and himself; he does not know or remember whether my lord Montagu was there. Mr. Goodman was there. He says, Mr. Charnock did accordingly go into France; and he did return and bring back king James's thanks to them, but their desire could not be complied with; and he had his share of the compliments.

Now comes Mr. Goodman, and he says, That about the same time, viz. Mid-May, Mr. Porter acquainted him, there would be a meeting of some of king James's friends, at this house in Leadenhall-street. He says, That he did tell Mr. Porter, he doubted he should not be there at dinner, but he would come as soon as he could after dinner; and according to appointment, he did come after dinner, and there was this consultation and resolution that Mr. Porter speaks of, and says, that Mr. Charnock afterwards told him, he had been in France with the late king, and brought back the same answer that Mr. Porter speaks of; and he had the honour of thanks from the late king &c.

Gentlemen, I must observe one thing to you, which does go very much towards the confirming what these witnesses say, and that is the agreement in their testimonies, though they were examined apart at the desire of the prisoner: You will find they agree in these several circumstances, in the time, that it was this time twelve months; in the place, that it was at this tavern; in the number of persons that were there, which was eight before Mr. Goodman came in; in the number of horse, foot, and dragoon that were to be brought into France, and in those words that were to meet them here; and besides, in those words of assurance upon the consultation and the resolution. And there is one circumstance more to which they do agree, and which is very particular. This was when they came to deliver their answer to the message that Mr. Charnock was to carry, which was, and Mr. Cook the prisoner did stand upon the chair, and looked upon the table. And this both of them do agree in. And after all this many questions asked in their separate examinations, I do not find they disagree in any part of their evidence. So that, gentlemen, there can remain no question now, but whether these two witnesses are men of credit? or, whether there has been exposed to them any such evidence as will make you believe, that (if not both) at least one of them has foresworn himself? They do produce nothing against Mr. Porter, whatsoever may have been produced at former trials against his credit: Perhaps what has been before has satisfied the objectors; and there is nothing against his credit; but he is not only a competent, but a very clear, good, credible, and undoubted witness.

But against Mr. Goodman they offer several things, which they say amount to a violent presumption that he is not to be looked upon as a credible witness: And first, they produce a record of a conviction upon an information against him, for attempting to poison two noble dukes: This he was convicted of, and fined 1,000*l.* and ordered to find sureties for his good behaviour during his life. But to this it is answered, that it appears in the same record, that satisfaction was acknowledged of the 1,000*l.* and all the rest of the judgment the very next term, and he was forthwith discharged, and that without paying the money, which (it was observed) the prisoner's counsel said Mr. Goodman was not able to pay at that time, no more than he could 20,000*l.* and thereupon the king's counsel say, that the government was convinced that he was wronged by a careless prosecution, and the evidence against him was found not to be credible. And besides, Mr. Goodman stands pardoned by several acts of pardons, as well as other subjects.

Then they produce one Edwards, who is a prisoner here, and committed for suspicion of high-treason, and for treasonable practices: he is, no doubt of it, a witness for all that: for that is but an accusation upon him, and does not take away his credit. He tells you of a discourse that he had with Mr. Goodman, and that Goodman asked him when the prisoner was to be tried; and he told him he would be tried such a day; and when it was asked what it was for, it was answered, Not for the assassination; but for sending Mr. Charnock into France. He asked then who were the witnesses against him? Mr. Goodman said, Mr. Porter and himself. And further said, that he understood that Mr. Cook had sworn against him (though he would give no account of anybody else) and had no pardon, and either he must hang, or himself. And then he talked lightly of the business of hanging, and said it was a foolish thing to be hanged, for all that people would say was, that such an one hanged himself, or died bravely. This indeed has sort of discountenance if Mr. Goodman did apprehend himself in danger from Mr. Cook's evidence; and yet I cannot see that it does at all satisfy the evidence of Mr. Goodman; he may be a true witness, and yet he might say he was to give evidence against Mr. Cock, which was in Mr. Cock's power to give evidence against him, and that truly; and if both were in the guilt, they were in danger of one another. But for a further answer, the king's counsel have produced Mr. De la Rue, who says, that he knew Mr. Edwards, and that he was a Scotchman, and reputed chaplain to the viscount of Dundee; that he went formerly by the name of Douglas, and by that name he was set down and described in the list that Mr. Charnock sent to captain Porter; and to that name he answered in the Press-Yard lately. Now it is certain, that Mr. Charnock's putting of his name in that list, is no evidence of his being guilty in Mr. Charnock's treason. But his going by two names doth justly lay him under some suspicion. But the evidence that the prisoner seems to rely upon most, is what evidence has been produced against Mr. Goodman in that point of fact, by the master and the two drawers; the first of the drawers name was Crawford, and he does tell you, that about twelve months ago there was this company at dinner there: my lord of Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Freind, sir John Fenwick, sir William Parkyns, captain Porter, Mr. Charnock, and the prisoner, though he did not then know his name, or the name of one or two more of them. I observe, by the way, that his testimony so far does verify theirs, that there were eight of them there, but he says he did not see Mr. Goodman there, nor any but those that dined there. And my lord of Aylesbury went away, as he thinks about four o'clock. He cannot say that the prisoner was there, or was gone at that time before Mr. Goodman came in; for he did not see Mr. Goodman there at all, he was not in the room all the time, but he was to and fro attending till my lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away in a coach that was called, and when they were gone, the rest of the company staid there a good while; being urged to tell how long, at last he said it was dark; and that agrees with Mr. Porter, who says, it was about nine o'clock when they went away. He says he was there once or twice after my lord of Aylesbury went away, but he never saw Mr. Goodman that he remembers at all, till last Saturday, in all his life. As to this, the king's counsel say, that it is only a negative evidence, and in which a man cannot be absolutely positive, but can only speak according to his observation and memory, which might not be perfect, and Mr. Goodman might be there in the mean time of his going in and out: that is possible; and so it must be left to you to consider of it.

Then there is Huntley the other drawer, and he says my lord of Aylesbury went away about that time, and that he did not see Mr. Goodman there at all, nor ever in his life till now; neither does he remember that any body came to them after dinner, and if any fresh man had then come in, he thinks he should (going often in to them) have known him; and says, that he attended this company only: and he had seen sir John Freind and sir William Parkyns there before.

Then Mr. Cock, the master of the house, was produced, and he names all the eight persons that did dine there; and so far he confirms the king's evidence: he thinks that my lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away privately (as it seems they had come) in a hackney-coach, and that it was about four o'clock; and he says, he did not see Mr. Goodman there, and he does not know that he ever saw him till now; but when he was cross-examined by the king's counsel, he does acknowledge that he might possibly come in after dinner, and before my lord of Aylesbury went away, and he not see him, because he was not there all the time; he says, sir John Freind used to dine at his house, and came to his house once a-week; and he had seen some of the rest, but they did not frequent his house as sir John Freind did: he says, the company dined about two o'clock, and the last of them staid till about eight or nine, and that the door was shut as is usual when company is in a room, but nobody was forbid to come there.

But to establish the credit of the evidence on the king's part, they did produce Mr. Goodman and Mr. Porter again: Mr. Goodman does acknowledge so far to be true, that my lord of Aylesbury went away first; but says, that himself was not wholly a stranger to this house, for he had dined there four or five times with sir John Freind; and particularly one time, he being sick, and asking for some brandy, the master of the house said he would help him to some of the best in England, and Mr. Goodman would have bought some of him. But the master seems not to own that, and says, he does not remember any thing of it.

But then comes Mr. Porter again, and he says positively, that Mr. Goodman was there, and that he did speak with the company, and complimented my lord of Aylesbury when he went away, and went part of the way towards the stairs with him; and he does well remember it by this token, that when Mr. Porter was told Mr. Goodman was below, he mentioned him in the company as a trusty man, that was fit for the conversation, and then Mr. Porter went and fetched him up; and Mr. Goodman was there near two hours, and they discoursed all this matter in that time, in the presence of the prisoner and the rest; and he says it was about six o'clock before my lord of Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery went away, and then there was opportunity enough for this discourse and consult that they speak of.

The prisoner has offered another sort of evidence: first, the confidence of his own innocence, that he was abroad three weeks after this conspiracy was discovered; and they have produced Mr. Fregans, Mr. Peachy, and Mr. Nichols, who prove that he never ab-ascended, but was abroad, and appeared openly for three weeks after, till such time as he was taken. Thus the king's counsel say is no proof that he is not guilty, and their evidence untrue. They say he might have a confidence, and the rather because he is not charged with the assassination; for at that time these witnesses speak of, nothing was discovered and public but the assassination; for it was before sir John Freind's trial; and then was the great discovery of the secret of the invasion.

Then he shews farther as to his conversation, that he is a man of a very sober life, never was known to swear, that he drinks but little, and is a godly man, and often says his prayers. And that the king's counsel on the other side tell you, that has been pretended to by other people too; and the question is not about religion, but this fact that you are now to try. Whether he be so religious, or no, as he pretends, or whether he be sincere in his devotion, that is not so much the matter now; but the question is, Whether he has offended in this kind as he stands accused? They produce a gentleman, one Mr. Hamond, and he says that he is a very conscientious man, and particularly is a great lover of his country; and he has often heard him declare a detestation of an invasion by a French force, and wish success to the fleet; but that which he remembers chiefly, was about the time of the discovery of this Plot. The king's counsel answer to this, that a man may use such kind of expressions, perhaps, to cover his guilt; and in the reply to sir Bartholomew Shower's observations, it was taken notice of by Mr. Solicitor, (what we all cannot but remember) that the first evidence was given as to sir John Freind, that he did detect an invasion, and was present at the common prayer when king William was prayed for, and declared against Plots; and that if they caught him in the corn they might put him in the pound. These things a man might say, and it is the lightest evidence that can be given, being discourses out of one's own mouth, who will never proclaim their own guilt; and therefore it is the weakest defence that can be offered. But, gentlemen, you are to consider the other evidence that has been produced by the prisoner, given by several witnesses, and who are upon their oaths now, as well as the king's witnesses. And his counsel say their witnesses, but particularly the three upon whom they chiefly rely, have no objection made out against them, and no man's testimony ought to be presumed to be false. And it must be taken notice of, that they can speak only according to their belief, grounded on their observation and memory; that they did not, so far as they observed, or remember, see Mr. Goodman there, as it was most probable they should if he was there. But it is possible they might mistake a stranger; the rather for that they were not of the company, but in and out, up and down; and Mr. Goodman was not there at dinner, when their attendance was fixed and constant. It might be considered also, that there are several circumstances, some of which seem very pregnant. It is agreed on all hands, that the prisoner dined there with these other seven persons, concerning four of whom we must conclude nothing; but concerning three of them we in this court must take notice, they are attainted of high treason, and so it is evident that the prisoner was for a long time a companion of three traitors, and had a conversation with them. I do not find that he had any occasion to be there; nor any of the rest of the company. Concerning my lord of Aylesbury, indeed, it is said he proposed to treat about a hoghead of white wine. But that seems to be casual, and not the end of his coming, and dining with this company there. But be that how it will, that relates to his lordship alone. But for the others I do not find they do pretend any occasion of meeting there; and therefore it leaves it the more suspicious: and it is the more so, because it was managed so privately and cautiously. They were not attended according to their qualities. The lords went away together in a hackney-coach that was called, as they had come thither in another. The rest thought fit to stay there till it was dark: and as soon as it was so, went away. There was some extraordinary cause for all this. It did import the prisoner to shew that it was for some good cause and purpose.

And further, it is observable that this house was a place which, as the master says, none of this company did use to resort to except sir John Freind; which makes it probable (this being a house that sir John Freind frequented, and none of the others) that he bespoke this place, and brought the rest thither: and if it were so, that makes it more probable that there was such a treason there to be hatched, as is evidenced by the king's witnesses; for you may remember, and it appears by the record in this court, that sir John Freind was indicted and attainted (not for the assassination, but for the treason for which the prisoner is now trying, an invasion that was to be supported with an insurrection. Now if sir John Freind was chiefly acquainted with this house, and brought this company together, it is very probable it was about this business which sir John Freind was so concerned in. And that he is attainted for it, appears upon the record before us; which should be read, but that the prisoner's counsel admit it, and are so far engaged in it, that they won't arraign the verdict; say they did acknowledge that there was a plot: and there was no doubt of it, there was such a plot.

Now then, Gentlemen, here it is certainly proved by these two witnesses (and not gained by the prisoner's own witnesses) that there was such a meeting, and that the prisoner was there; and they both have positively sworn that this treason was committed there. You have heard what has been objected to their credit: they have delivered their testimony upon their oaths, and so, gentlemen, you are upon your oaths; if you are satisfied and can take it upon your consciences, that these two witnesses are, or any one of them is, (if such distinction can possibly be made in this case) then you are to acquit the prisoner; but if you are satisfied, and thank they have sworn true, you are to find him guilty.

Just. Rokeby. Nay, if one be forsworn, both are; for the evidence is indrely in all parts the same; and if Mr. Goodman be perjured, Mr. Porter is so too.

Sir B. Shower. Forsworn and perjured are hard words; we only say mistaken.

Just. Rokeby. Well, that objection goes to one as well as the other.

L. C. J. Treby. It must be so, since they speak of the same joint matter, viz. their being together in company. If Mr. Porter says true, when he swears that Mr. Goodman was there with him and the rest, Mr. Goodman must say true when he swears that he was there with Mr. Porter and the rest. There was one thing that I forgot: sir B. Shower observed, that it might be an invention of captain Porter, because he fixeth it in point of time to the month of May, that he does not say it was in April; for that then it would be within the pardon, which extends to April 29, last year; nor would he lay it in June, for then he was in Newgate, and others of them were dispersed by reason of a riot committed in Drury-lane: and thus sir B. Shower alledges, was a piece of skill and contrivance: but, really, this is a piece of ingenuity in himself: for, besides that the king's witnesses affirm positively that it was in May, and remember it by a certain token, viz. That it was within a very few days after the king went beyond sea, one or two of the prisoner's witnesses (Crawford I am sure) did say that this meeting was this time twelve-month, and you know we are now near mid-May.

Serj. Darnall. If you believe our drawers for part, you must believe them for all.

Att. Gen. No, not so, my lord speaks only where they concur with our evidence. It were strange to expect we should disbelieve or doubt what the witnesses on both sides affirm to be true: but I do not think it would be to the advantage of the prisoner, if what his counsel proposed were agreed to, viz. That the drawers (and their master too) should be believed for all they say, provided equally the king's witnesses should, in like manner, be believed for what they say. For the main thing controverted, is, Whether Mr. Goodman were at this meeting? These witnesses for the prisoner say, they did not see him there; at least they do not remember it. Mr. Porter, and Mr. Goodman himself says, he was there. Now, these things agreed, and admitted, would make a very consistent clear evidence, that Mr. Goodman was there, though the master and drawers did not observe, or do not remember his being there.

[Then an officer was sworn to keep the Jury, who withdrew to consider of their Verdict, and about three quarters of an hour after returned into court.]

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, answer to your names. Henry Sherbrook.

Mr. Sherbrook. Here. And so of the rest, &c.

Cl. of Ar. Are you all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Set Peter Cook to the bar. [Which was done.] Peter Cook, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon the prisoner; how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements had he at the time of the treason committed, or at any time since?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Cl. of Ar. Then hearken to your verdict as the court has recorded it: you say that Peter Cook is guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, but that he had no goods or chattels, lands or tenements at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since to your knowledge; and so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, the court dismisses you, and thanks you for your service. [Then the court adjourned till 5 o'clock in the evening.]

POST MORTEM.

About 6 o'clock, the Court being by proclamation resumed, the prisoner convicted was brought to the bar in order to judgment.

Cl. of Ar. Peter Cook, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Thou stand'st convicted of high-treason, for compassing and imagining the death of his majesty king William the 3^d, and for adhering to the king's enemies: what can'st thou say for thyself, why the court should not give thee judgment to die according to the law?

Cook. My lord mayor, my eyes are very bad, therefore I desire your lordship would be pleased to take this paper, and that it may be read.

Cl. of Ar. Have you any thing to say in arrest of judgment?

Cook. I desire my Paper may be read.

[It was handed up to the court, and then delivered down to Mr. Attorney General, and the king's counsel, but not openly read.]

Recorder. [Sir Salathiel Lovell.] Mr. Cook, the court have read your paper you sent up, and have communicated it to the king's counsel; if you have any thing to move in an arrest of judgment, this is your time, and we will hear you; but as for any representation of your case to any others, that must be considered of afterwards; you are now called to your judgment.

Cook. I did not know that I might offer any thing afterwards; but if your lordships think fit to communicate that to my lord justices, I submit it to you.

Recorder. Mr Cook, there is nothing appony upon this paper that is matter of law, and so not servicable to you now, and therefore what you desire in at the court will consider of afterwards.

Cook. I do not understand the law, my lord, but I have heard the court ought to be of counsel for the prisoner, and I desire I may not suffer by my ignorance.

Recorder. I declare it, for my part, I knew nothing that you can have any advantage of in arrest of judgment; if I did, you should not lose the benefit of it, and you have had your counsel assigned, who have pleaded for you without restraint; and if there had been any matter of law that would have availed you in the arrest of judgment, no doubt they would have laid hold of that advantage for you.

Cook. I cannot tell, my lord, what is matter of law.

Att. Gen. Your lordship observes, they took all the objections that they could to the indictment, but there was none that they could fix.

Cl. of Ar. Then, erier, make proclamation. [Which was done on both sides of the court.]

Errier. O yes. All manner of persons are commanded to keep silence while judgment is being, upon pain of imprisonment.

Cook. My lord, may I have my paper again?

Recorder. If you think it may be any service to you to leave it with the court, you may do so; or if you desire it, you shall have it again.

Cook. I desire your lordship to keep it.

Recorder. I will receive it, and it shall not be buried, I assure you.

Cook. I do not hear what the court says.

Recorder. You say you did not hear what was said to you: if you desire to have your paper again, you shall have it; but if you desire to have it communicated above, the court will consider it, and take care of that too.

Cook. I desire your lordship would do it.

Then the Recorder proceeded to give judgment.

Recorder. Sir Cook, I think it useful to the public, and also at this time to you, to observe, That the reign of the late king James was, throughout, one entire design and project formed; in conjunction with the French king, totally to subvert our religion, laws, and liberties, which grew so apparent to the subjects of all nations, in so many instances of their connivance, managed in such a method, and added so far, that the people of them kingdoms of all qualities, ranks and degrees, did find it absolutely necessary for the preservation of themselves and the neighbouring nations in alliance with us, to pay it out of their prince of Orange, as a person not only nearly allied to this crown, but also impreg in the interest of these kingdoms, and those neighbouring princes and countries that lay exposed to the violence and ambitious insults of France. And the love which that noble prince did bear, not only to us but to our neighbours also, disposed him to embrace that invitation; upon whose arrival here, that predecessor, from motives that were invisible, de-clined the kingdom and the government, and left the people to themselves; whereupon his present majesty was necessarily and rightfully placed upon that throne he so well deserved: And this is now that king, for whose preservation all good people have associated, and spare neither lives nor treasure to support and to continue in the government; and this is that king whom you have traitorously conspired, not only to dethrone, but also to destroy; and this is that people that you would have to swim in blood, and lose their religion, liberty, and property. These matters need a history to relate at large; I only touch them shortly, to move good men to rejoice in their deliverance, and to move you seriously to reflect upon the heinousness of your crime.

Mr. Cook, you are an Englishman, and must needs know, that in this place we frequently condemn to death clippers, coiners, thieves, and robbers, and other such like criminals, and that justly and necessarily too, for the preservation of the innocent, and for the common good. Of what condemnation must you, and such as you, be worthy then, who have so horribly endeavoured and designed the fatal ruin and destruction of your own native country, and to render your fellow-subjects a miserable prey, and at the best to become slaves and vassals to a foreign prince?

Let me also mind you, that nothing is more sure, than that after this, you must receive a judgment in another world; and if that pass against you too, that sentence will be most terrible, and your sufferings without end: And therefore I do advise you to employ the few days you have yet to live in preparation for your future happiness, which cannot be duly done without a full confession of this, as well as other crimes you have been guilty of: I therefore charge it to you as your duty, and leave it with you at your utmost peril, that you honestly and faithfully discover all you know of this inhuman and traitorous conspiracy, and all the persons that you do know to be guilty of it: This will be the greatest service you can do in this world, and will be the best preparatory step that you can take towards a better. And, Sir, there now remains no more for me to say, but to pronounce that sentence on you which the law directs: and that is this:

‘That you, Peter Cook, be taken hence to the place from whence you came, and thence be drawn upon a hurdle to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged by the neck, and cut down before you be dead; that your bowels be taken out, and your privy-

"members cut from your body, and both horns in your right; that your head be cut off, and your body divided into four quarters, which head and quarters are to be at the king's disposal; and God Almighty have mercy upon your soul."

Cook. I beg, if your lordship please, that I may have my relations and friends come to see me, and some wines, the better to prepare me for another world.

Recorder. Mr. Cook, if you will give the names of those that you would have come to you to the officer, care shall be taken in it; and you will not be denied any reasonable helps that may be had for your preparation for eternity.

Att. Gen. It is not fit he should be denied any reasonable help; but in the mean time there is reason for the government to be cautious, upon the account of what has notoriously past in the case of some others.

Recorder. If he give in the names, it will be considered of, and care taken that nothing be done but what is reasonable and safe.

Then the Prisoner was taken from the bar, and the Court proceeded to what was remaining of the business of the sessions.

He was afterwards pardoned, upon condition of transporting himself, and never returning any more to England.

The following Article (undated) is published in Dalrymple's Memoirs, Appendix to part 2, book 7.

Extract of the Examinations and Confessions of Peter Cook, son to sir Miles Cook. He was condemned for the Assassination Plot, but afterwards pardoned:

"He gives an account of his having been in France, several years ago; that he went on my lady Philips her business, but being there, was introduced to king James, and carried over the compliments of several persons to the king; particularly from archbishop Sandewich, lord Ailesbury, lord Montgomery, sir John Fenwick, lord Clarendon, lord Litchfield, lord Huntingdon, lord Weymouth, sir Edward Seymour, and others; he brought back messages to some of them, and was bid to see the marquis of Halifax, as being a man of honour, who received him very civilly; he brought over instructions from king James for the borrowing 6,000*l.* they were directed to lord Ailesbury, lord Litchfield, and lord Bradenell, but they all excused it.

"Mrs. Iron sent him advice of the La Hague business, which he communicated to lord Halifax, whereupon he found him uneasy at his staying longer with him, and told him he knew what he had to do.

"He says at that time, there was a meeting at a tavern in Holborn, where were the lord Bradenell, sir Theophilus Ogathorpe, sir Francis Windham, major George Mathews, Mr. Bruce, colonel Fountaine, one Holmes, and several others: they advised with one another what they should do upon that invasion; it was resolved those who had horses should rendezvous towards Cane wood, and those who had none should get near the Tower, to join with sir John Freind's party. There was a regiment lined with yellow, which they were told they might depend upon."

390. The Trial of ALEXANDER KNIGHTLEY, at the King's-Bench, for High-Treason: 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1696.

THIS day the Keeper of Newgate brought to the bar of the court of King's-bench Alexander Knightley, by virtue of a writ of Habeas Corpus, issuing out of that court for that purpose, to be arraigned upon an indictment of high treason found against him at the sessions of Oyer and Terminer, holden for the county of Middlesex; which indictment by writ of Certiorari was removed into the King's-bench. The return of the Habeas Corpus was delivered, and then the prisoner was arraigned thus:

Cl. of Ar. Alexander Knightley, hold up thy hand. (Which he did). Thou standest indicted by the name of Alexander Knightley, late of the parish of St. Paul Churchwarden, in the county of Middlesex, gent. for that you not having the fear of God in your heart, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, as a false traitor against the most serene, most illustrious, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord William the third, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. your supreme, true, rightful, lawful and undoubted sovereign lord, the cordial love and true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance, which every subject of our said lord the king, that now is, towards him our said lord the king should bear, and of right ought to bear, with drawing, and uttering to sundry, travelling and contriving, and with all your force persuading and designing the government of this Kingdom of England, under his our said lord the king that now is, of right, duty, loyalty, and very well established statutes to subvert, change, and alter, as also the same our lord the king to death and final destruction to put and bring, and his faithful subjects, and the freemen of this kingdom of England, into intolerable and most miserable slavery to Lewis the French king to subdue and inhale; the tenth day of February, in the seventh year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and divers other days and times as well before as after, at the parish of St. Paul Covent Garden aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously you did compass, imagine, and contrive, purpose, design, and intend our said sovereign lord the king that now is to slay, kill, and murder, and a miserable slaughter among the faithful subjects of our said lord the king, throughout this whole kingdom of England, to make and cause; and your said most wicked, most impious, and devilish treasons, and traitorous compassings, contrivances and purposes aforesaid to fulfil, perfect, and bring to effect, you the said Alexander Knightley afterwards, to wit, the same tenth day of February, in the year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, there and elsewhere in the same county, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, secretly, traitorously, and with force and arms, with very many other traitors to the jurors unknown, did meet, propose, treat, consult, consent, and agree him our said lord the king that now is, by lying in wait and deceit, to assassinate, kill, and murder; and that execrable, horrid, and detestable assassination and killing the sooner to execute and perpetrate, afterwards, to wit, the same day and year, and divers other days and times, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously you did treat, propose, and consult with those traitors, of the ways, manner, and means, and the time and place where, when, how, and in what manner, our said sovereign lord the king, so by lying in wait, might be slain and killed; and that you did consent, agree, and assent with the same traitors, that forty men on horseback, or thereabouts, of whom you the said Alexander Knightley were to be one, with guns, muskets, and pistols, charged with gunpowder and leaden bullets, and with swords, rapiers, and other arms armed, should lie in wait and be in ambush, the same our lord the king in his coach being when he should go abroad to attack; and that a certain and competent number of those men so armed, upon the guards of our said lord the king, him then attending, and being with him should set upon, and should fight with them and subdue them, whilst others of the same men so armed, him our said lord the king should assassinate, kill, slay, and murder; and you the said Alexander Knightley, your treasons and all your traitorous intentions, designs, and contrivances aforesaid to execute, perform, fulfil, and bring to effect, afterwards, to wit, the aforesaid tenth day of February, in the seventh year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, at your houses, and very many arms, guns, muskets, rapiers and swords, and other weapons, ammunition, and warlike things, and military instruments, falsely, maliciously, secretly, and traitorously you did obtain, buy, gather together, and procure, and to be bought, obtained, gathered together, and procured, did cause, with that intent to use, employ, and bestow them in and about the detestable, horrid, and execrable assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king that now is, as aforesaid; and the same premises the more safely and surely to execute, do, and perform, you the said Alexander Knightley, with one Edward King, late for high treason, in contriving and conspiring the death of our said lord the king that now is, duly convicted and attainted, by the consent and assent of divers of the traitors and conspirators aforesaid, in the said tenth day of February, in the seventh year aforesaid, traitorously did go and come to the place proposed, where such intended assassination, killing, and murder of our said lord the king, by lying in wait, should be done, performed, and committed, to view, search, and observe the conveniency and fitness of the same place for such lying in wait, assassination, and killing there to be made, performed, and committed; and that place so being seen and observed, afterwards, to wit, the said day and year, your observations thereof to some of the said traitors and conspirators you did relate, and impart, to wit, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, against the duty of your allegiance, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in this case made and provided. How sayest thou, Alexander Knightley, art thou guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Knightley. Not guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, How wilt you be tried?

Knightley. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send you a good deliverance!

Knightley. With submission to your lordship, I did not expect, in this weak condition that I am in, to be brought at this time to the bar; that having taken me off extremely from the application that I should have otherwise made of myself to my defence; but seeing there is no mercy to be had here, I will endeavour to have patience, and undergo my fate as well as I can.

L. C. J. (Holt.) Mr. Knightley, you have no reason to find fault; for when I was acquainted you were ill, and desired a physician, I ordered one to be sent to you; and yesterday in the afternoon you sent word you were so sick, that you could not be brought hither to day; but your doctor was with me last night, and upon discourse with him, I did apprehend you were not so ill, but that, especially considering the weather, you might very safely be brought to the bar to day.

Knightley. The gentlemen that brought me the copy of the indictment found me very ill, and I have been in prison since this day, yesterday night.

L. C. J. Well, now let us see what time we shall appoint for the trial. Att. Gen. (Sir Thomas, never.) When your lordship pleases to appoint.

L. C. J. I think you cannot try it till Wednesday fortnight.

Mr. Clark. That day is from my lord.

Lord J. It being upon a Centenari, the Reure facias must be returnable upon a coming day; and there must be 15 days between the tests and the return.

Att. Gen. May it not be Tuesday, then, that the jury appear?

L. C. J. You cannot have it before Wednesday, for that is the return day.

Mr. Clark. Tuesday fortnight is appointed for the trial between Pride and the earl of Both.

Att. Gen. Then it must be upon Wednesday, for there must be fifteen days between the tests and the return.

L. C. J. Well, take back your prisoner, and bring him here again on Wednesday fortnight; you shall have a rule for it. (Then the prisoner was carried back.)

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1696.

This day being appointed for the trial of the prisoner, he was brought to Westminster Hall, and the jury were called over as soon as the court appeared in the hall, and the defaulters recorded; and about eleven of the clock the prisoner was brought to the bar.

Cl. of the Crown. Alexander Knightley, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Those good men that thou shalt hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and thee, upon the trial of thy life and death: If therefore thou wilt challenge them, or any of them, thy time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

L. C. J. (Mott.) Mr Knightley, I perceive you have a deni: to speak something; let us hear what you have to say.

Knightley. I humbly beg your lordship's leave, that I may speak before the jury be called. What I have to say, I beg I may have your leave to read; because I have a bad memory.

(Heads.) My lord, I hope to save the jury and the witnesses against me a great deal of trouble, and design to take up very little of your lordship's time; but in the first place, I thank myself obliged to thank your lordship for your great indulgence, in granting me so much time between my arraignment and trial; the greatest part of which I have employed to appear before the great tribunal of heaven.

I hope in the face of the world here, that I am assured I cannot hope to be happy hereafter, without a just abhorrence of, and a sincere repentance for that crime for which I have been indicted.

VOL. XIII.

And since confession is an essential part of repentance, I do acknowledge I was to have been concerned in some part of the barbarous assassination, and was unhappily surprised into a consent to act in it, though in my heart I did abhorrate the fact as much as any man living; but under some honourable and fair pretences I was drawn in at first, and then of a sudden became so far engaged, that by a mistaken notion of honour, I thought I could not retreat without the infamy of cowardice.

My lord, I humbly crave your lordship's permission to acquaint you, how that some time since I was brought before some of the lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council, where I do assure your lordship, I did freely own and fully discover my being concerned in that horrid design: and I here openly confess the same, with that sorrow and repentance as becomes a man of honour, and conscience.

My lord, there is one circumstance particular in my case, I most humbly beg leave to insist upon, and urge to your lordship in my behalf; which is, that it was upon my confession (as I conceive) that Mr. Harris, now a principal evidence against me, was first discovered; so that my own confession has been a great means to take away my life.

I expect after a few words now in this excellent court to receive from your lordship the sentence due upon the conviction, from my own mouth, of a crime for which I cannot in modesty hope, so much above my deserts, the king's most gracious pardon; yet the greatness of my offence does not rob me of all thoughts of mercy, whilst I throw myself absolutely and entirely at his majesty's feet for it; and I humbly beg of your lordship as a privy-counsellor, that you would represent my unfortunate case to their excellencies the lords justices of England, as an object of his majesty's favour.

And now, my lord, I shall not detain your lordship and the court any longer, but my next words convict and lay me under the just sentence of death: as to my indictment I beg leave to plead Guilty, and throw myself entirely upon the king's mercy, and do desire my former plea to my indictment may be withdrawn.

Cl. of the Cr. Thou hast been indicted and arraigned of high-treason in compassing and imagining the death and destruction of the king; hast thou then, Alexander Knightley, art thou guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Knightley. Guilty, my lord.

Cl. of the Cr. Art thou content to withdraw thy plea Not Guilty?—Knightley. Yes, Sir.

Cl. of the Cr. Do you plead to the indictment Guilty or Not Guilty?

Knightley. I am Guilty.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we desire, where he relinquishes his plea of not guilty, that you will record his confession; and since he has confessed the indictment, we have nothing more to do but wait the judgment of the court.

...and was an active instrument in the carrying it on, being sent to view the ground on both sides the water, and with others that were sent with you reported your opinion, which was the most convenient place to attack the king and his guards.

And though you did, the last time you were at the bar, urge by way of extenuation of your crime, that you being engaged in the interest of the late king, and thereby supported, you was surprised into this barbarous design, which being proposed to you, you thought yourself obliged in honour to engage in it; which is so far from an extenuation, that it is an high aggravation: for men of honestable principles, though most zealously disposed to the advancement of any particular interest, yet always detest the use of base and vile means. Therefore when the assassination of the king was proposed, you had an opportunity to have retreated with honour, and might have refused to be further concerned; but you rather pursued this wicked enterprise with great zeal.

Monday, May 25, 1696.

This being the last day of the Term, the prisoner was brought from New gate to the King's Bench bar.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, I desire the judgment of the court to be pronounced upon Mr. Knightley upon his conviction.

Cl. of the Cr. Alexander Knightley, hold up thy hand, (which he did). Thou hast been indicted and arraigned for high-treason in compassing and imagining the death of the king, and adhering to the king's enemies; what can'st thou say for thyself, why judgment should not be given against thee to die according to the law?

Knightley. I have nothing more to say, my lord, than what I have said.

Cl. of the Cr. Crier, make proclamation for silence. (Which was done on both sides the court.)

Cyrr. Oyez. Our sovereign lord the king straitly charges and commands all manner of persons to keep silence while judgment is in giving, upon pain of imprisonment.

L. C. J. Mr. Knightley, you are by your own confession convicted of high-treason in designing the murder of the king, and the subversion of the whole state of England, in promoting an invasion from the French, its most ancient and inveterate enemies.

It hath appeared before your arraignment, not only by the evidence that hath been given at former trials, but even by the signs of the times and the manner of some men's actions, that there hath been for some years last past a train of plots and conspiracies against this government; and when the various means which the conspirators did project among themselves for its ruin proved ineffectual, it was at last resolved among some of the conspirators as an expedient to the king, as the most certain way of accomplishing their end.

In which design you were deeply engaged, and was an active instrument in the carrying it on, being sent to view the ground on both sides the water, and with others that were sent with you reported your opinion, which was the most convenient place to attack the king and his guards.

And though you did, the last time you were at the bar, urge by way of extenuation of your crime, that you being engaged in the interest of the late king, and thereby supported, you was surprised into this barbarous design, which being proposed to you, you thought yourself obliged in honour to engage in it; which is so far from an extenuation, that it is an high aggravation: for men of honestable principles, though most zealously disposed to the advancement of any particular interest, yet always detest the use of base and vile means. Therefore when the assassination of the king was proposed, you had an opportunity to have retreated with honour, and might have refused to be further concerned; but you rather pursued this wicked enterprise with great zeal.

And though you are by your profession a Roman Catholic, and may for that reason think that your crime is mitigated, because you acted in the behalf of a prince of your own religion, which you hoped thereby to introduce: notwithstanding all which, your offence is highly aggravated in respect of the ingratitude and folly with which it is attended. For there is no English Papist that is master of any property, but he is interested in the preservation of this government, to which the whole party of them hath been, and still are continually obliged for its moderation and justice; for instead of being exposed to the severity of those laws to which they are obnoxious, they have had the same indulgence in the enjoyment of their religion, and the same protection, and as much benefit in the distribution of the common justice of the realm, as any other of the king's subjects; therefore none of them could ever expect to mend their condition under a French domination. But the contrary is foreseen by all considering men; for the English Papist, as well as Protestant, would have been reduced to a most dismal state, if you had obtained your end.

For it is against all the rules of reason, and the experience of all ages, to imagine, that the French king would spare English Papists more than Protestants; for it is not zeal to religion, or affection to the interest of the late king, that hath excited him to invade England, but it is his pride and ambition to conquer the three kingdoms, and to reduce this to be a province to France: indeed the pretence of restoring the late king, and introducing the Popish religion, may serve to delude some warm and airy zealots to engage in his assistance, who do not consider, that if they should be successful, they would be as certainly destroyed as others, but with more disadvantage to themselves. For after they shall have survived the liberty of their country, have embraced their own hands in their countrymen's blood, they will be at the mercy of their conqueror, who can never think it his interest to treat them; but will despise them for being such villainous traitors to their own country. Nay, rather, these Englishmen, who by their courage and resolution shall endeavour to defend their country, though they should be unfortunately vanquished, will meet with a much better reception, for they will have given assurances that they may be confided in, when the others have by such a wicked treason given a demonstration to the contrary.

There being then nothing to be said that can palliate such a crime as that of which you are convicted; but you having taken a different course the last time you were at the bar from what you took at first, you have relinquished your plea of not guilty, and have confessed the indictment; I wish out of charity to your person, it was as sincere as (I think it) it was prudent in you; for after several convictions of others that were your accomplices, you could not be a stranger to the evidence upon which they were grounded: you must therefore in all probability have expected to have undergone the same fate. If your confession be a real effect of your repentance, you will reap the advantage of it in the next world; but what consequence it will have in this, I cannot say; "For the heart of the king is in the hand of the Almighty, which, as the rivers of water, he turneth whithersoever he will." Live therefore for the time to come in expectation of a speedy death, and prepare yourself to appear before another judgment-seat; to the making of which important preparation I shall dismiss you, first discharging the court of the duty now incumbent upon it, in giving that judgment which the law hath appointed. And the court doth award,

'That you be conveyed from hence to Newgate, the prison from whence you came, and from thence you are to be drawn upon a hurdle to Tyburn; where you are to be hanged by the neck, and while you are alive to be cut down, your privy-members are to be cut off, and your bowels to be cut out of your body, and burnt in your view; your head is to be cut off, and your body is to be divided into four parts, and your head and your quarters are to be disposed where his majesty shall appoint. And I pray God to have mercy upon your soul.'

Knightley. My lord, I am truly sorry for what I have done, and I humbly thank your lordship and the rest of the judges for your favour to me.

Then the prisoner was carried back to Newgate, and afterwards was graciously pardoned.

391. The Proceedings against the Three Nonjuring Clergymen, Mr. COLLIER, Mr. COOK, and Mr. SNATT, for publicly absolving Sir William Parkyns and Sir John Friend at Tyburn: 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.*

THE publicly absolving sir William Perkins and sir John Friend at the place of execution made a great noise at that time. Burnet says, "A very unusual instance of the boldness of the Jacobites appeared upon that occasion: these two had not changed their religion, but still called themselves Protestants; so three of the nonjuring clergymen waited on them to Tyburn; two of them had been oft with Friend, and one of them with Perkins; and all three, at the place of execution, joined to give them public absolution, with an imposition of hands, in the view of all the people: a strain of impudence, that was as new as it was wicked! since these persons died owning the ill designs they had been engaged in, and expressing no sort of repentance for them. So these clergymen, in this solemn absolution, made an open declaration of their allowing and justifying these persons in all they had been concerned in. Two of them were taken up, and censured for this in the King's-bench, the third made his escape." The Account published at that time, by permission of the Sheriffs, is as follows:

An Account of what passed at the Execution of SIR WILLIAM PERKINS, and SIR JOHN FRIEND, at Tyburn, on Friday, April 3, 1696.

The prisoners being drawn in a sledge from Newgate to the place of execution, were permitted to have the assistance of three nonjuring ministers of their own choosing, viz. Mr. COLLIER, Mr. COOK, and Mr. SNATT. Sir William Perkins came first up into the cart, and had some private discourse with one of the ministers.

Sir W. Perkins. When must I deliver my paper to—Minister. When all is over.

Then the Executioner went to put the rope about sir William Perkins's neck.

Sir W. Perkins. May not I pray before it be put on?

Executioner. Yes, sir, if you please.

Then sir John Friend came into the cart; and the three ministers and prisoners all kneeling down, Mr. COOK read some prayers out of the morning-prayer, and the office for visitation.

* See p. 140, of the present volume. Also 3 Mod. 366. Comb. 332.

one of the men, and that the minister, standing by, asked them, Whether they were in company with all the world? and if they had answered any, whether they did ask them forgiveness? And whether they did desire the Absolution of the Church? Upon their answer, that they did, they all laid their hands upon their heads, and Mr. Cook pronounced the Absolution, which ended in these words: "And by his authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, in the name of the Father, &c."

Sir W. Perkins. When are we to deliver our papers?—Minister. Now, if you please.

Sheriff. Take what time you please, Sir, for your devotions, we will wait your leisure.

Then the two prisoners continued in their private prayers, Sir W. Perkins making use of the prayers in the Whole Duty of Man, and Sir John Friend read some prayer out of a written paper; and afterwards, Sir W. Perkins delivered to the sheriffs a paper.

Sheriff. If you require any more time, you shall have it. You say this is your paper?

Sir W. Perkins. Yes, Sir; and I desire you to dispose of it as you think fit.

Sheriff. Have you any thing to say, by way of confession or denial, of the fact for which ye come hither to suffer?

Sir W. Perkins. What I think fit to say, is contained in that paper.

Sheriff. If you desire any more time, you may have it; you shall have your liberty.

Then Sir John Friend held a paper up.

Sheriff. What do you say, Sir John?

Sir J. Friend. Sir, here is a paper, I desire it may be printed; for I came here to die, and not to make a speech; but to die, and to resign myself to God; and I desire it may be printed, for all people to see it. (For both their Speeches, see p. 136 of this volume.) And I have no more to say, but to beg of God to receive my soul; I resign my soul to him.

Sheriff. The Lord have mercy upon you.

Sir J. Friend. I hope the Lord will have mercy on me.

Sheriff. Sir John, if you desire any longer time, you shall have it; we will wait on you with great willingness.

Sir J. Friend. I thank you, Sir. Mr. Sheriff, I desire the cart may not be too hasty to go away, till we give our sign.

Sheriff. You shall have your own time; when your time, communicate your own sign, and the cart shall not go before.

When the ropes were tied about them.

Sir J. Friend. I have no animosity against any man, I do not forget all, and I leave God to do what he will, and I leave my soul to him.

Then the cart was set on.

Sir J. Friend. My Son, had a crown of glory for me, the Lord receive my soul! the Lord receive my soul!

Then the Executioner asked them both if they were ready to go, and they answered, We are ready.

Then the cart was set on, and they were carried to the place of execution.

Executioner. I will receive them. If you please, tell me when I may pull your caps over your eyes.—Friends. When you will.

Sir W. Perkins. (The Lord receive my spirit! Executioner, had I best hold up my legs, or stand in the cart when it goes away?)

Executioner. As is best to stand, Sir, I think.

Sir W. Perkins. But that my feet will hang in the cart.

Executioner. If you please, give me notice when you will have the cart go away.

Sir J. Friend. Stretch forth thy arms, O Lord, and receive my soul, and carry it into heaven, I beseech thee! Executioner, when we knock, go away.

And after a few ejaculations, they gave the sign, and the cart drew away. They both of them gave money to the Executioner; and having hung above half an hour, being a considerable time after they were dead, they were cut down and quartered, according to the sentence.

For this act of theirs, Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt were committed to Newgate, and ordered to be prosecuted by the Attorney General; but Mr. Collier kept out of the way, and was not taken. On this occasion, Mr. Collier published the following Defence of himself:

A DEFENCE OF THE ABSOLUTION GIVEN TO SIR WILLIAM PERKINS AT THE PLACE OF EXECUTION, APRIL 5, 1696.

My being present, and in some measure officiating, at the place of execution on Friday last, has been extremely misunderstood. The Weekly Intelligence, together with the Remarker, have censured this action with a great deal of liberty and heat. I thank God I am not easily disturbed with intemperate language, especially when it is given without occasion. So that if matters had gone no farther, I could have passed over the ill usage, and said nothing. I confess, having received notice that some persons of figure threatened me with imprisonment, I took a little care of myself; and as it happened, not without reason. For on Monday about twelve at night, six or eight persons rushed into my lodgings, broke open a trunk, and seized some papers of value, though perfectly inoffensive and foreign to their purpose. And since, I understood there is a Bill found against me for High Misdemeanors. And now one would think I had done something very extraordinary.

I shall therefore make a brief report of matters of fact, and leave the world to judge, whether all these censures and severities are deserved or not.

Sir William Perkins (whose I had not seen for four or five years last past) after his trial, desired me to come to him, in order to his preparation for another world. I accordingly visited him in Newgate, as I thought myself obliged by any character. I was put in the list of those who had leave to see him by parties order, and had the last two days the liberty of conversing with him in private. Afterwards I was not permitted to speak or pray with him alone, a keeper being always present. At last even this permission was recalled, inasmuch that I could never see him from Wednesday morning, April the 1st, till Friday at the place of execution. Sir William, being under an expectation of death from the time of his Sentence, had given me the state of his conscience, and therefore desired the solemn Absolution of the Church might be pronounced to him by me the last day. And understanding I was refused admittance on Friday morning, he sent me word that he would gladly see me at the place of execution. I went thither, and gave him the Absolution he requested, it being impracticable for me to do it elsewhere. This office I performed word for word in form, as it stands in the Visitation of the Sick. And now where lies the great crime of all this? when a man has declared his sorrow for all the faults and miscarriages of his life, and qualified himself for the privilege of absolution, with what justice could it be denied him? Ought not dying persons to be supported in their last agonies, and pass into the other world with all the advantage the church can give them? I am surprized so regular a proceeding as this should give so much offence, and make so much noise as I perceive it has done. Some people, I understand, are displeased at the office being performed with Imposition of Hands. Now this is not only an innocent, but an ancient ceremony of absolution. It was the general practice of the primitive church in such cases, long before there were any exceptions to the Roman Communion. It is, in the opinion of several fathers and good modern expositors, referred to by the Apostle, 1 Tim. v. 22. It is likewise prescribed the Assisting Presbyters in our own Ordination Form. But I suppose I need say no more in defence of this circumstance. To proceed: others seem very much shocked at the thing itself; and think it a strange presumption to admit a person charged with so high a crime, to the benefit of absolution. With submission, this is concluding a great deal too fast. Are all people damned that are cast in a capital indictment? If so, to what purpose are they visited by divines, why are they exhorted to repentance, and have time allowed them to fit them for death? But if they may be acquitted hereafter, notwithstanding their condemnation here; if they may be recovered by recollection, by repentance, and resignation, why should the church refuse them her pardon on earth, when she believes it is passed in heaven? The power of the keys was given for this purpose, that the ministers of God might bind or loose, as the disposition of the person required. The latter I sincerely believed to be Sir William's case: I judged him to have a full right to all the privileges of communion: and therefore had I denied him absolution upon his request, I had failed in my duty, and gone against the authority both of the ancient and English church. If it is said that the nature of this gentleman's charge required his being absolved in private; to this I answer, so he had been, had I been permitted to visit him the last morning: but this liberty was refused me more than once; and I hope I shall not be blamed for impossibilities of other men's making. In short, he seemed very desirous of absolution at my hands, as being the only person acquainted with his condition. Privately it was not in my power to give it him; so that he must either receive it publicly from me, or not at all. But Sir William confessed himself acquainted with the intended Assassination. Pray, did he confess it to me, and have I revealed any part of his confession? Then I had been guilty of High Misdemeanor indeed: I had broke the 113th canon, and been pronounced irregular by the church; and he that falls under irregularity, is for ever after incapable of executing the office of a priest (Dr. Heylin's Introduction to Cyprian; Angl. p. 6.) I confess there is an exception in the canon, but that does not reach the case in hand, even upon the largest supposition. Well! But Sir William owned this charge before the Committee. How could I know that? I neither saw Sir William after his examination, till Friday noon, nor the Votes which mentioned it till after that time. But he confessed it in his Paper. What then? Which way does the Paper concern me? It is well known Sir William Perkins was a man of sense, and bred to law and letters, and needed no help to assist him in writing a few lines. Besides, I was not permitted to come near him for more than two days before he suffered: neither was he allowed so much as pen and ink till the last morning. Then it was that he penned his Speech, as I am told by those who were present; and having read it before the Keeper, delivered a copy of it to a friend, which was not shewed to me till after the execution. Indeed, I did believe he would leave some paper behind him, both because it is customary upon such sad occasions, and because on Tuesday night, when he expected death on Wednesday, he desired pen, ink and paper, for that purpose.

And now, after all, I desire to know in what single circumstance I have misbehaved myself, or done any thing unbecoming my profession? It is very hard a man must be prosecuted for performing the obligations of his office, and the duties of common friendship and humanity. As for any methods of murder, I dislike them no less than those who rail against; and nothing but a necessary mistake could suggest the contrary: but if the functions of the priesthood, and the ordinances of religion, and the reading the public Liturgy, are grown a crime, I am not concerned at the consequence. I hope the complying clergy will take some care to check the disorders, and inform the ignorance of their people a little better. If they are unimproved for these slanderous and as it is manifest two of them, Mr. Snatt and Mr. Cook, did not as to sir William Perkins (they having since declared that they had not spoke with sir William till they were at the place of execution), how could they, without manifest transgression of the church's order, as well as the prophane abuse of the power Christ hath left with his ministers, absolve them from all their sins?

If they were acquainted with these men's sentiments declared in their papers, then they must look upon them, either as hardened impenitents, or as martyrs.

We are so charitable to believe that they would not absolve them under the former notion, for that had been, in effect, sealing them to damnation: But if they held these men to be martyrs, then their absolving them in that manner was a justification of those grievous crimes for which these men suffered, and an open affront to the laws both of church and state.

Upon the consideration of these things, and for the doing of right to our church, which may otherwise suffer, among such as are strangers to our constitution, by the evil principles and practices both of the aforesaid criminals, and the three clergymen that assisted them, who all pretended to be members of the church of England; we do declare, That we disown and detest all such principles and practices, looking upon them as highly schismatical and seditious, dangerous both to the church and state, and contrary to the true doctrine and spirit of the christian religion. And we also take this occasion to warn and exhort all the people committed to our charge, to beware of such seducers, and to avoid them; lest (as the Apostle St. Peter speaks) 'they be led away with the error of the wicked,' and fall from their steadfast adherence to the principles of the true church of England, as it was established at the blessed reformation of religion, and as by God's especial providence it continues to this day. A FURTHER DEFENCE of the Absolution given to Sir William Perkins, occasioned by a Paper, intituled, "A Declaration of the Archbishops and Bishops," &c.

About a fortnight since I published the foregoing Defence of the Absolution given to sir William Perkins. It is true the vindication was not drawn out into any great length, neither did I imagine it necessary. That which was said, was in my opinion sufficient to satisfy any candid and impartial reader. If the argument was any where over-contracted, it was in that part which mentions imposition of hands. Here I confess the proofs were but generally named, and the force and improvement of them left in some measure to collection. My desire to undeceive the people, and to silence their clamours as soon as might be, the disadvantage of my retirement, and the plainness of the case, were the reasons why I was no fuller upon that head: But now I have a fresh opportunity to treat the point more at large, the late Declaration, &c. of the bishops having given me a just occasion to resume the argument. I must own the perusal of this Declaration surprized me very much. I could not imagine these reverend prelates would have published so unsupported a censure; nor engaged their character so far in this affair. I am almost amazed an innocent conduct should be thus misconstrued, and the charge run so high without proof, or provocation to defend it.

The Declaration begins with some remarks upon the Papers of sir William Perkins and sir John Friend: These exceptions I shall pass over, as being unconcerned in their defence. Indeed, my resolution upon the whole is, to engage no farther than the justification of my own conduct; as being unwilling to have any unnecessary disputes with these reverend prelates.

The pretended irregularity objected against Mr. Snatt, Mr. Cook, and myself, relates wholly to the Absolution given to those two gentlemen at the place of execution. The performance of this office, the bishops are pleased to say, "was extremely insolent and without precedent in the manner, and altogether irregular in the thing."

I shall endeavour to justify my practice against every point of the accusation, and prove the Absolution defensible, both with respect to manner and form, to persons and occasion. And, 1st with respect to the manner. And here I shall make good three things.

*1st, That giving Absolution with imposition of hands was the general practice of the ancient church.

2dly, That the performance of this ceremony was allowed to priests, and sometimes to deacons, as well as bishops.

3dly, That imposition of hands is enjoined the assisting Presbyters by our own church in the office of ordination, and by parity of reason is fairly applicable to the present case.

First, That giving of Absolution with imposition of hands, was the general practice of the ancient church.

To begin with Tertullian, who lived in the beginning of the third century. This father understands that place of the apostle, "Lay hands suddenly on no man," (1 Tim. v. 22.) of the offices of penance and absolution. (L. de Pudic, cap. 18.) And (cap. 24.) he alludes to the same custom in these words, "Carere laudatque prosternens," as Althaspintus observes. (Althasp. Obser. l. 2. p. 97. not. in Tertull. p. 181.) Indeed the design of his book, De Pudicitia, plainly determines the author to this

...the imposition of hands upon the penitent, and hence the discipline of penance. The Fathers say nothing about Confirmation, or Absolution, so that it is evident the imposition of hands mentioned by him, must relate to post-baptismal absolution.

The Synodal Council of Carthage is express to the same purpose. Here Nemesianus, Crescens, Secundinus, and Vicentius, bishops of Toulon, Orlés, Carpi, and Tiberis, all of them agree that the church's peace, and the expectations of reconciliation, were to pass through this form of imposition of hands.

The 80th canon of the fourth Council of Carthage enjoins, That during the whole time of abstinence, (I suppose either stated or occasional) the priests (Sacerdotes) should lay their hands upon the penitents.

The 11th Canon of the third Council of Toledo, in the directions for the methods of penance, is positive for the frequent use of this ceremony; which made Athanasius conclude, That absolution-prayers and imposition of hands were repeated and customary in such cases (Athasp. Observ. l. 2. p. 86.)

To conclude this point. The learned Dr. Hammond, in his Annotations on the text above-mentioned, (1 Tim. v. 22.) refers the laying on hands to absolution. "The Apostle" says he, "exhorts Timothy that he should not make too much haste to receive those who were under censures, to absolution. For that was the thing which would most probably make him partaker, or guilty of their sins, which the censures were designed to reform in them; but would not do so, if, before they had renewed their repentance and reformation, they were received to the peace of the church." This learned divine cites a great many authorities in defence of his opinion, which the reader may consult at his leisure.

Secondly, The pronouncing the absolution with imposition of hands, is no encroachment upon the episcopal authority, but plainly allowed to the order of Presbyters.

This point I shall make good from several plain testimonies of St. Cyprian, whose authority must be granted to be unexceptionable, both with respect to the antiquity and character of the person. Indeed it is to this Father that we are principally obliged for the remains we have of the discipline and government of the primitive church.

Now St. Cyprian is categorical in the case, and affirms roundly, that "in those cases when those of the lapsed, the penitent could not be admitted to full communion, unless the bishops and clergy had laid their hands upon him."

This is the 11th Canon of the Council of Carthage, which I have already cited. (Ep. ad Episc. p. 38. Ed. Orlés.) Now where the bishops and clergy are thus constituted, the order of the church is preserved, and the order of the church is preserved, and the order of the church is preserved.

For the same reason, but because these

...the imposition of hands upon the penitent, and hence the discipline of penance. The Fathers say nothing about Confirmation, or Absolution, so that it is evident the imposition of hands mentioned by him, must relate to post-baptismal absolution.

The Synodal Council of Carthage is express to the same purpose. Here Nemesianus, Crescens, Secundinus, and Vicentius, bishops of Toulon, Orlés, Carpi, and Tiberis, all of them agree that the church's peace, and the expectations of reconciliation, were to pass through this form of imposition of hands.

The 80th canon of the fourth Council of Carthage enjoins, That during the whole time of abstinence, (I suppose either stated or occasional) the priests (Sacerdotes) should lay their hands upon the penitents.

The 11th Canon of the third Council of Toledo, in the directions for the methods of penance, is positive for the frequent use of this ceremony; which made Athanasius conclude, That absolution-prayers and imposition of hands were repeated and customary in such cases (Athasp. Observ. l. 2. p. 86.)

To conclude this point. The learned Dr. Hammond, in his Annotations on the text above-mentioned, (1 Tim. v. 22.) refers the laying on hands to absolution. "The Apostle" says he, "exhorts Timothy that he should not make too much haste to receive those who were under censures, to absolution. For that was the thing which would most probably make him partaker, or guilty of their sins, which the censures were designed to reform in them; but would not do so, if, before they had renewed their repentance and reformation, they were received to the peace of the church." This learned divine cites a great many authorities in defence of his opinion, which the reader may consult at his leisure.

Secondly, The pronouncing the absolution with imposition of hands, is no encroachment upon the episcopal authority, but plainly allowed to the order of Presbyters.

This point I shall make good from several plain testimonies of St. Cyprian, whose authority must be granted to be unexceptionable, both with respect to the antiquity and character of the person. Indeed it is to this Father that we are principally obliged for the remains we have of the discipline and government of the primitive church.

Now St. Cyprian is categorical in the case, and affirms roundly, that "in those cases when those of the lapsed, the penitent could not be admitted to full communion, unless the bishops and clergy had laid their hands upon him."

This is the 11th Canon of the Council of Carthage, which I have already cited. (Ep. ad Episc. p. 38. Ed. Orlés.) Now where the bishops and clergy are thus constituted, the order of the church is preserved, and the order of the church is preserved, and the order of the church is preserved.

For the same reason, but because these

In the 13th canon of the first Council of Nice the Viaticum is ordered to be given to them who are at the point of death. And by the Viaticum, Athanasius proves, that absolution with imposition of hands was meant; and so the Eucharist; and that an absolution might be given by those who were no more than priests. (Athasp. Not. in quodam Can. p. 134.) I could amass a great many more testimonies, were it necessary; but I conceive, what has been said already, may be sufficient to vindicate my practice from the charge of encroachment and singularity.

Thirdly, Imposition of hands is enjoined the assisting Presbyters by our own church in the office of Ordination, and by parity of reason is fairly applicable to the present case.

If our church had thought the imposition of hands too much for the character of priests, she would not have prescribed them a share in it at her ordinations. But since she has allowed them this liberty in the most solemn exercises of authority, why should she deny it in inferior cases? To assist in the conveyance of an authority seems a greater mark of power, than the executing any branch of the authority conveyed. If the Presbyters are permitted to lay their hands upon the clergy, why not, a fortiori, upon the laity? St. Hieron affirms plainly (Ep. ad Evagr.) that the power of a priest comprehend those of a bishop, excepting in the point of Ordination. Our church has never condemned this father's assertion; why then may not the first absover with imposition of hands no less than the other?

But there is no appointment of this ceremony in the Absolution Rubric. True: neither is there any prohibition. The Rubric is perfectly silent both on its posture and gesture, and on some circumstances of this nature, which of necessity be used.

Now since our church allows the priest imposition of hands in another case, and does not forbid it in this, is it any harm if our liberty moves upward, and determines itself by general usage and primitive practice? Our church has always professed a regard for the patterns of antiquity: we cannot do her a greater honour, than by conforming to the solemnities of the purest ages, than by making the discipline of fathers and councils the rule of our behaviour: especially when we are not bound up by national law and particular constitution. Thus much for the manner.

I come now to justify the thing and the occasion.

It is objected by these reverend prelates, that the three "assisting clergymen pronounced a form of absolution," &c. With submission, I hope a form is better than no form; especially when it was a form rubrically appointed; a form drawn up by the public authority of the church, confirmed by Canon, and act of parliament; a form the most pertinent and proper to the occasion of any in the Liturgy, I am sorry to see the solemn offices of religion mentioned with such seeming coldness, and abatements of expression. Were it not that I am unwilling to give these reverend prelates the trouble of a question, I would gladly understand, what form they could have fixed on more suitable to so sad an occasion? I am sure that form of absolution is the most solemn and authoritative of any in the Service-book. Now if ever the church exerts herself, ought it not to be in cases of the greatest necessity? Can her most comfortable administrations, and the highest acts of her authority, be better employed than for the relief of dying persons, who are combating the king of terrors, and stand just upon the brink of eternity? Upon the whole, I am surprized they should say the "Rubrick gave us no pretence of authority to absolve those persons." Does not the Rubrick give the priest a power to pronounce the absolution, and to judge of the condition of the penitent? This cannot be denied. And why then had we no pretence of authority? "Because the Rubrick relates to the sick." To this I answer; had the church left us a stated office for persons condemned, and we had refused to make use of it, there had been some force in the objection; but as the matter stands, I humbly conceive there is none at all. The church, without question, would have condemned persons taken care of, as well as others, and their spiritual necessities supplied. And if so, is it not more respect to the church to officiate in forms of her own setting forth, than in private and unauthorized compositions? And if the function was to be performed in the public devotions, I desire to know what part of them could have been more proper than the Office of Visitation of the Sick? If we consider the design of the church, and especially the Rubrick before the absolution, we shall find that she intended this office to prepare people for the other world, and considered them rather as dying, than likely to recover. This appears evidently from the questions and advices ordered to be asked and given; so that wherever death is in view, the office cannot be unreasonable, nor misapplied. And can any persons be more certain of death than those who are publicly condemned, who lie under fatal sentence, and irresistible power; who have the force of the county to dispatch them, and are just ready to receive the stroke? As to the previous questions, they were put and answered, the absolution was desired, and the confession received in prison; and in short, the church's directions were observed in every particular. But we "did not move them to make a special confession of their sins at that time." With submission, where lies the necessity, or even the expediency of such a practice? Does our church oblige dying persons to public confession? Does she require them to throw open the retirements of conscience, and the secrets of private life, to the view of the world? I am at a loss to understand why we should be charged with omissions on such accounts as these.

The Declaration, &c. proceeds with great vehemence, and charges us with "manifest transgression of the church's order, and prophane abuse of the authority of Christ." These are hard words, but I hope altogether undeserved. It is true, they instance only in Mr. Snatt, and Mr. Cook, but I must own the objection lies equally against myself; for I never saw sir John Freind during his whole imprisonment. But in assisting at his absolution, so far as laying on my hand amounts to, I did no more than what is easily defensible. I grant I had no immediate and particular knowledge of his condition, neither was it necessary. Our church, in conformity to antiquity, has made the priest the proper judge of the qualifications of the penitents, and supposes him fit to be trusted, and believed in that affair. Now Mr. Snatt and Mr. Cook (upon whose judgment and integrity I can very well depend) had given me a general account of sir John's pious disposition, and that he was well prepared for all the assistance the church could give him. The having so good information from first hands, from proper and authorized judges, is sufficient to warrant my part in sir John's absolution. This, besides what has been said, I shall make good from two parallel instances.

First, It is well known that bishops of the ancient church used to give a sort of certificates to those that travelled; by virtue of which, they were not only entertained and accommodated, but admitted to full communion all over Christendom. (Albans. Not. in Con. p. 115.) From whence we may observe, that personal acquaintance, and particular examination, are not necessary to give a right to the privileges of Christianity. Where the credentials are good, the church is to enquire no farther; she is to presume upon the publicity of the person recommended, and to treat him accordingly.

* "Bishop Sanderson, that eminent casuist, about a day before his death, desired his chaplain, Mr. Pullen, to give him absolution; and at his performing that office, he pulled off his cap, that Mr. Pullen might lay his hand upon his bare head." Walton's Life of Bishop Sanderson, p. 91. Former Edition.

Secondly, Our own church, in some of the highest administrations, acts upon principles of trust and confidence. She conveys her privileges, and exercises her authority, without always insisting on personal inquiry and immediate proof. At the giving of holy orders, neither the bishops, nor the assisting presbyters, are always personally acquainted with those they ordain. The prudence of our church does not tie us up to such unreasonable rigours. Both practice, and the ordination form, suppose the contrary. And why then may not the priest assist in absolution as well as orders, without any previous experiment of the state of the person? Why may not he in the first, as well as the latter branch of his authority, act upon the warrant of unexceptionable testimony? By all parity of reason and force of consequence, the practice is no less defensible in one case, than in the other.

If it is objected, that the joining of all the three clergymen in the imposition of hands is unprecedented, and exceptionable; to this I answer, that if the action was lawful, singly performed, I cannot imagine how a concurrence of more authorised persons should make it otherwise? Is there any harm in union and solemnity? Or can religion be treated with too many circumstances of advantage? What Canon is there that admits the assistance to one, and forbids a plurality of persons? Timothy had the "hands of the Presbytery laid upon him," (1 Tim. iv. 14.) which without doubt, exceeded the number now objected. Our church, at her ordination, allows this ceremony to all the Presbyters present. And in the very case of absolution, the Penitent was to receive imposition of hands from the bishop and clergy; as appears from the testimony of St. Cyprian above-mentioned. Farther,

These Reverend Prelates argue, that "we must either look on the persons absolved as Impenitents, or Martyrs;" and they make their advantage of each branch of the supposition. But, with submission, I see no necessity of granting the disjunction. For there may be a third way of considering the matter. To speak to my own case: I absolved sir William Perkins as a Penitent; and I suppose every body must be absolved under that consideration: for absolution supposes both sin and repentance, in the notice of it. But as for the matter of sir William's repentance, that is never likely to be known from me. Neither am I in the least affected with the bishop's interference. For supposing I received a defective confession, am I accountable for that? However, I neither do nor am obliged to declare my opinion in this matter. But that for I am positive, that there was nothing confessed to me, which the canon obliges me to reveal: and what the canon does not enjoin me to discover; it enjoins me not to discover. (Can. 113. Vid. first defence.) And so there is an end of this dispute.

I hope by this time it may appear, that I am neither unfurnished with reason, or precedent, to justify what I have done. However, I shall give one late instance for the whole case, and so conclude.

At the execution of Mr. Ashton, Jan. 1690, absolution was given him in the same form, with imposition of hands, at the same place, and upon the same occasion; and a justifying Paper left by the person that suffered. Now at that time there were no exceptions made either to manner or thing. The performance was so far from displeasing, that the sheriff gave his thanks for the solemnity of the office. There were no complaints either at Lambeth, or Whitehall, no public investitures, no seizing of body and goods; in short, no signs of the least dissatisfaction. And who could imagine, that the bare repeating of an action should raise such a storm upon us now, which was so perfectly inoffensive before? To punish in this manner, without warning or precedent, without canon or law, is (with submission) somewhat unintelligible.

And now having defended myself, I shall reply nothing to all the upkind reflections, and tragical language of the Declaration. It is probably within my power to turn some of these reverend prelates artillery upon them. But my regard to their character, and inclination not to displease, makes me wave the advantage. However, their extraordinary usage has done me the honour of an opportunity to forgive them, which I thank God I heartily do,

P. S. I have just now received a sheet, called "An Answer to my Defence," &c. As for that little which is material in this Paper, it is already satisfied, and I do not love needless repetitions. And therefore to begin and end in a word with this answerer; if he has any thing remarkable, it is, in my opinion, in his language; and that I can both pity and despise. April 25.

There were several pamphlets published on this occasion, against and in defence of this proceeding; but these are sufficient to shew the nature of the controversy.

In July following, Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt were brought to the court of King's-bench, and the Proceedings against them are thus briefly related in Comberbach's Reports, p. 382.

Indictment for absolving Traitors.

Upon an Indictment setting forth, That sir John Friend and sir William Perkins being attainted, and about to be executed at Tyburn, for high treason, &c. the defendants conspiring and intending (as much as in them lay) to justify, or at least to extenuate and lessen their crimes, and to induce his majesty's subjects to believe that they died rather as martyrs than as traitors, and to incite the king's subjects to commit the like treasons, they did take upon them to absolve, and did pronounce a form of absolution of them the said sir William Perkins and sir John Freind, without any repentance, or any signs of repentance by them given.

It was proved, that the defendants asked the criminals the several questions directed by the Rubrick in the office of Visitation of the Sick, and Mr. Cook pronounced the words of absolution of one of the traitors; Mr. Snatt, and one Mr. Collier, (who is not now indicted) laying their hands upon his head, and after the words pronounced, saying, Amen; and Mr. Collier pronounced the words as to the other traitor, they all three laying on their hands, &c. It was proved, that the defendants were earnestly requested by sir William Perkins and sir John Freind, to assist them at the place of execution; and therefore the jury were directed to acquit them of conspiracy (though the attorney-general said the indictment was not for conspiracy, and 'conspirantes' was put adjectively only to introduce the other matter, and therefore was not material): and Holt directed the jury, that this proceeding of the defendants was certainly scandalous and irregular; for if the criminals had before made a private confession, the absolution should have been private likewise; but if they would give a public absolution, they ought to have required as public confession, and particularly with respect to those crimes for which they were attainted, being so notorious, &c. However, if the jury were of opinion they did it only ignorantly, and by mistake, (in which case it is properly commensurable in the spiritual court) then to acquit them; but if they did it with a design to affront the government and to vilify the justice of the nation, then to find them guilty: but at the instance of the defendants counsel, it was directed to be found specially, that Snatt laid his hand on the head, and was assistant, while the other pronounced the words of absolution, and afterwards Snatt said, Amen (it being laid quod pronunciant). And accordingly the jury acquitted them of the conspiracy, and found Cook guilty of the rest, and as to Snatt, ut supra.*

When this Special Verdict was argued, or how this matter ended, does not appear: but at the sale of the earl of Clarendon's Manuscripts, in Covent-Garden, April 1763, the following Argument was purchased in Manuscript.

The King against Cook and Snatt.

It is an indictment for a misdemeanor on which a Special Verdict is found. I am, by your lordship's appointment, counsel for the defendants.

The indictment sets forth, That whereas sir John Freind and sir William Perkins were severally convicted and attainted of high treason, in conspiring the death of the king, and adhering to his enemies, and according to due course of law, and judgment thereon severally given, were drawn to Tyburn, to be there put to death; Jeremy Collier, and these two defendants, well knowing the premises, but intending to withdraw the king's subjects from their allegiance, and to incite them to commit the like treasons, at the gallows, being in the cart with sir John Freind and sir William Perkins, and immediately before their execution, conspiring, designing, and intending that execrable, horrible, and detestable high treason, for which sir John Freind and sir William Perkins were attainted, and then instantly to die, according to the course of law, to justify, or at least to extenuate, diminish, or set it nought; and to insinuate into the king's subjects, and persuade them, that sir John Freind and sir William Perkins were about to die innocent and unlessered, and rather as martyrs than traitors; and to incite the king's subjects to commit the like treasons, and unlawfully and contumaciously, as priests of the church of England, in the presence and sight of a great concourse of people, and in the hearing of a great many of them, laying their hands on the heads of sir John Freind and sir William Perkins in the said cart, then and no repentance for the crime for which he was about to die; and Cook pronounced the Absolution, and Snatt and Collier said, Amen.

"That they all three likewise laid their hands on sir William Perkins, who was likewise impenitent of this crime; and Collier pronounced the Absolution, and Cook and Snatt said, Amen; and that they all assisted and assented to the said Absolution.

"The jury made a special conclusion in their verdict, Whether the laying on the hands of three, and but one at a time pronouncing the Absolution, makes them all guilty of the whole matter?" Adjourn.

there took upon themselves to absolve them, and did pronounce them to be absolved from all their sins, without any repentance, by the said sir John Freind and sir William Perkins, or either of them, for the high treason aforesaid first declared.

To this indictment these two defendants pleaded not guilty: And the issue being tried before your lordship, the jury find this special verdict: That Cook, Snatt, and Collier laid their hands on sir John Freind, and Cook pronounced the absolution, and Collier and Snatt said, Amen: That Collier and these two defendants laid their hands on sir William Perkins, and Collier pronounced the absolution, and Cook and Snatt said Amen: And that Cook and Snatt assisted, and assented to the said absolution.

As to the conspiracy, they find the defendants not guilty; and as to all the rest of the indictment, they find the defendants guilty: But whether, on the whole matter, the defendants, or either of them, be guilty of the matters and things charged on them in the indictment (besides the conspiracy) or no, the jury pray the advice of the court. And thereupon it now comes before your lordship. And

I hope with submission to your lordship, as this indictment is, these defendants shall be discharged. And to that end I shall crave leave humbly to lay before your lordship some considerations on these three points:

First, Whether what is laid in this indictment will amount to an offence?

Secondly, If it be an offence, I shall humbly submit it to your lordship, Whether the examination of it doth not belong to another jurisdiction? And,

Thirdly, If it should be an offence, and punishable in this court, yet there can be no judgment given against them on this indictment.

But before I come to these points, I must crave leave to explain what I take to be the meaning of one expression in the indictment, and that is, 'Abque aliqua penitentia per eos pro alta proditiōe predicta prius declarata.' By penitentia, though it usually amongst the Canonists signifies penance, and sometimes repentance, absolution and penance, yet in this place I take it for repentance only. And by the words 'pro alta proditiōe predicta prius declarata,' is meant publicly declared for that particular offence. For on the evidence it appeared, there was a general repentance of all their sins; and there might have been a private, particular repentance of this very treason to the priests, whilst they were in the prison, according to the rule of the Canonists, 'Poenite in una die confessionem audire, et in altera iungere penitentiam.' As I find it cited by the greatest canonist and best author I have met with on this occasion, 'Feuerbach. Regiminis de regulari confessione, c. 11. fol. 310.' But when this was objected at the trial, the king's counsel answered, The repentance ought to be as public as the absolution. Therefore, to reduce it all to a case on this indictment, I take it, these gentlemen (especially Mr. Cook, for Mr. Snatt's case doth somewhat differ) did publicly absolve sir John Freind and sir William Perkins, as they were about to be executed for high treason, without their particular repentance publicly declared for the crime for which they suffered. And I shall humbly submit it to your lordship, whether this be any offence in these gentlemen, or in either of them. They were persons, that by order, at least by leave of the court when sir John Freind and sir William Perkins were attainted, were permitted and appointed to officiate with the condemned criminals to prepare them for another world, when they were about to leave this by the judgment of our law. Accordingly they officiated, and were several times with the condemned criminals in the prison; where we may very well presume, that they brought their penitents to a particular confession and repentance, though we could not prove it at the trial; because the penitent was dead, and the absolver the person indicted.

And besides, the absolver was not obliged to discover the confession; nay, it is expressly forbidden by the 113th canon of our church, made by the convocation in the year 1603, which was called by the king's writ, and confirmed under the great seal, according to the form of the statute 25 H. 8, c. 19, as my lord Vaughan tells us in his reports, fol. 349. And the king or convocation, but certainly both of them with their joint power, may make orders and ordinances, which shall bind all the king's subjects, but more especially the clergy, as may plainly be inferred from the statute 25 H. 8, c. 19. And so are our books, 21 E. 4, 45, Bro. Abr. ordinary, pl. 1. Moor 755, 785, 2 Cro. 37. Noy 100. and 2 Ventr. 44. And so hath been the practice, in the first volume of the History of the Reformation, fol. 225. and the second volume, fol. 60, 69, and 70. In a case of this nature, I must beg leave of your lordship to make use of the writings of divines and other authors, and not strictly confine myself to our books of common law: for our law books are silent in this case; and indeed I do not find any other authors speaking directly to the point. Therefore, I must be forced to look into the nature of absolution, the power of the clergy, the practice of divines, and other collateral matters, for some light herein; which makes me dread growing tedious, and becoming very tiresome to your lordship's patience.

And, my lord, as to this particular case, these canons are in some manner confirmed by act of parliament: for the statute 13 Car. 2, c. 12, sect. the last, which seems to set aside the canon of 1640, doth establish the church as it was in the year 1639; and then these canons were in force and practised. For the king who then reigned, at his coronation, (the first that was after making of these canons) did not only swear to maintain to the church the laws of St. Edward, but likewise to preserve to the bishops, and churches committed to their charge, all canonical privileges. 1 Rushworth's Collection, fol. 201. And the power of secrecy seems to me a privilege; and these canons are now received and observed as laws amongst the clergy. And, my lord, neither the indictment nor evidence did deny that there was a private repentance. Now, that a private confession and repentance had been sufficient, appears from the rule of the canonists, 'Non tenetur penitens tertio audiente confiteri, quia confessio cum sacerdote fiat in persona Dei omnia exploratissime cognoscens, excludit omnem testem,' Val. Reg. lib. 6. n. 78. fol. 182. 'De Sacramentali Confessione.' Nay, the confession to God Almighty only is held sufficient: 'Exaudi, Domine, preces nostras, et confitentiam tibi. Parce, peccatis, ut quos conscientie reatus accusat, indulgentia tue miserationis absolvat,' &c. as is set down in the 'Ordo Romanus de Officiis Divinis,' in the tenth tome of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 90. and is verbatim rendered into English in our liturgy, in the communion, and in the form of prayer appointed to be used on the 30th of January, and in that appointed for our last general fast. And I shall presume to offer to your lordship's consideration some reasons, why such a private confession to God Almighty, or to his minister here on earth, is sufficient for absolution. One is drawn from the nature of the thing itself. No man is obliged by law to do any act to any other person, from whom he can receive no benefit by so doing. And the people cannot absolve, it is only the priest can do it; and therefore to him alone must be made the confession and repentance. And so is Linwood; the last impression, fol. 337. on the words, 'Debito caret fructu,' says he, 'Fructus igitur sive utilitas penitentiae est absolutio à peccatis, quam quis non consequitur ab eo qui non est suus iudex, nec habet potestatem eum ligandi vel solvendi.' And the same author, speaking concerning confession, fol. 327. 'Verbo Confessionis,' hath these words, 'Confessio tripliciter fit, aut in foro animae interior coram Deo, aut in foro penitentiae exterior coram Dei vicario, aut in foro contentioso coram iudice.' And then he adds, 'Confessio est legitima coram sacerdote peccatorum declaratio.' And there is not, as I can find, the least hint of making any confession or repentance to the people, but only to the priest; and that may be in private. But in this case there was likewise a public repentance declared; which the priests might well take for a repentance of that offence as well as for any other. That repentance indeed was general: for traitors being by no decree foreclosed absolution; and no particular form being prescribed, these gentlemen followed the Rubric in the form there set down for the Visitation of the Sick, which may very well be taken to have been designed for all that are in danger of death; and so our greatest divines have taken it. The learned Dr. Duport, in his Greek version of our liturgy, renders this office by a word that signifies as well to be in peril or imminent danger, or the like, as to be visited with sickness; which likewise answers the canonists description or denomination of this sort of absolution; to distinguish it from the common and sacramental absolution, they call it 'absolutio in articulo mortis,' without distinguishing between a natural and violent death, or between the innocent and malefactors. And if our law had designed to have excluded malefactors from the benefit of this office, it would have used the same caution as it doth against others in the office for burial of the dead, where it says, it shall not be used to those that die unbaptized, excommunicated, or are felo de se. And I do not find malefactors that suffer by the hand of justice excluded that office, and I think it is often performed for them; why then must this of Visitation of the Sick be denied them? There is no other office or form appointed for these sort of persons. And then, where there is no law there is no transgression; they are left to their own method and form, and therefore may use that set down in the common prayer as well as any other. And here the priests asked sir John Freind and sir William Perkins, if they repented truly of all their sins, and were in charity with all the world? The penitents answering in the affirmative, the absolvers advising forgiveness, did, at the request of the penitents, in the form set down in the liturgy, pronounce the absolution, neither of the criminals signifying that he felt his conscience troubled with any weighty matter. And, with submission to your lordship, such signification ought to be previous to the motion for a special confession, for the words are, 'If he feel his conscience troubled;' which I think is fully explained by the second homily of repentance, which condemns articular confession, and then adds, 'I do not say but that, if any do find themselves troubled in conscience, they may repair to their learned curate or pastor, or to some other godly, learned man, and shew their trouble and doubt of their consciences to them, that they may receive at their hands the comfortable salve of God's word.' But it no where enjoins such confession and repentance, much less doth it command the priest to exact them from the penitent. There is no order for the priest to examine whether he doth find his conscience troubled, if the penitent doth not intimate it to the priest. There is no direction for the priest to ask him any question about it. And Val. Reg. l. 2. c. 2. n. 73. out of Solus, gives us this definition or description of the office and duty of a confessor in these words, 'Officiam quidem confessori de se non est interrogare penitentem, sed audire contentum.' And going on, he gives this reason, 'Cum in foro penitentia non procedatur sicut in criminali per vim coactam ad extorquendam a reo confessionem, sed per spontaneam voluntariam confitentiam.' I acknowledge, that in the church of Rome, to make absolution a complete sacrament, a special confession is required; as is directed by our church, when the penitent, signifies that he feels a burden on his conscience. But neither is there, nor in any other case, wherein special confession is required, is it any where ordered to be public. It is sufficient that it is made to the priest alone; and the common practice in these and all other cases is to have it private: All other persons are excluded the sick man's chamber. But supposing, my lord, that the meaning of the Rubric should be taken to be, that the priest should move him to make such a special confession, this is only directory: it is not compulsory, any more than the preceding paragraphs, where the priest is to admonish the sick person to make his will, and declare his debts, and, if he be of ability, to give charitably to the poor. And it would be difficult to maintain an indictment on any of these paragraphs against a priest, for absolving a sick man without admonishing him to make his will, declare his debts, or be liberal to the poor, who perhaps starved for want of such relief. Certainly in those cases the Rubric would be looked on to be only directory: And why not so in this? The like exposition hath been made on other acts of parliament. The statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 4, against vexatious informers, enacts, That no information shall be received, filed, or entered of record, before the informer hath made oath that the offence was committed within the county where it was laid, and, as he believes, within a year before exhibiting the information; and this oath to be entered of record. Yet I believe, it cannot be shewn that any such oath hath at any time been made, nor informer nor officer indicted for preferring, filing, entering, or receiving any information without such oath; for that statute hath (as to that part) been always held to be directory, that the judge or officer might require it, if they thought fit; but they are not thereby obliged in any case to exact it from the informer, any otherwise than as their own discretions guide them, 1 Cro. 316. But taking the clause in the case now before, your lordship to be compulsory, yet it is not to be universally observed to all penitents; it is only in some cases, where the persons are not qualified without such special confession, and the priest is to consider and determine of the qualifications: For absolution is purely spiritual, and so left to the priest, that he is the only judge thereof. And if it might not be thought improper, I should crave leave briefly to mention the opinions of some of the fathers of the church on this occasion.

St. Chrysostom says, The Father judges no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son; and the Son, till his second coming, hath left all judgment to his ministers. And St. Jerome, speaking of the priests, hath these words, Qui claves regni celorum habent, quodcumque ligaverint super terram, &c. And St. Gregory the great says of them, Prædicti sunt regni judices, ut vici Dei quodcumque ligaverint, &c. and therefore Tertullian calls excommunication 'Prejudicium futuri seculi.' And the learned prelate Usher, in his answer to Mabius the jesuit, saith, "We acknowledge most willingly, that the principal part of the priest's ministry is exercised in matter of forgiveness of sins." And it farther appears by what I before cited out of Linwood, and likewise by another expression in the same book, fol. 335, on the words Competentis literaturæ, where he says, 'Episcopus est iudex tam animarum quam corporum.' Presbyter vero non est iudex nisi animarum.' And fol. 337, the word Sacerdotum is thus explained, 'Qui deputati sunt ad audiendas confessiones.' And in the next paragraph he hath these words, 'Verbum Dei dimittit peccata, sacerdos autem est iudex.' And, my lord, what I would infer from those divines and Linwood, is, that the priest being the judge of the state of the soul of the penitent, he must at his peril, as he will answer it to God Almighty, take care of the confession and absolution; and if he err, he may perhaps be punished for it in another world, but not in this. We usually esteem it a hard case to punish a man for erring in his judgment, for not being as wise as he ought to be, or so understanding as another. No judge is in any case, at common law, to be punished for an erroneous judgment, either by action or indictment, 9 E. 4, 3, a. Pl. 10, 1 Len. 324, Hist. 120. And our divines tell us, that God Almighty will judge us by our wills, not by our understandings. And therefore, if these gentlemen were mistaken in what they did, it being only an error of their judgments, though it may be deemed an imprudent action, yet I hope it will not be adjudged criminal. And, my lord, there may be this farther reason given, why it should be left to the priest to judge of the repentance, and give the absolution when he sees occasion. Suppose, my lord, an innocent man should be condemned for treason or felony, as it happened in the case of the uncle condemned and executed for the murder of his niece, mentioned in my lord Coke's third Institutes, 332. And the like case happened in Gloucestershire between thirty and forty years since, when Joan Perry and her two sons [See an account of them following this case of captain Thomas Green, for Piracy and Murder, A. D. 1705, in this Collection] were executed for the murder of one Harrison; and after they were executed, the person supposed to be murdered came into the country, and vivo voce proved the innocency of those persons that were condemned and executed for that fancied murder. Now, supposing, in such a case, the person to be executed obstinately and resolutely denies the fact, shall the priest refuse him absolution? And because the innocent person will not accuse himself of what he was not so much as is thought guilty, must he therefore die the second death for his other sins, for which he does repent? For they are still retained by the priest, who refuses to give him absolution: Because such persons cannot condemn themselves for what their consciences do not accuse.

them, can there be no forgiveness, no absolution for them? Will not charity allow they may be saved, and consequently entitled to absolution? Nay, will not charity extend to those that suffer in an ill cause, through a fault in their understanding? And I hope that the errors of our judgments, as well as the weakness of our memories, may be pardoned amongst our secret sins; and therefore such persons may not always be denied the benefit of absolution. It is no where denied to traitors; nay, the Canonists say, 'In articulo mortis, omnes sacerdotes quolibet poenitentes a quibusvis peccatis et censuris absolvere possunt,' Val. Reg. l. 1, n. 58, fol. 9. And he there cites a council for it, where it was so determined. Nor is there any particular form or method prescribed for their repentance or absolution; therefore, methinks, a general repentance may deserve a general absolution; and perhaps, in some of these cases, the priest had been to blame, if he had denied absolution.

And now, with your lordship's patience, I will look into the practice of divines in such-like cases; though it cannot be expected that I should bring many precedents to warrant this, because it is seldom that absolution is given at the place of execution; the ordinary, or some other divine performing that office, usually doing that in private, when they have free access to the prisoner: And if it were not so done here, it was because, after these divines were appointed to be with the criminals, and to prepare them for another world, and had been with them, and, as we say, received their confession and repentance for the crimes for which they were condemned, and perhaps had there-upon given them absolution; yet after this, for two or three days immediately preceding the execution, they were kept from them, and not permitted to come to them till they were in the cart at the place of execution: And it may be intended, that the absolution that was then given them, was for the sins which they had committed since they saw them last. Therefore, unless the king's counsel can shew me a case with such circumstances, they cannot expect from me a direct precedent to justify our proceedings. But I shall crave leave to mention a few that I think will bear some proportion to the case now before your lordship. I shall begin with that of John Twyn, who was tried, convicted, and executed at the Old Bailey, the 20th of February, 1668, the narrative of which was then printed by authority. He was convicted for printing and publishing a treasonable libel; and my lord chief justice Hyde, before whom the trial was, saith, [Vol. 6, p. 536, of this Collection] "I shall not spend my time in discourse to you to prepare you for death. I see a grave person, whose office it is, and I leave it to him. Do not think of any time here. Make your peace with God, which must be done by confession; and by the discovery of those that are guilty of the same crime with you. God have mercy upon you; and if you do so, he will have mercy upon you." Afterwards, and before he came to be executed, the ordinary pressed him to confession of those others concerned with him, which he refused; and yet the ordinary offered to administer the Sacrament to him. From whence I would infer, that it is the office of the Ordinary to prepare condemned criminals for another world, and consequently he must be the judge when they are prepared. And next, though the Chief Justice was of opinion, that God Almighty would not pardon him but on the confession of his own fault, and the discovery of his accomplices, yet the Ordinary tendered him the Sacrament, which comprehends the absolution, when he obstinately refused to make any such discovery; [See Twyn's speech and behaviour in vol. 6, p. 536, of this Collection] and yet no indictment against him for it. My lord Strafford, when he was going to be beheaded, being denied to speak with archbishop Laud; as he passed by his grace's lodgings, seeing the archbishop at his window, the earl of Strafford bowing himself to the ground, said, 'My lord, your prayers and your blessing.' The Archbishop lifted up his hand, and bestowed both. There was not time or opportunity for his grace to pronounce the absolution at large, nor to lay his hands on the head of the penitent, as these defendants did, but he came as near it as he could; he lifted up his hands, and bestowed both his prayers and benediction, and that without any particular confession or repentance. And though his grace was afterwards proceeded against, and, as they then called it, tried for High Treason, and all the dirt thrown on him that Prynne and several others could rake up against him, and his whole life searched into, and every particular action narrowly traced, and even his reputation, when he was a scholar at the university, produced as evidence against him; yet this blessing, this absolution was never so much as mentioned, though they had often opportunity so to do, when it was urged (as frequently it was) that his grace and the earl of Strafford were very intimate friends and acquaintance, and went hand in hand to destroy the government both in church and state: And yet this action was publicly taken notice of, as we find by the historians of those times. Rushworth, in the earl of Strafford's Trial, fol. 782. Franklyn's Annals, 901.*

Now, my lord, blessing and absolution in such circumstances amount to the same. No man blesses the impenitent. The form that the archbishop then used is not set down, nor is it, with submission to your lordship, any ways material. There are several forms of absolution, which in sense and virtue are the same; as archbishop Sparrow has it in his Rationale on the Common-Prayer; where he shews us, that there are three several forms of absolution in the liturgy; as first, in the morning and evening prayer, 'He pardoneth and absolutely, &c. The second is used in the Visitation of the sick, 'By his authority committed to me, I absolve thee,' &c. The third is at the sacrament, 'Almighty God, &c. have mercy upon you, &c. pardon and forgive you, &c.' The like form is appointed to be used in case of imminent danger at sea, and called an absolution. And, saith that reverend and learned prelate, "All these several forms in sense and virtue are the same: for it is all one as to the remission of sins in the penitent, whether the priest absolve him after this form, Almighty God, who hath given me and all priests power to pronounce pardon to the penitent; he pardons you—or thus, By virtue of a commission granted to me from God, I absolve you—or lastly, God pardon you."

* See, too, vol. 3, p. 1521, of this Collection.

I must now, my lord, in my way, crave leave to observe, that criminals, be their offences never so heinous, though they do not confess them, or shew any repentance for them, yet they are not kept from the public service of the church; nor are they denied or refused to be admitted to the blessed Sacrament, where they have the benefit of this third absolution, and that in public. What reason then can there be to deny them this absolution, for the giving which these gentlemen stand now indicted, which hath not, I believe, been at any time denied to any malefactors, either in this or any other part of the whole Christian world? The emperor of Germany, in his manifesto against those persons that killed his officers and ministers at Prague, as a great aggravation of their offence says, they did it without giving them a moment of time to repent, or make confession, or receive the Sacrament, which is never denied to the worst offenders, 1 Rushworth, 2.—Without giving them a moment of time to repent, or make confession, or receive the Sacrament.—It is in the disjunctive, my lord; and thereby Confession and Repentance cannot be meant of that particular fact for which they were then put to death, for that was the service of the emperor their master, and the manifesto styles the authors of their deaths, 'Barbarous, cruel, and inhuman murderers.' But I shall proceed to give your lordship another instance, where there hath been a public absolution to a criminal condemned, and that even at the place of execution, without any special repentance for the crime for which he was about to suffer. And that was in the case of sir Thomas Armstrong, who, by judgment of this court upon an outlawry for high-treason, for conspiring against the king's life and government, was executed at Tyburn in June 1684. In the court he insisted on his innocence, and so he did in a speech which he likewise left with the sheriff at the place of execution; yet, notwithstanding that, the reverend divine that then assisted to prepare him for another world, did in effect the same with these gentlemen that are now defendants (which I humbly submit to your lordship's consideration): for, after a long recommendatory prayer, he useth this benediction; 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us, and in a particular manner with this thy servant, now in the minute of death, and day of judgment.' And then speaking to sir Thomas Armstrong, says, 'Now, Sir, commend yourself to God by your devotions, make yourself ready, and then let that be the last thing you do.' Sir Thomas Armstrong says, 'Sir, I hope in God my sins are pardoned, and I do pray for it heartily. I forgive the world all their offences they have committed against me.' Then the doctor says, 'I pray God shew mercy to you, as you express charity to them;' and then immediately followed the execution. I have dwelt the longer, my lord, on this particular, because it must needs be of very great authority, the reverend divine that then assisted being Dr. Tenuison, now archbishop of Canterbury. [See vol. 10, p. 105, of this Collection.] And the circumstances of that case are much the same with ours: in the indictment the same offence was laid as against sir John Friend and sir William Perkins, he suffered at the same place, and that reverend divine was likewise with him in the cart. There was also a paper delivered by the criminal to the sheriff, declaring his innocence; yet absolution was publicly given at the time and place of execution. Not indeed in the same words as these defendants used, but in those that are as effectual. I think it is apparent, that no particular form of words is requisite to an absolution. Whether we think the power of the church authoritative, or only declarative, whatsoever is an execution of that power that is given by our Saviour in St. John, and denotes the priest's absolving, or the priest's declaring that God doth absolve them, or the priest's recommending them to God for mercy or a pardon for their sins, that, with submission to your lordship, is as much an absolution, as when the priest doth in his own person absolve them. So it is in our morning and evening service, and in the communion, and the service at sea, as I have before mentioned; and yet the rubrick stiles them absolutions. The whole christian church, for the first ten ages, used that form of recommending, and no other; and the Greek church doth still retain the same. St. Cyprian De Lapsis, fol. 136, the Oxford edition, on the words, 'Pro vobis Deum rogare possumus,' the learned Oxford annotators say thus—And I may well stile them the learned annotators, since that great master and judge of all learning, the present bishop of Worcester (Dr. Stillingfleet), in his Vindication of the Trinity, fol. 155, 164, stiles them so. Their annotations are in these words, 'Quantumvis nunc temporis formula judiciaria et potestativa' (Ego te absolvo quasi tradita a Christo per Apostolos feratur, ex adverso compertissimum habetur per decem priora secula in usu minime receptam, imo nec adhuc in Ecclesia Orientali invaluisse.) And that absolutions, ordinations, and consecrations were in a deprecatory form, plainly appears from Morinus, l. 8. De administratione penitentiae, c. 12, sect. 7, fol. 397, 'Ipse Domine remitte, dimitte, condona peccata hujus', N. &c. And this, he says, was the common and vulgar absolution in the Greek church. So Theodorus, who wrote his Penitentiales towards the latter end of the sixth century, (it was published per Jacobum Pettit, in quarto, A. D. 1677, at Paris) in the first book, and the first chapter, page 26, is this absolution, 'Deus omnipotens sit adjutor et protector tuus, et præstet indulgentiam de peccatis tuis;' and many others of the like nature are sparsim through both the volumes. In the roman pontifical there is this absolution, 'Misereatur vestrum, omnipotens Deus, et dimissis peccatis vestris perducatur vos ad vitam æternam.' And likewise in the Ordo Romanus I before cited, fol. 61, is this, which is stiled 'Absolutio singularis: Frater N. absolutum et remissionem peccatorum tuorum, per invocationem sacrali nominis Dei, et per ministerium nostrum, percipere merearis hic et in æternum.' And in the same page are several other absolutions plural and singular, penned after the same manner, in such a deprecatory form, and all stiled absolutions. And in none of these absolutions do I see any enumeration of particular offences, nor have I found in any of these penitentiales, that malefactors are excluded from this absolution. * Mr. Newland, who was about two or three years since condemned and executed for the murder of Mr. Thomas, did positively deny that he was guilty of that fact, or of aiding, assisting, or abetting thereunto. Yet Mr. Stevens not only gave him the sacrament, and that three times, with other company; but likewise gave him absolution, as Mr. Stevens himself hath since in print published to the world. And what is lawful and justifiable at Newgate before three or four persons, cannot become a crime at Tyburn, though it be done in the presence of 500 people; for the place or number of people cannot alter the nature of the fact, and make an innocent action an horrid crime. I am credibly informed, that in the case of Anderton the printer, who was executed for high treason about four or five years since,† there was the same form of prayer used for him by the divine that then assisted, and that at this very place of execution. In the case of Mr. Ashton, who was likewise executed for high treason,† though he expressed no sorrow for his crime, and left a Paper behind him justifying the fact for which he died, yet the same form of prayer, the very same absolution, and at the same place of execution, with all the circumstances of the present case, were used and performed for him; and instead of any reprimand for so doing, the sheriff of Middlesex said thus to the absolvers, as I had it from one that was then present, and set it down in writing; 'Gentlemen, I thank you for performing the last offices so decently.' And, my lord, my clients do insist on it, that on these precedents and this encouragement, they were induced to act as they did at the execution of sir John Freind and sir William Perkins. I have, my lord, looked into the treatises of some divines upon this occasion; and though I find a mighty stir about auricular confession, whether the church doth require that or no, yet I cannot perceive that it is by any insisted on, that there must be in any case a public confession or repentance, no, not even in those cases where public penance is enjoined, unless in some few, where the ecclesiastical court hath made it part of the penance. Mr. Prynne, in his Canterbury's Doom, fol. 192, 3, tells us, that one Mr. Adams preached at St. Mary's church in Cambridge, A. D. 1637, and maintained special confession to the priest to be necessary; for which being summoned before the vice-chancellor, he and several other doctors ordered Mr. Adams to make a recantation of that doctrine, and declare it was only requisite in those cases where people could not quiet their own consciences: and likewise to declare, that it is against true christian liberty, that a man should be bound to the enumerating of his sins, as hath been used heretofore in the times of ignorance and popery. There were indeed some doctors that did oppose this recantation, and justified Mr. Adams, insisting it was needful to make such confession to the priest; but none pretended it was in any case requisite to be made to the people. But, as I said before, the vice-chancellor, and the major part of the doctors, ordered the aforesaid recantation, and well they might; for it is verbatim taken out of the second Homily of Repentance, which book of Homilies was composed by many eminent prelates of our church, and the reading of it enjoined by the rubrick, which is part of the act of uniformity. And that homily doth further say, that it is most evident and plain that auricular confession hath not its warrant from God's word; and it cites St. Austin, who says, 'What have I to do with men, as though they were able to heal my diseases?' and if a penitent be not compelled by the laws of God or holy church to make a particular confession of his sins to the priest, who gives that absolution, much less is he any ways obliged to satisfy the curiosity of the people by enumerating of his offences, or publicly declaring a repentance for his sins. Nor do they any where distinguish the case of condemned criminals from others. But the rules concerning it are general, 'Et generaliter dictum generaliter intelligendum est.' Whatever I find spoken concerning absolution is expressed indefinitely, which falls under another maxim, 'Indefinitum, equipollet universali.' And, my lord, one reason why I take it to be lawful to pronounce absolution to condemned malefactors, is, that be their crimes never so great, the sword of justice doth not strike deeper than the grave, and there is still room for a 'Deus miseratur animæ ejus,' a Lord have mercy on his soul.

* But in the Rubric, prescribing the order of the administration of the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion; the first directions are as follows:

"So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion, shall signify their names to the curate at least some time the day before."

"And if any of these be an open and notorious evil liver, or have done any wrong to his neighbours by word or deed, so that the congregation be thereby offended; the curate having knowledge thereof, shall call him and advertise him, that in any wise he presume not to come to the Lord's table, until he hath openly declared himself to have truly repented and amended his former naughty life; that the congregation may thereby be satisfied, which before were offended; and that he hath recompensed the parties to whom he hath done wrong, or at least declare himself to be in full purpose so to do, as soon as he conveniently may."

Thus I have, with all humility, submitted to your lordships' consideration what I have to say, why the fact, of which these gentlemen stand accused, should in itself be no offence. Neither can it be made a crime, with submission to your lordship, by any ill intention that can be suggested to be adherent to it: For the actions of men shew their hearts; and if their works are not evil, you cannot from them, 'in foro humano,' prove their minds corrupt. Omitting the reason given by my lord chief justice North, on the reversal of the Judgment in the case of Barnardiston and Soame,* I shall trouble your lordship but with two cases, and the reasons of them, to prove the truth of this assertion. The one is Elliot's case, in the last impression of Croke's Charles, fol. 608, where my lord chief justice Vaughan says, it is clear and undoubted law, that whatsoever is in itself lawful cannot have an unlawful intent annexed to it; for then the most innocent act of a man's life would be liable to severe censures. And he instances in this, that a man might then be indicted for high treason, for drinking water with a design to lessen and destroy the customs and revenue, thereby intending to dethrone the king. The other case that I would mention is in Dyer, f. 296, pl. 19, in these words: "A subject of this realm, being a merchant of London, departed out of this realm without licence of the queen, only to the intent that he might live there free from the laws of this realm, and out of his due obedience to the queen, and not upon any account of merchandizing; Whether such a departure were any offence or contempt to the queen, or not? And by the opinions of almost all the justices, such a departure, before an express prohibition or restraint by proclamation, or writ of 'Ne

'exeat regnum' awarded by the king or prince, is not any offence or contempt; for it is a thing indifferent to depart the realm, and the purpose and cause, which is secret in the heart, is not examinable." That is the reason given in the book: And Jenkins, a man much for prerogative, in his second century, cap. 70, fol. 88, agrees this case to be law; and says, That the common law doth not allow an intent to be issuable or triable, and gives this reason for it, "Cor hominis est inscrutabile." Now, my lord, those that will not allow absolution to be a very good act, must grant that it is at least indifferent. And then the cause, purpose, end or intent of it being secret in the heart, is not examinable, and therefore cannot be justly said to be done for raising a rebellion, or causing a disturbance in the kingdom. And I do not know that in any case a man is punishable for an ill intent, except in one species of treason, the compassing the king's death; and in that case the intention must be proved by some overt act directly tending to the fact designed.

2. But I come now to the second point, That if this shall be deemed an offence, yet it is not enquirable nor punishable in this court. I must humbly submit it to your lordship's judgment, whether the power of absolution, which is given to the apostles and their successors by the author and establisher of all lawful power, both ecclesiastical and civil, in these words, in the 20th chapter of St. John, v. 23, 'Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained,' be not an authority far above all ecclesiastical jurisdictions; and these gentlemen, the successors of the apostles, not to be culled to an account for what they did in the execution of that authority, but by Him alone who delegated that power to them. But supposing it should be examinable here on earth, with submission to your lordship, it is only in that court, by those persons, or that sort of men, who conveyed to these gentlemen that power given by our Saviour. And this I shall endeavour to prove. First, from the nature of the thing itself. Their commission for it is their ordination, which laymen cannot give. Nor is it to be tried by the common law; for profession in religion, or infra sacros ordines, is only triable by the ordinary, Co. Lit. 132, b. 2 Inst. 492.

That very learned prelate, the present bishop of Worcester, in his charge to his clergy, fol. 43, tells us out of Cajetan, 'Officium curæ animarum est præcipuum ac spiritualissimum Dei donum.' And the bishop is substituted by our Saviour to give the ordination, which he doth in these words, 'Receive the Holy Ghost now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained.' Now, methinks, a man must naturally infer from hence, that since this authority is derived from our Saviour by the bishops; if any persons on earth can visit and reform the errors or abuses in the execution of this power, it must be those who are intrusted to give the ordination: And of things of this nature their courts have usually had the cognisance. Nay, the privileges of the clergy in old times went much further; for our pious and devout ancestors, following the directions of the son of Sirach, Ecclesiasticus 7, 29, 31, 'Fear the Lord and reverence his priests,' thought they could not pay sufficient respect and honour to the clergy, unless they exempted them from all temporal jurisdiction. So that even in temporal offences, and those of almost the highest nature, murder, and felony of course, and even in sacrilege, if the ordinary would demand the prisoner for his clerk, he was immediately taken from the temporal court, and subjected to the ordinary's jurisdiction, Stanford's Pleas of the Crown, 123, and 3d Institut. 114. And Horn, in his Mirror of Justice, c. 3, sect. 4, asserts, That if, in a temporal court, a clerk accused of any case criminal or mortal, pleads that he is a clerk, the judge had no farther cognisance of the cause; for the church is so enfranchised, that no lay judge can have jurisdiction over a clerk. And the abridgment of the Book of Assizes, tit. Corone, fol. 74, says, that if a clerk will not pray the benefit of his clergy, yet if the Judge knows him to be so, he will not give judgment of death against him, as against a layman. And these privileges would have remained to this day, if acts of parliament had not altered them. And if the clergy were exempted from the temporal jurisdiction for offences of so high nature, if the argument 'a majori ad minus' holds good, they must certainly have been exempted from being punished in temporal courts for all their lesser crimes; and must still be so, where no statute law interposes, and that will lie on the other side to shew.

And so far of late years have the clergy been thought and esteemed to be exempt from the secular power, that on the treaty of the Spanish match, it was agreed, that the Infanta, who was then designed to be our queen, should have her Popish clergy, and a superior over them. And the 14th article runs thus, "that if any secular judge shall apprehend any ecclesiastical person for any offence, he shall forthwith cause him to be delivered to the aforesaid superior ecclesiastical, who shall proceed against him according to the canon law." These articles were then sworn to by the king, prince, and privy council; and therefore we must believe it to be done on very good advice. This is taken notice of by Mr. Rushworth, in his first volume, fol. 87. And although how far and in what cases spiritual were persons formerly out of the reach of the secular power, may admit of some debate; yet nothing is more plain than that spiritual causes cannot be determined by the civil power. 'Judex secularis de rebus spiritualibus cognoscere non debet,' says Fleta, l. 6. c. 37. f. 429. There is (as the incomparably learned Bishop of Worcester has it, in his charge to his clergy, fol. 35), a common law ecclesiastical, which, although in many things it may be the same with the canon law that is read in books, yet hath it not its force from any papal or legatine constitutions, but from the acceptance and practice of it in our churches. And such a law, my lord, is coeval with the very government itself. The learned Selden, in his notes on the 17th chapter of Fortescue, says, That in time of paganism the Druids were the lawyers, and determined controversies; the same persons were their priests and judges. And sir Henry Spelman, in his discourse of Law Terms, tells us, That in the infancy of christianity the bishops and clergymen did hear and determine all causes amongst the christians. And how those matters were settled, when christianity came to be established amongst us, sir Thomas Smith will acquaint your lordship, in his treatise De Republica et Administratione Anglorum; a book I have often heard cited in this court, not only at the bar, but by very learned judges on the bench. In his third book, the 11th chapter, are these words: 'In quatuor potissimum causarum generibus Archiepiscopi Episcopique peculiarem jurisdictionem sortiuntur, in testamentis et legatis, in decimis et mortuariis, in nuptiis, adulterio aut fornicatione, et in iis demum omnibus quæ ad ordinem & decus Ecclesiasticum conservandum et religionem constabiliendam pertinent; nam majores nostri rempublicam primo ordinarunt, postea fidei Christianæ nomen dederrunt et politiam sic constitutam, cum ea quam Apostoli, doctores theologie religionem invexerunt, semper retinuerunt; quicquid ad conscientiarum forum pertinebat, illis utpotè peritioribus, et ob vitæ sanctimoniam morumque probitatem laudatissimis, quibusque confidebant, maxime delegabant.' I shall not take up your lordship's time to prove, out of Magna Charta, and other old laws, that the clergy have rights, liberties, privileges and immunities; but taking that for granted, shall proceed to examine, whether this case doth any way, and how, concern their rights and privileges. It cannot be denied, but that to be exempt from the ordinary and common jurisdiction is an immunity, and to have cognisance of causes is a liberty and privilege: but the question still is, if the clergy are in cases of this nature exempt from the common jurisdiction of the king's temporal courts, and the ecclesiastical judges have cognisance of the offence (if an offence it be) of which these gentlemen stand accused? My lord Coke, in his 5th Report, in the cause of the king's ecclesiastical law, fol. 9, says, "As in temporal causes the king, by the mouth of his judges of justice, doth judge and determine the same by the temporal laws of England; so in causes ecclesiastical and spiritual, as namely, blasphemy, apostacy from christianity, schisms, ordering, that is, (ordination), admissions, institutions of clerks, celebration of divine service, and others, the cognisance whereof belongs not to the common law of England, the same are to be determined and decided by ecclesiastical judges, according to the king's ecclesiastical laws of this realm.¹¹ In the case of Holt and Dighton, in the 12th of king James the first, (it is reported 1 Rolle's Rep. 410.) who were brought up into this court by Habeas Corpus, the return whereof was, that they were committed by the high commission court, and the cause of their commitment was, that they were demanded by the high commission court if they would conform themselves to the custom of the church of England, and receive the sacrament kneeling; and for that they would not give a direct answer to it, they were committed; and though it was moved by serjeant Harvey to have them discharged, yet Coke and Doderidge said, that the high commission court had jurisdiction of schisms and heresies, and in that case they were accused of a schism, and therefore they had jurisdiction of the cause; and so the court remanded them.

Now, my lord, within all and every one of these descriptions of spiritual causes comes this that is now before your lordship; for according to that of sir Thomas Smith, this concerns orders or ordination, for it was by virtue of their ordination that they did it. It relates to the decorum of the church, and concerns the establishment of religion; for the indictment says, it was done to the scandal of the Protestant religion now by law established. And that it is matter of conscience, is in itself apparent. The case comes likewise within my lord Coke's description of spiritual causes; for it concerns ordering and the celebration of divine service; for the question is, Whether they performed it as they ought to do? And the indictment itself shews it; which not only stiles the defendants clerks, but says they did it "ut Presbyteri Ecclesie Anglicanae"; which intimates it was done in celebrating divine service. And if kneeling at the sacrament be a matter of ecclesiastical consueance, and out of the reach of the temporal courts; though the rubric is much more plain and express in that than in our case, yet if that nonconformity be called a schism, it is only examinable in the spiritual courts, whether ours be so or no. And the rather, my lord, shall the bishop's court, or the bishop himself, judge this matter, for that, by the common law ecclesiastical, the bishop is appointed the visitor of all that enter into holy orders, and he is to see if they live and act according to their ordination, and to punish them that do amiss. And absolution is one of the great ends of ordination; and for this purpose doth the bishop make his frequent visitations. Now, my lord, where the law doth appoint a particular visitor, he alone is to look to that charge, and no one else to interfere: and that is the reason why a Mandamus did not formerly go out of this court to restore a monk or friar, nor at this time for a fellow of a college, a proctor of Doctors Commons, or the like. And, I think, on that point the cause of Exeter College was argued against Dr. Berry, in the House of Lords. For this I must crave leave to add, that where the ecclesiastical court hath consueance of any cause, all other things that are incident or relating to it are likewise within their jurisdiction: *Cognitio principalis trahit ad se accessorium.*¹² And the books are so full of instances thereof, that I need not mention any. And if any inferior officer transgresses in acting or doing that which belongs to ecclesiastical consueance, the archbishops and bishops are to punish it, and the temporal judge is not to interfere. Exactions and extortions look more like temporal offences, than what these defendants stand now convicted of; for those in their own nature tend to stir up the people to sedition and rebellion; yet these offences, when committed by spiritual men or in ecclesiastical affairs, by the common law our courts could not meddle with them. Mr. Pryune, in his Animadversions on my lord Coke's fourth Institutes, fol. 233. cites this record out of the petitions in parliament, Anno 18 E. 1. 'Hominibus de London conuerantur de officialibus et ministris Ecclesie de multimodis vexationibus et exactionibus nimis onerosis, per quas plus extorquent de populo quam omnes curie laicales; et petunt quod Rex opponat remedium festinanter, ne destruat populus inbeculto.' The beginning of the king's answer is somewhat doubtfully penned. Mr. Pryune gives it in a distinguishing character: 'Si curia Regis possit emendari, faciat.' But the rest of the answer is direct; 'Can-cellarius emendet in temporalibus, Archiepiscopus faciat in spiritualibus.' But these oppressions and extortions, it seems, continued; and some attempts there were to punish them by indictments at common law; but such indictments were thought illegal: for in the Close Roll of¹³ 16 E. 3, par. 2, mem.

12, dorso, I find a special 'Supersedas pro- cessibus omnibus et singulis coram justiciariis nostris inchoatis seu factis contra viros Ecclesiasticos, cujuscunque conditionis aut status fuerint, super extorsionibus et excessibus per ipsos nostri ac jurium coronæ nostræ pre- judicium in exercitio jurisdictionis Eccle- siasticæ factis.' And that there should be no more new indictments against them before the next parliament. And in the Close Roll 17 E. 3, par. 1, m. 24, dorso, is the like writ to the justices of Oyer and Terminer for the county of Hereford, in which there is a Supersedas to stay the proceedings at common law against some particular persons for those offences. And in the close roll of 18 E. 3, m. 14, dorso, (Sir William Dugdale is mistaken in the year, when he calls it the 17th) is the summons to parliament, the next parliament after the afore- said writs; and the summons runs thus: Quia pro quibusdam arduis et urgentibus ne- gotiis, honorem Dei, et decus et defensionem ecclesie Anglicanæ, et salubre regimen populi et regni nostri Angliæ summe contingentibus, ordinavimus parliamentum nostrum, &c. At which parliament there was an act made, which is in the printed statutes 18 E. 3. c. 6. in these words: "Whereas commissions be newly made to divers justices to make inquiry upon judges of holy church, whether they made just process or excessive in causes testamentary, and other, which notoriously pertaineth to the consuance of holy church: the said justices have inquired, and caused to be indicted judges of holy church, in blemishing the franchise of holy church, that such commissions be repeal- ed, and from henceforth defended." And so the officers of the ecclesiastical courts went on with their oppressions and extortions, and the temporal courts could not lay hold of them for those offences, as appears by several peti- tions and answers in the parliament rolls, 21 E. 3, n. 51. 1 H. 5, n. 23, till the statute, 21 H. 8, c. 5, brought them within the consu- ance of the courts of common law. And if the archbishops and bishops can alone, (the sta- tute being out of the case) exclusive of all secular power, look after and punish the irregulari- ties of their commissaries, though they tended to the prejudice of the king and his royal pre- rogative, their power must be full as great over all ecclesiastics, and in an eminent manner over the clergy, in all matters relating to their func- tion, and especially in all things which concern the discipline of the church, of which the bishops are judges, as well as of the doctrine. Bracton, in his fifth Book, 'De Exceptionibus,' c. 2, fol. 401, a, treating concerning the ju- risdiction of courts hath this expression: 'Clericus in nullo conveniendus est coram judice seculari, quod pertineat ad forum Ec- clesiasticum, sicut in causis spiritualibus, vel spiritualitati annexis, ut si pro peccato vel transgressionem fuerit penitentia injungenda, et quo casu Juxta Ecclesiasticum habet cog- nitionem; quia non pertineat ad Regem in- jungere penitentias, nec ad judicem secula- rem, nec etiam ad eos pertinet cognoscere de iis, sunt quæ spiritualibus annexa.' And if the temporal courts cannot hold plea 'de peniten- tia injungenda,' certainly they cannot punish 'pro penitentia non declarata.' Besides, I think it cannot be denied, that absolution is spiritual, 'vel saltem spiritualitati annexa.' More instances I could produce, if I thought it necessary, to prove that where the ecclesias- tical court hath consuance of the celebration of divine service or other spiritual matters, it must hold plea of what is incident or belonging to it; and therefore of the mind, intention, and de- sign with which any spiritual office is perform- ed, if such mind can be fathomed, and inten- tion punished. And I presume, my lord, there will be no occasion to prove that all the, rights, liberties, privileges and immunities, that the clergy lawfully enjoyed in the time of popery, do still belong to the present church of England, unless they are taken away or altered by act of parliament; for though the errors were corrected, and abuses reformed in matters of doctrine and of foreign jurisdiction, yet the legal rights of the church, and power of the clergy, were not shaken or invaded by the re- formation.

'prejudicium in exercitio jurisdictionis Eccle- siasticæ factis, usque ad proximum parliamen- tum nostrum supersederi faciatis; et Vic' nostr' com' prædict' detis in mandatis, quod exigend' in ipsos vel eorum aliquem pmissa occasione promulgand' usque ad dictum par- liamentum nostrum supersedeat: ac vos in- quætionibus super extorsionibus et excessibus hujusmodi contra dictos viros Ecclesiasticos citra parliamentum prædict' de novo capiend' similiter supersedeatis, juxta promissionem nostram prædict. (T. ut supra)."

And there is a space in the roll, supposed to be left for entering of other writs of the like nature, that were then issued forth.

3. And now, my lord, I come to the third and last point I propose to speak to; and that is, supposing what these gentlemen stand ac- cused of is an offence, and that this court hath consuance of it; yet, with submission to your lordship, there is no judgment to be given against us on this indictment. I believe the king's counsel cannot shew me any rule at common law concerning absolution. So that, if we are guilty of any offence, it is for not ob- serving the Rubric. If we have acted accord- ing to the letter and intent of that, no indict- ment will lie against us for the fact we are now accused of: and if we have deviated from the Rubric, then the indictment ought to have been framed on the act of uniformity. It is a rule laid down in our books, That where a statute makes that an offence was not so before, an indictment for that offence must conclude 'contra formam statuti.' So is 1 Saunderson

240. 2 Rolle's Abr. 82. 1 Croke 449, and Jones: 379. And I could instance in many precedents that are drawn accordingly. I shall mention some few on this very act of parliament. They are all in the same term, Mich. 15 and 16 queen Eliz. in this court, and against the same person, Robert Johnson, of St. Clements Dunes, clerk. One of the indictments is 'for speaking against the Book of Common Prayer, contra formam statuti.' Another against him, 'for omitting the Litany, Epistle and Gospel, in saying the Divine Service.' Another against him, 'for christening a child, and not signing him with the sign of the cross.' another against him, 'for marrying a couple without a wedding ring.' another against the same person, 'for saying morning and evening service without a surplice.' And though the preamble and inducement to every one of these indictments make an heavy complaint against the person that is so indicted, as if he intended to destroy the Protestant religion by law established, and overthrow the government, yet they all conclude 'contra formam statuti.' Now, my lord, according to the rule and precedents I have cited, this indictment that is now before your lordship should have set forth, that the defendants did not move sir John Friend and sir William Perkins to a special confession of their sins, but without it gave them absolution, 'contra formam statuti.' But supposing, my lord, it should be answered, that the indictment is rather for the ill intention of the defendants, than for not observing the Rubric; with humble submission to your lordship, if such an indictment may be brought, yet this before your lordship is not rightly framed, but is insufficient and uncertain in relation to that very intent: For the indictment says, these defendants conspiring, intending, and designing the execrable, horrible, and detestable treason, for which sir John Friend and sir William Perkins were then just going to be executed, to justify, or at least to extenuate, diminish, and undervalue, &c. did absolve them. Now, my lord, non constat which they aimed at, justifying or undervaluing; and they cannot be found guilty of all: for though the verdict be general as to this, yet it is according to the indictment, which is in the disjunctive, 'Et in disjunctivis sufficit unum verificari.' Therefore our common law doth always require certainty, but especially in indictments; they ought to be certain to every intent, that a certain judgment may be given on them. Where a man in pleading sets forth his title by a conveyance, in which are the words 'give, grant, release, confirm, bargain, sell,' &c. he must shew which of them he makes use of; and which he applies to his purpose, or else his plea is naught, 1 Ventr. 109. The return of a Habeas Corpus sets forth the commitment, 'Et hæc est causa captionis seu detentionis,' adjudged an ill return, 1 Ventr. 324. In Trinity Term last, in this court, there were several indictments against Baker and others for exercising the trade of a rope-maker, 'existens

'misterium infra regnum Angliæ vel Walliæ' and there, although the offence was the same whether it were a trade in England or Wales, yet for the uncertainty which the disjunctive made, the indictment was quashed. And in the last term (H. 9 W. 3. B. R.) Sanky and another quaker were brought up by Habeas Corpus,* and the return set forth a commitment by two justices, by virtue of the statute 27 H. 8, c. 20, reciting a certificate from the commissary, that a cause of subtraction of tythes or other ecclesiastical duty was depending in the ecclesiastical court, to which the defendants refused to answer. In that cause, though the words of the act of parliament are strictly pursued, which gives the same remedy where the fact is for other ecclesiastical dues as it does for tythes, yet because the certificate on which the return was grounded, did not set forth in particular for what the suit was commenced in the ecclesiastical court, but only in the disjunctive, for that reason the commitment was held insufficient, and the parties discharged. In Mr. Rowe's case, Bendlow, fol. 60, in Replevin, the plaintiff claims common appurtenant to a manor or a messuage called Cursall Grange, by prescription, and they were at issue on the prescription; but in arrest of taking the inquest, it was shewn to the court, that the prescription was uncertain for the common, to wit, to the manor or messuage: where he ought to have claimed it to one only. And the court adjudged them to re-plead, though the place itself was expressly and certainly named, and called Cursall Grange. In the same book, fol. 177, pl. 39, an ejectment 'de una acra terræ sive prati' adjudged ill; and so is the same case reported, Dyer 264, pl. 39, and 1 And. 31, pl. 73. An inquisition on a 'diem clausit extremum' finds, that a man was seized 'de uno messuagio sive tenemento,' was held void and insufficient, Ley. 9, 13 Rep. 48. So an ejectment 'de uno messuagio sive tenemento' is ill, even after a verdict, 1 Rolle's Rep. 7, 334. 2 Rolle's Abr. 80. 3 Lennard, 228. Ley. 43. 3 Cor. 621. 1 Siderfin, 295. 1 Cro. 188, and many other books. And in Noy's Reports, on the like occasion, it is said, that a writ in the disjunctive is void. And in Popham, fol. 203, it is held, that an ejectment 'de burgagio sive tenemento' is naught. Though indeed in serjeant Hardresse's Reports, fol. 173, in the case of Danvers versus Willington, it was held, that an ejectment 'pro uno messuagio sive burgagio' in Hay infra Muros was good enough; but the reason given was, because 'messuagium et burgagium' signify the same thing in a borough. There was a cause (Paach. or Tr. 8 W. 3.) about two years since in this court, it was an indictment against Stoker, for that he 'fabricavit, seu fabricari causavit,' a certain bill† Exception was taken to it, because it was in the disjunctive, whereas it ought to have been positive and particular. And I think the counsel for the prosecutor could never get over that exception; and, to the best of my remembrance, there was but one answer that was aimed at, and that was, that the offence and fact were the same; for he that caused it to be counterfeited, might be truly said to counterfeit it: but I think that was not held a good answer to that exception. But in our case that cannot be pretended: 'Justificare' and 'Vilipendere' are of a very different signification. The very indictment doth insinuate as much; 'Justificare, vel saltem extenuare, diminuere, et vilipendere.' The 'vel saltem' doth shew, that the subsequent words are not of so great force as those precedent. And indeed almost opposite they are; for he that justifies, denies that it was an offence; whilst he that diminishes or undervalues it, says truly, it was an offence, but not so great as is pretended. And, my lord, by reason of this uncertainty, the court must be in doubt what judgment to give; for it is evident, he that would justify sir John Freind's offence would deserve a greater punishment, than he that should only lessen it, and say it was not so great an offence as Charnock's. Such an invasion is not so horrid and villainous, nor of so deep a dye, as that barbarous assassination that was intended. After such a manner, methinks, a man might lawfully extenuate an offence, when it would be highly criminal to maintain and justify the fact. Besides, 'Vilipendere' may be taken to vilify, contemn, and condemn the fact; and must that be thought a crime? And the negon afterwards, with those other aggravations that are there added, cannot mead the matter: for all that harangue of persuading persons that sir John Freind and sir William Perkins were innocent, and the inciting the people to treason and rebellion, depend purely on the justification or extenuation of the crime; for if the fact were justified, people would be sooner induced to follow their example, than if it were acknowledged to be an offence, but the heinousness of it lessened, diminished, or vilified. And which of these the defendants aimed at was doubtful to him that drew the indictment, doubtful to the jury, and therefore I hope the court will give no judgment on it. Besides this, my lord, there is, I presume, another exception that may prove fatal to this indictment; and that is, the insufficient setting forth the attainders of sir John Freind and sir William Perkins, in not shewing when, where, or before what judges they were attainted, which, with submission to your lordship, ought of necessity to have been done. I acknowledge that a bare inducement requires not much certainty: but when it is such a matter, on which the whole doth so depend that you can make nothing without it, and when it is traversable, then it is substance, and must of necessity be certainly expressed. For instance, if J. S. be accused, either civilly or criminally, of an offence, which is not so but with relation to a fact of J. D. there the fact of J. D. must be certainly expressed. As in Hetley, 73. 3 Cro. 752. Plowman, a constable, was indicted for suffering one, who was arrested 'pro quodam felonia antea facta,' to escape; and because it was not shewn what felony it was, and when done, he was discharged. So in this case, if it be an offence to absolve traitors, whether they are attainted or no, then the treason ought to be specially and particularly set forth, and when and where it was committed: but if it be not an offence to absolve traitors, unless they are attainted, then that attainer ought to be as fully and plainly expressed as the time and place where those traitors were executed, which in this indictment is carefully set forth. And that this indictment is faulty in this particular, I shall endeavour to prove, as well by precedents, as by the opinions and judgments in our books of law. But inasmuch as this indictment is 'primæ impressionis,' I must trespass on your lordship's patience, whilst I refer to other precedents in which records are mentioned and recited, and from a parity of reason reduce them to the present case. I shall begin with precedents of declarations. If an action of debt be brought against a sheriff for the escape of one in execution, the time and place, and the court in which the judgment was obtained, is always mentioned, Hern. 74. Robinson, 311. Brown's Entries, 1 par. 18. 2 par. 15. Brownlow's Lat. Rediviv. 33. Thompson, 122. and Vidian 193, 197. and several other books.

* See Lord Raymond, 323. Holt, 657. 12 Mod. Rep. 165.

So against a sheriff for not taking one in execution that was in his presence, sets forth the judgment, and out of what court, when and where the execution issued. Upper Bench Precedents, 79. Aston, 57. 2 Brownlow, 35, 36.

An action for maliciously indicting the plaintiff for felony sets forth, when, where, and before whom the indictment was. Vidian, 145. Hansard, 24, 25, and 53.

An information against one for taking and carrying away the goods of a felo de se, sets forth the inquisition, and before whom it was taken. Old Book of Entries, 225, b.

An information for intruding into lands which came to the king's hands by attainer, sets forth the record of attainer, where, when, and before whom. Rastall's Entries, 387, 412. Plowden's Commentaries, 547. Ashton, 181.

And so, my lord, in all good precedents, where records of attainer are mentioned, the time, place and court are always set forth. So is Wiat's attainer, Co. Entries, 79. Rastall, 413, b. Plowden's Com. 449.

So is Littleton's attainer, Co. Entries, 422, b. And Trussell's attainer, Co. Entries, 246, b. the duke of Somerset's attainer, Co. Entries, 481, and the attainer of John Bary, in the same book, fol. 699.

So if the master of the Crown-Office takes an inquisition concerning the escape of any prisoners of this court, according to the 39th of H. 6, c. 33, the record on which they were committed is fully taken notice of, as I have seen a precedent, Mich. 4 & 5 Ill. Hos. 7. In the case of Mr. Braddon and Mr. Speake, the indictment* doth not only say that my lord Essex did murder himself at such a time and place, but adds further, 'as by inquisition taken at the Tower of London aforesaid, upon view of the body of the said Arthur earl of Essex, and now in this court remaining of record, does more plainly appear.' So the indictment against Tasborough and Price,† for suborning Dugdale to retract his evidence that he had given against the Popish Recusants, &c. sets forth the record, where and before whom such convictions were. So in the case of Thompson, Pain and Farewel, for printing and publishing a scandalous pamphlet relating to sir Edmond-bury Godfrey's death, the information‡ doth not begin like this indictment, 'Whereas Green, Bury, and Hill, were attainted of murder;' but sets forth, That it was in such a court, in such a year and term, with the indictment and attainder at large, and where the record is to be found.

I could instance in many more precedents of the like nature; but I fear I have tired your lordship's patience too much already, and therefore shall conclude with one that will lead me to the opinions and judgments in our books of law, which I hope will be of use to fortify the precedents I have cited to prove this indictment vicious. It is in Keilway, 193. An inquisition that finds the attainder of one Bays: the record is large, and therefore I shall not recite it, nor make any other observations on it than what are in the very report, which are in these words: "Memorandum. This Inquisition was drawn by good advice, that is to say, by the council of king Henry the 7th; yet the inquisition which entitled the king to the land, by reason of the attainder of the said Bays, doth not make any mention of the indictors, nor of the names of the justices of peace who took the indictment, but only the day of the indictment taken, and the day of his attainder, without expressly mentioning what kind of felony, but 'pro quadam felonis,' and the names of the justices before whom he was attainted." These are the words of the reporter: and, my lord, that this case is of general concern, appears by the next case in that book, Keilway, 194. An indictment was found on the escape of certain persons convict, without shewing before what justices the conviction was; and after the matter was considered at the bar and the bench, the indictment was held insufficient; but says that case, "The names of the justices of peace before whom the original indictment was taken is not material, nor the specifying of the felony, 'prout patet supra' in the case of Bays; for where the court is instructed to whom to write to certify the record, all the special matter shall come in by the certificate; and although the justices of gaol-delivery, or other justices, before whom the conviction or attainder is, do not certify the original, it is not material, so that they certify the body of the record of the attainder or conviction." These are the words of that book; and, my lord, it must be on the same reason, that where a man pleads a conviction of recusancy, he must shew before whom it was, Noy, 89. 97. And so are the precedents in Winche's Entries, 522, 523, 524. 2 Brownl. 15. Hern. 503. So in an action for maliciously indicting a man for treason, it is not sufficient to say he did indict the plaintiff; nay, if he adds coram such persons, justices of the peace, and omits 'ad gaolam deliberand' assignat', it is ill, 2 Cro. 357. And in an action for maliciously indicting a man of perjury, he must set forth the indictment, and shew that it was preferred before one that had consance of such matters. And that is not all; he must likewise shew, that the cause in which he swore was coram iudice, 3 Cro. 725. He that pleads a presentment in a court leet, must set forth the day when the court was holden, 3 Spanders, 290. 1 Ventris, 107. And therefore to plead that at 'quandam curiam' he was amerced, is ill, Modern Rep. 75.

An indictment of maintenance in 'quodam placito coram Domino Rege pendente,' not mentioning where the King's-Bench sat, was held fatal in arrest of judgment, 1 Ventr. 302.

An indictment for a second offence, where the punishment is greater than for the first, ought to recite the former conviction, 1 Leonard, 295. So it was done in Roger Booth's Case, Mo. 666, pl. 913. In 3 Keble, 737, an indictment for a second offence of printing did set forth the first, but did not say where it was; therefore Twisden held the indictment naught. And if there be a necessity of setting forth so precisely the first conviction, to make the second offence the greater, methinks, in reason, it must as certainly be set forth, where it gives the very esse to the offence. And if such a general way of referring to records should be allowed in indictments, it would not only overthrow all the precedents and other authorities I have cited, but the defendants must needs lie under several inconveniences. They would then be cut off from the privilege of pleading 'Nul tiel Record,' or traversing it, as was done in Bays's Case before-mentioned: for, although such a traverse might amount almost to the general issue, yet comprehending matter of law, the defendants may plead it specially, Hobart, 127. And if the defendants plead the general issue, how shall they know where to go to find out the record, to see whether a true copy be produced against them? And it cannot be a sufficient answer to say, that the indictment sets forth that 'debite et legitime' they were convicted and attainted; it must be shewn after what manner they were attainted, that the court may judge whether it was legally done or no. In Patrick Harding's Case, in the first year of this king and the late queen (it is reported in 2 Vent. 310,* the indictment against him was for high-treason, and did set forth that he adhered to the king's enemies. The jury found, that he listed and sent soldiers to the French king, then an enemy to our king and queen: but the court held the indictment too short there, because it mentioned hostibus et inimicis generally; whereas it should have set forth who those enemies were, that the court might take notice whether they were enemies, as the law intended.

In the case of Woody and Bezly, 2 Cro. 291. Yelverton 213. 1 Brownlow 114. In debt for rent upon a lease for years, the plaintiff derives his title by the grant of the reversion by way of bargain and sale in fee from the first lessor, and declares, that by indenture of such a date, one grants, bargains and sells for money to him the reversion in fee, which indenture was inrolled such a day secundum formam statuti; and on nil debet pleaded, there was a verdict for the plaintiff: yet judgment was arrested, because the plaintiff had not shewn in what court the indenture was inrolled; though it might have been, and undoubtedly it was alleged, that it was but a conveyance to the title, and an inducement to the action, and secundum formam statuti shews it was debita et legitime. So in Allen 12. King against Somerset. In debt for rent the plaintiff declares on a lease for years made by a stranger, who bargained and sold the reversion per indenturam debito modo inrolat in Curia Cancellaria. After a verdict for the plaintiff, on nil debet pleaded, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that he had not alleged the inrollment to be within six months, nor secundum formam statuti; and though it were said to be debito modo, yet that would not mend the matter, nor aid the uncertainty, and therefore judgment was arrested. So in the same book and folio, Colman against Painter. In an action by the lessee against his lessor on a covenant for peaceable enjoyment, he assigns for breach a former lease to J. S. The defendant pleads, that the lease to J. S. was with condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent, and that before the lease made to the plaintiff, the rent was behind, and legitime demandat secundum formam indenturæ, and upon non-payment he re-entered, and made the lease to the plaintiff: and upon demurrer it was resolved, that the demand was insufficiently alleged; for, says the book, he ought to set forth certainly, when and where it was made, that it might appear to the court to be legal.

I shall trouble your lordship but with one case more to this point; it is in 3 Lennard 72. A Quo Warranto was brought by the queen against sir John Constable, who claimed certain wreck in the county of York. The defendant pleaded, that Edward duke of Buckingham was seized of such a manor, to which he had wreck appendant, and that he was de alta proditione debito modo attinctus, and that found before the escheator; and shewed further, that that manor descended to queen Mary, who granted the same to the earl of Westmoreland, who granted the same to the defendant: upon which it was demurred; and exception was taken to the plea, because the attainder is not fully and certainly pleaded. It was argued by Plowden, counsel for the defendant, that the attainder was certainly pleaded, scilicet, debito modo attinctus. For, says he, it is shewn that the wreck is appendant to the manor, and then if he hath the manor, he hath the wreck also: and if he had the manor, it is not material to the queen how he hath it; for the queen doth not claim the same, but impeacheth the defendant for using there such a liberty. But he there grants, that if the heir of the duke had demanded the manor there against him, the attainder ought to have been pleaded certainly. And if so much certainty be required in pleading an attainder that makes a title to an estate, that attainder must needs be as fully, as clearly, and as certainly set forth; that is the ground-work and foundation of an indictment for that which is called a very great offence, which is not for absolving two persons in the parish of Paddington, nor for absolving two impenitent traitors, but for absolving two persons attainted of high-treason, who did not repent of that treason of which they were attainted.

There are, my lord, I think, some other faults in the indictment. It mentions, That sir John Freind and sir William Perkins were attainted for high-treason, in compassing the king's death, and adhering to his enemies; which were two treasons in each of them, and consequently four in all. Yet afterwards the indictment says, that these defendants intending to justify the horrid treason aforesaid (in the singular number.) So in the conclusion, that the absolution was given absque aliqua pœnitentia pro alta proditione prædicta prius declarata, without shewing which treason in particular was unrepented of; and each of them was not obliged to repent of all the treasons, for they were not all his own. And it like the case this very term in this court, where a rescous was returned against two persons, that they had rescued J. S. prædict without shewing which, and there was J. S. senior, and J. S. junior before-mentioned; and for this uncertainty that return was quashed. And it seems to me to bear some resemblance to the case of Tindall and Cobbs, 3 Lennard, fol. 9, 10. In an action of waste, the declaration shews the demise of the manor of Wolverton and other lands, and assigns the waste in quodam bosco vocat Wolverton Wood, parcel premissos; and it was held insufficient, for that it could not be parcel of the manor and other lands also.

I must likewise humbly submit it to your lordship, whether the fact itself be sufficiently set forth, et esse absque pœnitentia verum, pronounced them to be absolved: whether it does not refer to somewhat to be done hereafter, and ought not rather to have been, 'eos absolvere pronuntiaverunt.'

* See, also, in vol. 13, p. 645. of this Collection, a Note of Patrick Harding's Case from the MSS. of sir Patrick Williams.

The proclamation for evidence before the jury is sworn, which ought to be after, and several other informalities in the indictment and proceedings, I should have spoken to; and have justified and maintained the imposition of hands, from the doctrine and practice of our church; and likewise have said somewhat to the matter that is specially found, to prove that these defendants are thereby acquitted of the whole: but these things will (I doubt not) be much better done by such other counsel as your lordship shall please to hear for the defendants. I am sensible I have already been too tedious, for which I humbly beg pardon of your lordship, and pray your judgment for the defendants.

392. The Trial of JOSEPH DAWSON, EDWARD FORSEITH, WILLIAM MAY, WM. BISHOP, JAMES LEWIS, and JOHN SPARKES, at the Old-Bailey, for Felony and Piracy: 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.*

Admir. Angl. ss.

THE Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, and gaol delivery, held for our sovereign lord the king, for the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, at Justice Hall in the Old Bailey, in the suburbs of the city of London, on Monday the 19th day of October, in the 8th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord king William the 3d, over England. &c. before the right hon. Edward Russel, esq. Henry Priestman, esq.; sir Robert Rich, kt. and bart.; sir George Rooke, kt. sir John Houbton, kt. and James Kendal, esq. Commissioners for executing and exercising the office and place of Lord High Admiral of England, respectively assigned and deputed; the right worshipful sir Charles Hedges, kt. Doctor of Law, Lieutenant in the High Court of Admiralty of England, Commissary General of our sovereign lord the king, and President and Judge of the said court; the right hon. sir John Holt, kt. Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench; sir George Treby, kt. Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; sir Edward Ward, kt. Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; sir Thomas Rokeby, kt. and one of the Justices of the King's Bench; sir Samuel Eyre, kt. another of the Justices of the King's Bench; sir John Turton, kt. another of the Justices of the King's Bench; sir John Powell, kt. one of the Justices of the Common Pleas; sir Littleton Powis, kt. one of the Barons of the Exchequer; William Bridgeman and Jonas Burchet, esqrs.; Secretaries of the Admiralty of England; Thomas Lane, William King, and John Cooke, respectively Doctors of Laws; and others his Majesty's Justices named in the said Commission.

* This case, under the name of Rex v. May, Bishop and others, is cited in East's Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ch. 17, s. 3, from a Manuscript Commentary by Mr. Justice Treby upon Lord Hale's Summary, of which an account is given by Mr. East immediately after the preceding Treatise.

His Majesty's Commissioners being then and there met, the Commission was read, and proclamation made for attendance: After which, the gentlemen of the grand jury were called and sworn, and received their charge from sir Charles Hedges, kt. Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, who set forth unto them the nature of the Commission, the extent of the jurisdiction of the court, and the subject matter of their enquiries.

Then the witnesses for the king being sworn, the grand jury withdrew, and after a little time returned, finding Billa vera against Henry Every, not yet taken, Joseph Dawson, Edward Forseith, William May, William Bishop, James Lewis, and John Sparkes, prisoners, for feloniously and piratically taking and carrying away, from persons unknown, a certain ship called the Gunsway, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, to the value of 1,000*l.* and goods to the value of 110*l.* together with 100,000 pieces of eight, and 100,000 chequins, upon the high seas, ten leagues from the cape St. Johns, near Surat in the East Indies. Then Dawson, Forseith, May, Bishop, Lewis, and Sparkes, were brought to the bar, and their indictment was read.

Joseph Dawson confessed that he was Guilty; but the rest pleaded Not Guilty, and put themselves upon their trials; and thereupon the petty jury was called, and the persons whose names follow were sworn: William Walker, John Child, Edward Leeds, Thomas Clarke, Nathan Green, Henry Sherbrooke, Benjamin Dry, John Sherbrooke, Samuel Jackson, Thomas Emms, Henry Hunter, John Hall.

Then the King's Learned Counsel opened the Indictment, &c. and

Dr. Newton made a Speech, which is as follows:

My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury;

The prisoners are indicted for piracy, in robbing and plundering the ship Gunsway, belonging to the Great Mogul and his subjects, in the Indian seas, to a very great value.

And the end was suitable to their beginning; they first practised these crimes upon their own countrymen, the English, and then continued them on to strangers and foreigners: For the ship in which this piracy was committed, was an English vessel, called the Charles the Second, belonging to several merchants of this city, designed for other ends, and a far different voyage, which by these criminals, with the assistance of one Every, their captain in all those villainies, was seized near the Groyne in Spain, in May 1694, from which place, having first, by force, set captain Gibson the commander on shore, they carried off the ship, and with it committed many and great piracies for several years (as will appear in the course of the evidence) in most of the parts of the known world, without distinction, upon all nations, and persons of all religions.

Their last piracy was this in the Indies, the greatest in itself, and like to be the most pernicious in its consequences, especially as to trade, considering the power of the Great Mogul, and the natural inclination of the Indians to revenge: But they are now brought hither on their trial, and, if the matters they are charged with shall be proved, to receive that judgment from you their crime deserves; and that is piracy, which by so much exceeds theft or robbery at land, as the interest and concerns of kingdoms and nations are above those of private families, or particular persons: For suffer pirates, and the commerce of the world must cease, which this nation has deservedly so great a share in, and reaps such mighty advantage by: And if they shall go away unpunished, when it is known whose subjects they are, the consequence may be, to involve the nations concerned in war and blood, to the destruction of the innocent English in those countries, the total loss of the Indian trade, and thereby the impoverishment of this kingdom.

The Witnesses for the king, viz. John Dan and Philip Middleton, were then called and sworn, and in the opinion of the court gave a full evidence against the prisoners, which was very clearly summed up by the lord chief justice Holt; the tenour whereof is particularly set forth in the following Trials; but the jury, contrary to the expectation of the court, brought in all the prisoners Not Guilty; whereupon the sessions was adjourned to Saturday the 31st of October following, and the prisoners were committed upon a new warrant for several other piracies.

October 31, 1696.

The Court being sat (at which were present Sir Charles Hedges, judge of the high court of Admiralty, the lord chief justice Holt, the lord chief justice Treby, the lord chief baron Ward, Mr. justice Roakey, Mr. justice Torton, Mr. justice Byre, Mr. baron Powis, Dr. Lane, Dr. King, and Dr. Cook), the court proceeded in this manner.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes. All manner of persons that have any thing more to do at this sessions, draw near and give your attendance; and you sheriffs of the city of London, return the several precepts directed to you, and returnable here this day, upon pain and peril that shall follow thereon.

Then the grand Jury were called over, and the appearances marked.

Cl. of Ar. Make proclamation.

Cryer. O Yes, &c. The lords the king's justices charge and command all persons to keep silence while the charge is giving.

Sir Charles Hedges, the Judge of the Admiralty, said to the Grand Jury upon this occasion:

Gentlemen of the Grand Jury;

The opinion which this court had of the good intentions, abilities, and integrity of the last Grand Jury was so fully answered at our late meeting in this place, that I am confident all good Englishmen, who were witnesses of their proceedings, will concur in giving them public thanks for the good services which they then performed: I wish that all others, who were concerned in the dispatch of that day's business, had the like pretence to have the same; the public justice of the nation would not then have lain under any manner of reproach, neither would you have had this farther trouble. But seeing that it hath so happened, it is become absolutely necessary that a farther and a strict enquiry should be made after those crimes which threaten, and tend to the destruction of our navigation and trade; and therefore I am assured of your patience, whilst I shew you briefly:

1. What the crimes are, which you are to enquire after.
2. How far the jurisdiction and your power in making these enquiries doth extend.
3. What is the duty incumbent on you in this behalf.

1. As to the crimes, I shall not repeat what was mentioned touching all the particulars thereof, at the opening of this sessions; but confine my discourse to those, which I find by the calendar will, at this time, necessarily fall under your examination; and those are piracies.

Now piracy is only a sea-term for robbery, piracy being a robbery committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. If any man be assaulted within that jurisdiction, and his ship or goods violently taken away without legal authority, this is robbery and piracy. If the mariners of any ship shall violently dispossess the master, and afterwards carry away the ship itself, or any of the goods, or tackle, apparel or furniture, with a felonious intention, in any place where the lord Admiral hath, or pretends to have jurisdiction, this is also robbery and piracy. The intention will, in these cases, appear by considering the end for which the fact was committed; and the end will be known, if the evidence shall shew you what hath been done.

2. Now the jurisdiction of the admiralty is declared and described in the statute and commission, by virtue of which we here meet, and is extended throughout all seas, and the ports, havens, creeks, and rivers beneath the first bridges next the sea, even unto the higher water-mark.

The king of England hath not only an empire and sovereignty over the British seas, but also an undoubted jurisdiction and power, in concurrence with other princes and states, for the punishment of all piracies and robberies at sea, in the most remote parts of the world; so that if any person whatsoever, native or foreigner, Christian or Infidel, Turk or Pagan, with whose country we have no war, with whom we hold trade and correspondence, and are in amity, shall be robbed or spoiled in the Narrow Seas, the Mediterranean, Atlantic, Southern, or any other seas, or the branches thereof, either on this or the other side of the line, it is piracy within the limits of your enquiry, and the cognizance of this court.

3. Concerning the duty incumbent upon you in making your enquiries and presentments, you may consider that there is a great trust and authority committed to you; and therefore it will be expected that a suitable care should be had, and your power executed according to a well-regulated discretion; as you are, on the one hand, to take care that the court be not troubled, nor any man put in hazard of his life, through any frivolous, or malicious prosecution; so, on the other side, and more especially in the cases of great and public offences, you are to use your utmost endeavours that justice, the support of government, be not obstructed by any partial proceedings.

You are not obliged in all cases to require a clear and full evidence, but only to examine till you find, and are satisfied in your consciences, that there is sufficient and just cause to put the party accused upon his trial. You cannot convict, but may in effect acquit the greatest criminals; and therefore, if you do but find proofs enough to create a presumption against the party accused, when the case seems odious, and is of great consequence and importance, your safest way is to put it in a proper method for the petty jury, who are to receive full satisfaction from the evidence that shall be given in the presence of the party; and according to that evidence, have power to determine whether guilty, or not guilty, condemn, as well as acquit.

And upon this occasion, seeing many who are upon that service are present, it seems fit that they should also know that they have no power to do more or less than what is agreeable to the evidence: they are not to interpose in points of law, or to be swayed by any consideration whatsoever, but what shall arise from the proofs judicially made; they are indeed judges of the fact, but they are not arbitrary; they are as much restrained by the dictates of conscience, informed, and convinced by reasonable proofs, as the judges on the bench are by the rules of law.

No man can believe just as he lists; and therefore a determination, or judgment at will and pleasure, will never be thought to deserve the name of a verdict: for whatever may be pretended, the world will not be persuaded that a jury hath pursued the dictates of conscience, unless some reasonable grounds for its proceedings shall appear; and therefore, whenever it shall happen that notorious malefactors escape unpunished, notwithstanding that in the opinion of most good men there was a full and sufficient evidence for their conviction, it is to be wished, and indeed it seems to me to be necessary, in cases that relate to the laws of nations, that the reasons which induced such a determination, should be given for the public satisfaction; otherwise, since foreigners look upon the decrees of our courts of justice as the sense and judgment of the whole nation, our enemies will be glad to find an occasion to say, that such miscreants as are out of the protection of all laws, and civil government, are abetted by those who contend for the sovereignty of the seas. The barbarous nations will reproach us as being a harbour, receptacle, and nest of pirates; and our friends will wonder to hear that the enemies of merchants and of mankind, should find a sanctuary in this ancient place of trade. Nay, we ourselves cannot but confess, that all kingdoms and countries who have suffered by English pirates, may, for want of redress in the ordinary course, have the pretence of justice, and the colour of the laws of nations to justify their making reprisals upon our merchants, wheresoever they shall meet them upon the seas. If a jury happens in these cases to be too severe, there is room for mercy, and I am confident, that, upon a just representation, the innocent never failed of obtaining it: but for a fault, neglect, or error on the other hand, there is no relief for injured foreigners, but by their carving out, as we may be sure they will, for themselves, such a satisfaction, upon our merchants, as they shall think fit, whenever they shall have an opportunity; and so our whole nation must unavoidably suffer both in reputation and interest, and all as it were through our own default.

I hope what hath been said upon this unexpected occasion, will not be looked upon as intended to influence any jury; I am sure it is far from being so designed: religion, conscience, honour, common honesty, humanity, and all laws, forbid such methods: there is no doubt but the judge, as well as the jurymen, then best discharge his duty, when he proceeds without favour or affection, hatred or ill-will, or any partial respect whatsoever.

Every man ought to be extremely tender of such a person as he has reason to believe is innocent; but it should be considered likewise, on the other side, that he who brings a notorious pirate, or common malefactor to justice, contributes to the safety and preservation of the lives of many, both bad and good; of the good, by means of the assurance of protection, and of the bad too, by the terror of justice. It was upon this consideration that the Roman emperors in their edicts made this piece of service for the public good, as meritorious as any act of piety, or religious worship.

Our own laws demonstrate how much our legislators, and particularly how highly that great prince king Henry the fifth, and his parliament, thought this nation concerned in providing for the security of traders, and scouring the seas of rovers and free-booters. Certainly there never was any age wherein our ancestors were not extraordinary zealous in that affair, looking upon it, as it is, and ever will be, the chief support of the navigation, trade, wealth, strength, reputation, and glory of this nation.

Gentlemen, our concern, as our trade is, ought in reason to be rather greater than that of our forefathers; we want no manner of inducements, no motives to stir us up, whether we consider our interest, or honour; we have not only the sacred word, but also the glorious acts of the best of kings, which sufficiently manifest to us, that the good and safety of this nation is the greatest care of his life. Let every man, therefore, who pretends to any thing of a true English spirit, readily, cheerfully, follow so good, so great, so excellent an example, by assisting and contributing, to the utmost of his power and capacity, at all times towards the carrying on his noble and generous designs for the common good, and particularly at this time, by doing all that he can, to the end that by the administration of equal justice, the discipline of the seas, on which the good and safety of this nation entirely depends, may be supported and maintained.

Then the Witnesses being sworn in court, the Grand Jury withdrew to hear their evidence; and in the mean time T. Vaughan, * J. Murphey, and Tim. Brenain, were arraigned, whom the keeper of Newgate, by order, brought to the bar.

Cl. of Ar. T. Vaughan, Hold up thy hand (Which he did.) Thou standest indicted, &c. Art thou Guilty of this high treason whereof thou standest indicted or Not Guilty?

Vaughan. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, How wilt thou be tried?

Vaughan. By God and this country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.

Cl. of Ar. J. Murphey, Hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Thou standest indicted, &c. How sayest thou, J. Murphey, Art thou Guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Murphey. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How wilt thou be tried?

Murphey. By God and the king.

Officer. You must say, By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.

Cl. of Ar. Bring Tim. Brenain to the bar. (Who was brought accordingly.)

Cl. of Ar. Tim Brenain, Have you any copy of your indictment?—Brenain. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. When had you it?

Brenain. This day se'nought.

Cl. of Ar. Tim. Brenain, Hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Thou standest indicted, &c. How sayest thou, Art thou Guilty of the high treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?—Brenain. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How wilt thou be tried?

Brenain. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.

Mr. Mompesson. Will your lordships please that he may be tried now?

L. C. J. Trelby. Does he desire to be tried now?

Mr. Mompesson. Yes, my lord; there is no evidence against him, and he is sick.

Sol. Gen. We are not now prepared for the trial.

L. C. J. Trelby. If the king's counsel and the prisoner be agreed, with all my heart.

L. C. J. Holt. He may be tried with the rest.

Then T. Vaughan, J. Murphey, and T. Brenain had notice to prepare for their trials on Friday next, at two of the clock in the afternoon.

Then the Grand Jury came into Court.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen of the grand jury, are you agreed in your bills?

Grand Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Bill versus against Joseph Dawson, Ed. Forseith, W. May, W. Bishop, J. Lewis, and J. Sparkes, for piracy and robbery.

Cl. of Ar. Keeper of Newgate, set Joseph Dawson, Ed. Forseith, Will May, Will. Bishop, Will Lewis, and J. Sparkes, to the bar. (Which was done accordingly.)

Cl. of Ar. Joseph Dawson, Hold up thy hand, (which he did.) Ed. Forseith, Hold up thy hand, (which he did.) W. May, Hold up thy hand, (which he did.) W. Bishop, Hold up thy hand, (which he did.) James Lewis, Hold up thy hand, (which he did.) Jo. Sparkes, Hold up thy hand, (which he did.)

Then the Indictment was read, and set forth:

"That Henry Every, alias Bridgman, Joseph Dawson, Edward Forseith, William May, William Bishop, James Lewis, and John Sparkes, late of London, wainers, on the 30th of May, in the 6th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king William, and the late queen, did, against the peace of God, and our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and the late queen, by force of arms, upon the high and open seas, in a certain place, about three leagues from the Groyne, and within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, piratically and feloniously set upon one Charles Gibson, a subject of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and of the late queen, being then and there commander of a certain merchant-ship, called the Charles the Second, carrying 40 pieces of ordnance, belonging to certain subjects of the said king, and the late queen (to the jurors as yet unknown); and then and there put the said Charles Gibson in bodily fear of his life; and then and there, within the jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did steal, take and carry away from the said Charles Gibson the said ship, called the Charles the Second, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, of the value of 1,000*l.*; 40 pieces of ordnance, of the value of 500*l.*; 100 fuses, of the value of 100*l.*; 15 ton of bread, of the value of 150*l.*; and 200 pair of woollen stockings, of the value of 10*l.*, in the possession of the said Charles Gibson then being; the ship, goods, and chattels of the subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, and the late queen, (to the jurors unknown) against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, and the late queen, and dignities, &c."

How sayest thou, Joseph Dawson, Art thou Guilty of this piracy and robbery, or Not Guilty?

Dawson. I am ignorant of the proceedings.

Officer. He pleads ignorance.

Cl. of Ar. You must plead Guilty or Not Guilty.—Dawson. Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How sayest thou, Ed. Forseith, art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Forseith. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How wilt thou be tried?

Forseith. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. How sayest thou, Will. May, art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

May. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How sayest thou, W. Bishop, art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Bishop. I desire to hear the whole indictment read again.

L. C. J. Holt. You have heard it just now, and may hear it again if you desire it.

Bishop. The former indictment.

L. C. J. Holt. No, there is no occasion for that; this is an indictment for a fact distinct from that.

Cl. of Ar. This is a new indictment, not the old one. Art thou Guilty of this piracy and robbery, or Not Guilty?—Bishop. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How sayest thou, James Lewis, art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Lewis. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How sayest thou, J. Sparkes, art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Sparkes. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. How wilt thou be tried? [As of the rest.]

Sparkes. By God and my country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.

O Yes, &c. You good men of the of London summoned to appear here this day, to try between our sovereign lord the king and prisoners at the bar, answer to your names as you are called, and save your issues.

Cl. of Ar. Jo. Degrave, Benjamin Hatley, Jo. Ayres, &c.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any of the former jury in this pannel?—Cl. of Ar. Yes, my lord.

Counsellor Conyers. We shall except against them for the king.

L. C. J. Holt. If you have returned any of the former jury, you have not done well; for that verdict was a dishonour to the justice of the nation.

Cl. of Ar. You, the prisoners at the bar, these men you hear called, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king, and you; if therefore you will challenge any of them, you are to challenge them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they are sworn.

Then they were called over, and some being challenged for the king, and some by the prisoners, the persons sworn in this jury were these: J. Degrave, J. Ayres, G. Broom, T. Hicks, R. Meakins, J. Shelswell, Alex. Pollinton, J. Glover, Nath. Carpenter, Jo. Bickley, Nath. Troughton, Hum. South.

Cl. of Ar. Make Proclamation.

Cryer. O Yes, If any one can inform my lords, the king's justices, the king's serjeant, the king's attorney general, or his majesty's advocate in his high court of admiralty, before this inquest be taken, of the piracy and robbery whereof the prisoners at the bar stand indicted, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for the prisoners stand at the bar upon their deliverance; and all others may depart.

Then the Grand Jury came into court again, having found two other bills against the prisoners at the bar, one for piratically taking away a Moorish ship, and another for committing piracy on two ships belonging to Denmark. And then the Grand Jury was adjourned to Friday next.

Cl. of Ar. Ed. Forseith, hold up thy hand. (And so of the rest.) You that are sworn, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their cause; they stand indicted, &c.

Mr. Whitaker. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoners at the bar stand indicted for felony and piracy, for that they, about the 30th of May, in the 6th year of the reign of his present majesty king William, did make an assault on captain Gibson, commander of the ship Charles the Second, and put him in fear of his life, and piratically stole away the ship and all the furniture; and this is laid to be against their duty and allegiance, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity; to which indictment they have pleaded not guilty. We shall go on to call our witnesses, and prove the charge against the prisoners at the bar, and doubt not but you will do your duty. Then

Dr. Littleton, Advocate General to his majesty, in his High Court of Admiralty, spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the jury; You have heard the Indictment opened, and we shall now call our witnesses, who will relate to you what enormous and horrid crimes the prisoners at the bar have committed in the prosecution of the fact laid in the indictment: Crimes, that the bare intension, had they not taken effect, would have merited the highest punishment: But this is not their case, for they were not disappointed of their wicked lusts and desires; for as their crimes are great, so have they been consummate as well as voluntary and malicious. I may well say, that their wickedness has been as boundless and as merciless as the element upon which their crimes have been committed; nor is there any part of the world that hath not been sensible of their rage and barbarity.—Therefore, Gentlemen, as you are lovers of christianity, as you are lovers of honesty; nay, as you are lovers of yourselves, who bear the character of honest men, if we prove this charge against the prisoners, you must and ought to find them guilty, remembering that the doing justice upon wicked and profligate men, is the greatest mercy and protection to the good and honest. We shall therefore proceed to call our witnesses, not doubting but that you will act like honest men, for the honour and welfare of your country, without having any respect to the dishonourable proceedings of the former jury.

Mr. Whitaker. Call J. Gravet. (He appeared, and was sworn.) Let him stand up.

Sol. Gen. (Sir John Hawles.) Mr. Gravet, pray, will you give my lords and the jury an account of what you know of the prisoners running away with the ship Charles the Second.

Gravet. I was second mate in the ship at that time. There was violent hands laid on me; I was seized, and a pistol clapped to my breast, and carried away.

Sol. Gen. Who did it? Begin before.

Gravet. I was seized by the carpenter of the ship; he took me by the throat, and clapped a pistol to my breast.

L. C. J. Treby. Begin where the ship was lying.

L. C. J. Holt. You was a mate in this ship: Now pray give an account of the whole matter.

Gravet. I was upon my watch upon the deck.

Prisoners. Pray speak up.

Gravet. And there was a boat came from the James Galley, with people in her: And as soon as the boat came, the carpenter seized me, and took me by the throat, clapped a pistol to me, and said, if I resisted I was a dead man. They took me, one by one arm, and another by the other, and led me to my cabin, and one with a pistol stood at my cabin door, till they were got two leagues without the Groyne. Then Every came to speak to captain Gibson, who was then sick, and was guarded on both sides; and when he had done speaking with him, and was returned from captain Gibson, he came to me again, and said, I suppose you do not intend to go with us; I said, I would not. Then I, and the rest that would not go with them, had liberty to go ashore; and I would have gone to my coffer, and taken my clothes, but they would not let me; and told me I should carry no more than the clothes on my back.

Sol. Gen. Did any of the prisoners at the bar say so?

Gravet. That I cannot tell.

Mr. Conyers. Then go on.

Gravet. Then I went to Every, and I had some of my clothes; he was so kind to give me them: he gave me a coat and waistcoat, and his commission that he left behind him; and W. May took me by the hand, and wished me well home, and bid me remember him to his wife.

Mr. Conyers. Was there liberty for any of them that would, to go ashore?

Gravet. Captain Gibson told me so, and there were about seventeen went off.

Mr. Conyers. No matter what captain Gibson told you; you say you went off: Might any one that would, go?

Gravet. That I cannot tell.

Mr. Conyers. You say there was about seventeen went off: Would the boat hold more?—Gravet. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Couper. Did you see any hindered that would have gone off? Were any of the prisoners at the bar there?—Gravet. No.

Sol. Gen. Do you know E. Forseith, &c.?

Gravet. I know some of them.

Mr. Conyers. Name the men that you say you know.

Gravet. Joseph Dawson, W. May, J. Sparkes.

Sol. Gen. They belonged to what ship?

Gravet. To the Charles.

Mr. Conyers. Was there not a boat came from the ship James, before you went away? Was there any of the prisoners at the bar that came in that boat?

Gravet. There were about twenty six that we had account of.

Mr. Conyers. From what ship did they come?—Gravet. From the James.

Mr. Conyers. Were any of the prisoners at the bar any of them?

Gravet. Indeed, Sir, I cannot tell.

Cl. of Arr. Call T. Druit. (Who appeared, and was sworn.)

Sol. Gen. Mr. Druit, was you aboard the ship (called the Charles the Second) when she was carried away?—Druit. No, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Do you know any thing of the carrying of that ship away?

Druit. I was not in that ship; I was mate of the James; and about nine came one from aboard the Charles the Second, and asked me for the drunken boatswain? And I replied short; and he went away again, and said the ship was going to be run away withal. Whereupon I went with ten men to recover the ship; and after I had advised with the commander, I ordered the pinnace to be manned; and when I came, the last that went into the boat was one Pike; and I bid them put back, and they would not, but went away to the ship Charles.

Mr. Congers. How many were there that went away in that boat?

Druit. About five and twenty.

Mr. Congers. Did you know all the men?

Were any of the prisoners at the bar there? Look on them.

Druit. Yes, my lord, there was E. Forseith, W. Bishop, and J. Lewis.

L. C. J. Holt. What boat did they go away with? the James boat?—Druit. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then they came from the James to the Charles the Second? Name their names again.

Druit. Ed. Forseith, Ja. Lewis, and Wm. Bishop.

Sol. Gen. You saw them go off, did you not?

Druit. It was so dark that we could not see them.

Mr. Cowper. Were these three men sent?

Druit. They were sent.

Mr. Cowper. Or did they go of their own head?

Druit. No, I do not say so; but I went to command them back again, and they refused.

Mr. Cowper. Did they make answer?

Druit. No; they only went away damning and sinking.

Mr. Congers. Were there any guns sent after them?—Druit. Yes.

Mr. Congers. What was it for?

Druit. It was to bring them back again.

Mr. Cowper. And they would not come back?

Druit. They did not come.

Mr. Cowper. Then they would not come.

Cl. of Ar. Call David Creagh. [Who was sworn.]

Prisoner. This man is a prisoner for piracy, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. What if he be?

Prisoner. I do not understand law; I hope your lordship will advise us.

L. C. J. Holt. I will do you all right. If he be so, that is no objection against him; he may be a good witness for all that.

Cl. of Ar. He is not a prisoner for piracy, but for treason.

L. C. J. Holt. Though he be a prisoner for treason, he is not attainted. What is his name?

Cl. of Ar. David Creagh.

Sol. Gen. What do you know about the prisoners running away with the ship Charles?

Creagh. Upon the 7th of May, 1694, I came to the Groyne, in company with the boatwain and several others, on board the Charles; and when I was going in to the captain of the Charles, captain Gibson, I found Mr. Every, the carpenter, and some others, drinking a bowl of punch; and after I was come from the captain, I came and sat down with them, and Mr. May drank a health to the captain, and proposed to their voyage; and we not knowing then, thought it was to our lawful prosperity to the voyage he was for.

L. C. J. Holt. What was your voyage?

Creagh. It was to the Spanish Indies. And afterwards the company broke up, and retired, and went to their cabins. And when we were in our cabins, we heard a great noise above deck; and captain Humphreys, that commanded the galley, called to us, to tell us his men were run away with the boat, and were gone to captain Gibson. To which Every answered, that he knew that well enough: so the men came aboard; and as I was coming out of my cabin to see what the matter was, I was met by Every, the carpenter, and two Dutchmen; and they obliged me to retire again to my cabin. And captain Humphreys fired two guns at us. But we presently got out of reach of the guns, and proceeded on the design. And I came out of my cabin, and went on the quarter-deck, where I met Every and the carpenter together; Every was conning the ship.

L. C. J. Holt. What is the meaning of that?

Creagh. That is, to direct in the steering of her. So Every took me by the hand, and asked me if I would go with him? And I answered, I did not know his design. He said, there were but few that knew it. Says I, Tell me who do know it, that if you will not tell me yourself, I may ask them that can tell me. But he said, we should all know by to-morrow morning eight o'clock. I told him, that would be too late to repent of the design. The carpenter stood by him, and said, Do you not see this cock? Yes, says I, I do. Says he, This man, and old May, and Knight, I can trust with any thing; they are true cocks of the game, and old sportsmen. Then, said I, I suppose they know your design. Yes, says he, they do; and if it were a thing of ten times the consequence, they should know it. Upon this, the carpenter came to me, and said, If you do not go down, I will knock you on the head. And as I was going down, I met with W. May, the prisoner at the bar. What do you do here? says he. I made him no answer, but went down to my cabin; and he said, God damn you, you deserve to be shot through the head; and he then held a pistol to my head. Then I went to my cabin, and presently came orders from Every, that those that would go ashore, should prepare to be gone. And when the captain was got out of bed, who was then very ill of a fever, Every came and said, I am a man of fortune, and must seek my fortune. Says captain Gibson, I am sorry this happens at this time. Says he, If you will go in the ship, you shall still command her. No, says capt. Gibson, I never thought you would have served me so, who have been kind to all of you; and to go on a design against my owners orders, I will not do it. Then, says Every, prepare to go ashore. Upon which the captain, and several others of us, went into the boat. When we were by the ship's side, I heard them order the doctor to be secured; but if there was any more would go into the boat, they might; and we came into the boat, to the number of six.

teen; and they gave us four oars in the pin-nace, and set us adrift.

L. C. J. Holt. Where did he set you?

Creagh. He set us aboard the James, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. That is, you were turned off from this expedition.

Creagh. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Conyers. Was there any room for more in the boat?—Creagh. Yes, there was.

L. C. J. Holt. Was there liberty for any more to go?—Creagh. Yes, my lord.

Sol. Gen. What do you know of the prisoners at the bar?

Creagh. I know only W. May.

Mr. Cowper. What time past from the coming of the boat, to the time of your going off?

Creagh. About two hours, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. Was there any guns fired in that time?

Creagh. Yes, Sir, one or two from the James,
by captain Humphreys.

Mr. Cowper. Was this done in the ship with silence? Or was there any uproar, or opposition?

Creagh. No: there could be no opposition;
for the men came from the whole squadron, and came upon us, and surprized us, being assisted by those that belonged to the Charles.

Mr. Cowper. But did nobody make opposition to their going? Did not capt. Gibson?

Creagh. No, captain Gibson could not, being sick.

L. C. J. Holt. But he went ashore?

Creagh. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Was any body stopped that would go?

Creagh. No, my lord, none but the doctor.

Sol. Gen. Now call Jo. Dan. [Who appeared, and was sworn.]

Mr. Conyers. What ship were you aboard of at the Groyne?

Dan. The Charles the Second.

Mr. Conyers. Now, pray, give my lord and the jury an account what you know of the taking away of the ship Charles the Second, and what passed there?

Dan. Yes, Sir: We came to the Groyne, and had been there about three or four months, and we had been about eight months out of England, and we lay for our wages, and there was no wages to be got. But inasmuch as we wanted wages, Every; and several others, contrived to carry this ship away. So that night, which was Sunday, they went ashore; and when they came aboard again, made some men peivy to it, whom I know not. And the Monday following, I think, the packet went out in the morning, and the night being fair, was ordered to give notice; and they came to the Dove, and about nine or ten her boat broke off, and she haled us; for they told captain Humphreys they were coming to run away with our ship. So he hales the James; and presently some of the officers came and ordered their pinnace to be manned; and it was so. And when they gave this order, there was Every and 25 or 26 men. And as they came aboard, our cables were cut, and ready to go.

And coming under the castle, we cut all the boats but two, and stood out to sea about two or three leagues; and there Every went to captain Gibson, and, as they said, to ask him if he would go to them, or not. He said, no.
Then he said, he must prepare to go ashore;
and he did so, and several others with him.
And the word was given about, that they that would go ashore might go; but whether these men heard it or no, I cannot tell; and no man's name was mentioned to be stopped, but the doctor. And when they went away, they cried, there was water in the boat, and they desired a bucket of us, to heave it over, and we gave them one; and away they went, I think about 15 of them, and no more did offer to go as I saw, nor did I see any hinder any that would go: and afterwards, they that went off went about their business, and we about our business. And we came to the Isle of May, and victualled ourselves there; and there we met with three English ships, out of which we took some necessaries for ourselves, and among the rest several men; nine men we took out of them.

Sol. Gen. Were the prisoners at the bar in the ship, when they went away?

Dan. Yes.

Sol. Gen. Name them.

Dan. Ed. Forseith; W. May, J. Lewis,
Jo. Sparkes, W. Bishop.

Mr. Conyers. Which of them was aboard the Charles, that belonged to her?

Dan. W. May, and J. Sparkes; and Ed.
Forseith, Ja. Lewis, and W. Bishop, came from the James.

Mr. Cowper. Was it not generally understood, that they were going to run away with the ship, when they came to captain Gibson?

Dan. Yes, Sir, they knew to be sure.

Sol. Gen. Did you know that they assented to it?

Dan. No, Sir, I did not hear them say so.

Just. Eyre. Did they desire to go ashore with the rest?—Dan. I saw none hindered.

L. C. J. Holt. Was Ed. Forseith in the ship then?

Dan. Ed. Forseith was in the ship then.

L. C. J. Holt. Was he at the Isle of May, taking in necessaries with you?

Dan. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. Holt. What did he do in the company?

Dan. He was in the ship, and came from the James.

L. C. J. Holt. And so did Bishop, and so did Lewis?

Dan. Yes, my lord, these three; and the other two belonged to the Charles.

Mr. Whitaker. Did any of the ship's crew go ashore at the Isle of May?

Dan. Yes, Sir, I think so.

Sol. Gen. But I think, you say, that the word was given about, that any might go that would.

2 H

Mr. Conyers. Go on with the proceedings after you were at the Isle of May.

Dan. After we had victualled, we took in some men.

Prisoners. We have been tried for that already, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Go on.

Dan. After we had been there, and took in what we had occasion for, our quarter master said, he would give them bills for what he took of them. Then we went to the coast of Guinea, and took several negroes, and carried them away with us. And afterward we went to the Island of Princes, where lay two Dances, and we fought them, and took them; and after we had taken them, some of the men went ashore at the island of Princes, and others went along with us; and we brought the ships to Yandepo, and burnt one, and carried one with us. Then we came to cape Lopes.

L. C. J. Holt. Where is that?

Dan. Under the equinoctial line; and there we fired a shot through the little one to sink her, for the men could not agree, and so we could not carry her with us. We went about the Cape, and touched at Madagascar.

Dr. Littleton. Had not these men their part and share of the plunder?

L. C. J. Holt. You go too fast, Sir.

Mr. Conyers. What was the next ship you met with, after you had rounded the cape?

Dan. The next was a small vessel, about 30 or 40 ton, and we put her ashore, and took a small matter out of her, and let her lie; and there we put this gentleman, Mr. May, ashore. And we seeing three English ships a coming, we left him there, and went to the equinoctial line; and afterwards, for want of bread and water, we came again, and took another small vessel, and some rice and pecky out of her, and sunk her, and then went to the Cape again, and took in W. May again, and met another vessel, and took rice and meal out of her, and sunk her too. And then we went to the Red Sea to a town called Meat; and the people would not trade with us, and we burnt it. And thence we went up to the Red Sea, as far as we could, and going up to the cape Adia, we met with two English privateers more, and they came and joined with us.

L. C. J. Holt. You call them privateers; but were they such privateers as you were?

Dan. Yes, my lord. I suppose they had commissions at first; but I suppose they did not run so far as that.

Mr. Conyers. Did you go all on the same design?

Dan. Yes, they sailed on with us, and we made the best of our way, and came up into the Red Sea in a little time, and came to an anchor at Bob's Key, and had lain there but a night and a day, and there came up three English ships more from America; and they likewise concerted with us; and we lay there about two weeks; and in that time we expected the fleet to come down.

Mr. Conyers. What fleet?

Dan. The Moorish fleet, that came from Mocha. They passed us on Saturday night unseen, and we took a vessel, which gave us an account that they were gone. And then we followed them; and about three days after we made land, we came up with one of them of about 2 or 300 tons, and we fired a broadside at her, and small shot, and took her, which, after we had taken her, we plundered, and took out some gold and silver.

Mr. Conyers. And what did you do with it?

Dan. We brought it aboard our ship.

Mr. Conyers. Did you share it?

Dan. Not then, but after we took the other ship.

Mr. Conyers. What was that other ship?

Dan. After we had taken her, we put some men aboard to keep her with us; and about two days after we were lying at anchor at St. John's, and there was a great ship called the Gunsway; and we weighed anchor and fought her about two hours, and took her, and put some men aboard her and plundered her. And after we had done as much as we thought convenient, we sent her to Surat with the people in her. And then we stood farther to the Indian coast, and shared our money about a week after.

L. C. J. Holt. That was a brave prize, was it not, the best you had all the voyage?

Dan. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you all share?

Dan. Yes, all that were in the ship.

L. C. J. Holt. You have given a good account of this matter. Was Edward Forseith there?—Dan. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. What did he do? Was he active?—Dan. I did not see him act.

L. C. J. Holt. Had he a share?

Dan. Yes, my lord, he had.

L. C. J. Holt. Was W. May there?

Dan. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. What did he do there?

Dan. He could do but little then; he had his share.

L. C. J. Holt. And when you took him in again, what did he do? Did he do his business as a seaman?

Dan. Yes, my lord, till he was sick.

L. C. J. Holt. Was W. Bishop there?

Dan. Yes, my lord, he was among the rest.

L. C. J. Holt. What did he do? Did he consent and agree to what was done?

Dan. He had share of the money.

L. C. J. Holt. Did J. Lewis share too?

Dan. He had a share, as far as was allowed by the company.

L. C. J. Holt. Did J. Sparkes share with you too?

Dan. Yes, my lord, as far as the company thought fit to give him.

Mr. Cowper. When you say 'as the company thought fit,' what do you mean? How did they share it?

Dan. Some had 1,000*l.* some 500*l.* others 300*l.*

Mr. Cowper. Had all the prisoners some share?—Dan. Yes, Sir, all had some share.

Mr. Whitaker. What did you do with the Charles the Second, after the voyage?

Dan. We left her at Providence.

L. C. J. Holt. If any of you prisoners at the bar will ask him any questions, you may.

Just. Turton. What provisions were aboard the Charles when she was taken away?

Dan. I cannot tell.

Just. Turton. What quantity of bread was there?

Dan. A pretty deal, I cannot tell the quantity.

Just. Turton. And were there any guns aboard her and small arms?

Dan. Yes, my lord, there were.

May. My lord, may I speak for myself?

L. C. J. Holt. If you will ask him any questions, you may; you shall be heard again to speak for yourself bye and bye.

May. I desire he may be asked where I was taken sick?

L. C. J. Holt. He asks you, where he was taken sick?

Dan. I cannot justly tell that, I think it was at Allibore, at the coast of Guinea.

May. I did not lie down with it.

Dan. No, you did not; but your first being taken sick was at Allibore.

May. My lord, I desire you will ask him, whether he thinks I had any knowledge of the going away of the ship?

L. C. J. Holt. You hear what he says; what do you say?

Dan. I know nothing of that.

L. C. J. Holt. You were there, and you had a share of the prize; you drank an health to the success of your voyage.

May. I hope, my lord, you will not be angry for asking questions.

L. C. J. Holt. No, nobody is angry, you may ask what questions you will.

Then Philip Middleton was called and sworn.

Mr. Conyers. Pray tell what you knew of taking away the ship Charles the Second?

Middleton. I cannot say any thing of running away with the ship, for I was asleep then; but afterwards, in the morning, they called up all hands; and the captain said, Every man should share alike, only he would have two shares.

L. C. J. Holt. Who said so?

Middleton. Capt. Every. From thence they went to Bonyvis, and took in some salt; and from Bonyvis they went to the isle of May, and there they took three English ships, and plundered them; and they took the governor aboard their own ship till they had done, (for then they could demand what victuals they had a mind to) and then they sent him away again: And from the Isle of May they went to the coast of Guinea, where they put out English colours, to make the natives come aboard to trade; and when they came aboard, they surprised them, and took their gold from them, and tied them with chains, and put them into the hold; and when they came to a place called the Island of Princes, they gave seven of them away for slaves; And then they went to Vandepoe where they cleaned their ship; and from Vandepoe they went to Cape Lopes, and from Cape Lopes to Annibo, and from Annibo about the Cape; and at Madagascar they watered their ship, and got provisions, and cows to salt up; and from thence they went to Joanna, and from Joanna they went to take a junk, and took rice out of her, and sunk her; and from thence they went to the Equinoctial line, and because they were short of water and rice, they went back again to Joanna; and the wind being contrary, they went to Commeroe; and there they met a small French vessel, and they took her, and sunk her; and then went to Joanna again, and there took in Mr. May again: and then went to Meat; and because the natives would not trade with them, they burnt their town: And then they went to Bob's Key, by the mouth of the Red Sea; but before that, they met with an English vessel, that was on the same account that we were; and we rode there a night or two; and they saw there another sail coming, which proved to be another English vessel: And in the morning they saw two more; May, Farrel, and Wake, were the captains: And on Saturday night all the Mocha fleet passed by: And on Sunday morning they took another vessel, that told them the said fleet was gone by; and so they consulted whether they should follow them or stay there. And then they went after them and overtook them, and took one that was about three or four hundred ton, and took gold and silver out of her; and sent men aboard her to plunder and keep her. And next day they spied another sail, and got up their anchor, and stood to her, and took her; she was called the Gunsway; they killed several men aboard, and when they had taken and plundered the ship, they left the men aboard to go to Surat again. And then they went to Rachipool in the East Indies, and got water and necessaries; and from thence to Degorees, and watered again; and then to Dascaran, where they set about twenty five Frenchmen ashore, and fourteen Danes, and some English; for they were afraid, if they came to England, and were caught, they should be hanged; and they thought themselves there secure. From that place they went to Ascension, and then to the Island Providence in the West Indies: And then they wrote a letter to the governor, to know if he would let them come in, and said they would present the governor with twenty pieces of eight, and two pieces of gold, if he would let them come in; and the captain, because he had a double share, he offered forty pieces of eight, and four of gold; and with that they sent some men down, Adams and others, with the letter: And they came again, with a letter, from the island, that they should be welcome, and come and go again when they pleased.

Mr. Conyers. Look on the prisoners at the bar. Were they all there?

L. C. J. Holt. Do you know Ed. Forreth? Was he there? Did he belong to the Charles?

Middleton. He came from the James.

L. C. J. Holt. Was W. May there?

Middleton. He was aboard the Charles.

L. C. J. Holt. Was W. Bishop there?

Middleton. W. Bishop came from the James.

L. C. J. Holt. Was J. Lewis there?

Middleton. Yes, he came from the James.

L. C. J. Holt. Was J. Sparkes there?

Middleton. Yes, he was aboard the Charles.

L. C. J. Holt. Had all the men their shares?

Middleton. Yes, such as the company thought fit to allow them, all of them.

L. C. J. Holt. Had these men their shares of the several prizes they took?

Middleton. Yes, they had.

L. C. J. Holt. Were they active in the taking of the prize?

Middleton. They were, as far as I saw.

L. C. J. Holt. Were not divers others set ashore besides capt. Gibson?

Middleton. I never heard any repine, or wish they had been ashore, or that they had never come along with the ship.

L. C. J. Holt. But, do you know of any others that were set ashore?

Middleton. Yes, a great many, Mr. Gravet and several others.

Mr. Cowper. I think, you said, some French and English were set ashore in the Indies?

Middleton. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. Were they set ashore willingly?

Middleton. They desired to be set ashore.

Juryman. He says in the morning capt. Every called them above deck, and gave leave to any to go ashore that were not willing to go with them; we desire to know whether any of the prisoners were there at that time?

Middleton. I know not that; all hands were called up.

Just. Turlon. What number of persons were aboard when the dividend was made?

Middleton. About a hundred and sixty.

Just. Turlon. What might the shares be?

Middleton. Some 1000*l.* some 600*l.* and some 500*l.* and some less, according as the company thought they deserved.

Just. Turlon. Had not you a share?

Middleton. Yes, what the company thought fit, and they told me that would serve to put me out an apprentice, and that I should never go near my friends.

Just. Turlon. How much was that you had?

Middleton. Above an hundred pounds.

Mr. Conyers. What became of it?

Middleton. Jo. Sparks robbed me of it.

L. C. J. Holt. The king's counsel have done with the evidence, and therefore now is your time for to speak, if you have any thing to say for yourselves. Ed. Forreth, what have you to say?

Forreth. My lord, I desire you would, call Mr. Druit, and ask him whether I was one of the passengers on board?

L. C. J. Holt. You hear what he says. Druit. Yes, you were, and I commanded you to come back, and you refused.

Forreth. Did not you command me to go?

Druit. Yes, and I afterwards commanded you to come back, and you refused.

Forreth. You did not command me back.

Druit. Yes, I did, and fired at you, and shot through the boat.

Forreth. I held water with my oar, that was all I could do.

L. C. J. Holt. What did you command him to do?—Druit. To rescue the ship.

L. C. J. Holt. Instead of rescuing the ship, you run away with her. He commanded you back, and you refused to come back.

Forreth. I could not bring her back myself, nor come back, unless I should leap over-board.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any more to say?

Forreth. My lord, when I was in the boat, I knew not who was in it, nor how many. When I came a-board the Charles, the sails were loose, and I was in a very sorry condition; they cut the boat off, and put her adrift; I could not get into her, she was gone in a minute's time, I did not know which way, or what men there were in her, nor heard nothing until two o'clock the next day. And I hope, my lord, as we are but poor sea-faring men, and do not understand the law, you will take it into consideration.

L. C. J. Holt. But all you seamen understand that law, that it is not lawful to commit piracy; and he that doth, deserves to be hanged.

Forreth. My lord, I never did.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you think it no piracy to rob?

Forreth. I was forced to do what I did.

Just. Eyre. You all compelled one another.

Forreth. My lord, I was sent of an errand. I hope as we are poor men in this condition, you will take into consideration.

L. C. J. Holt. We shall. Have you any more to say?—Forreth. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. W. May, what do you say?

May. Here is one of the king's evidence, that testifies that I knew nothing of the ship's going away; and I believe very few knew it, I believe not above nine or ten.

L. C. J. Holt. None of them say you were at the consult; but one says that you said, 'God damn you, you deserve to be shot through the head;' and held a pistol to him.

May. I never was any higher than the under-deck; I was coming up the hatch-way, and captain Every was standing, and commanding the ship.

L. C. J. Holt. Every was no officer, he had nothing to do to command; he was under captain Gibson, and took the ship from Gibson.

May. My lord, I know nothing of the ship's going away.

L. C. J. Holt. You should have stuck to captain Gibson, and endeavoured to suppress the insolence of Every. Captain Gibson was the commander, you ought to have obeyed him; and if any had resisted him, or gone to put a force upon him, you should have stood by him.

May. I was surprised.

L. C. J. Holt. How?

May. By captain Every, and knew nothing of it.

L. C. J. Holt. You were zealous from the beginning, and said to one, 'Damn you, you deserve to be shot through the head.'

Just. Turton. And one says, you drank a health to your good voyage.

May. Presently after I heard this rumour, I came up the hatch-way, and capt. Every says, "You, May, I believe you do not love this way, pray get down to your cabin." So I went to my cabin, which one that is now at Virginia could testify; which I hope will be considered, that I cannot have my witnesses for me.

L. C. J. Holt. What have you more to say? Have you any witnesses to call?

May. I stayed in the cabin a considerable time. I was thinking I must leave my old captain without seeing him; and I begged them to give me leave to come to him; and there was two men stood with naked outlages, and would not let me come to him. We had some confabulation together, and I begged the favour to come in, and at last they permitted me; and the doctor was anointing the commander's temples. And as I was coming along, I had my hand cut; and I went to the doctor, to desire him to bind up my hand. When I came out again, they began to hurry the men away. Here was Mr. Gravet, the second mate, who is now one of the king's evidence; and I told him he should remember me to my wife, I am not like to see her; for none could go, but who they pleased: for when those men were in the boat, they cried to have a bucket, or else they should sink, they having three leagues to go: and I do not know how they could go so far with more, when their boat was like to sink with those that were in her, as some of the king's evidence have testified.

L. C. J. Holt. Who will you call?

May. Mr. Dan. (Who appeared.)

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Dan, answer the question, Whether there was calling for a bucket several times by the men that were in the boat?

Dan. They did call, and a bucket was given them to pump with.

L. C. J. Holt. You were willing to be rid of them.

May. I have more to say. Afterwards, if I should have denied to go with them, I might have been killed by them; and I knew not whether it be better to be necessary to my own death, or to suffer by the law of the nation.

Sir Ch. Hedges. You seem to say that you were under a constraint and terror. Did you make any complaint or discovery so soon as you had liberty, or at your first coming into the king's dominions?

May. Yes, at Virginia.

Sir Ch. Hedges. Where did you first arrive in England?—May. At Bristol.

Sir Ch. Hedges. When you came to Bristol, did you discover it to any magistrate?

May. When I came to Bristol, I had a design to discover it to the Lords of the Admiralty.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you go to a magistrate?

May. I was several days in the king's collector's house, and did discover the whole to him; and at Providence.

L. C. J. Holt. You speak now of Providence; but in England who did you discover it to?

May. I was taken sick, and could not go abroad.

L. C. J. Holt. You might have sent to the mayor of Bristol.

May. I knew nothing of it, I intended to declare it to none but the Lords of the Admiralty. I knew no man there, but two men that were fellow-tradesmen in Virginia. I came from Virginia by the first ship; and if that ship had come away before the fleet, I had been at home long before. I lay sick at Bristol four or five days, and the fifth day I got passage for London in the coach; and was taken three miles off Bath by the king's messenger, by one who betrayed me, and I was carried back to Bath again. And there was the duke of Devonshire; and there they examined the whole matter, in every particular, as I have now declared to the court. And my lord desired the messenger should take me away again, and see me safe to London; which was all he said to me. I have more to say, as to my being put ashore at Joanna. I had no place to go to, but lay in a lamentable condition; I could not put water to my mouth without help, and remained useless of hands or feet, despairing of my life. I desired to go ashore, to see if the air would do me any good; and I went ashore at Joanna, with another man, Gunning, and others, for refreshment. So the second day we went in, there appears three ships, which were East-India men. Captain Every being surprized by these ships, hastened his men and water aboard to get out to sea, that he might not be surprized in the road without his men on board, who were come ashore for the sick. And I told them, I will not go with you; I will rather trust to the mercy of my countrymen, or the mercy of the negroes: I should endanger my life, if I go aboard; if I stay, no question my countrymen will have compassion on me; and if I have committed any thing worthy of death, they have authority to put me to death according to the law of the nation. And I applied myself to Mr. Edgcomb, when he came ashore, and he gave me scurrilous language. But I replied, I am a weak man, for me to stay behind is death; I had rather suffer death by the laws of my country, than to be left to the mercy of these negroes. Mr. Edgcomb says, I will take you down with me, and will hang you there too.

L. C. J. Holt. Where?

May. At Bombay, where he said I should be tried. His mate, and several other Englishmen, came to see me, and brought me one thing or other to refresh me. And at first, at night, he sent his doctor and pursers to me, who said, the captain is just now sending his boat for you. I replied, I am ready, here is all I have in the world; and he goes away about two o'clock in the morning. And I remained seven or eight weeks at the mercy of those negroes, and had perished, but that a negro hearing an Englishman was there, came to me, he lived at Bedual Green, and spoke English very well. He went from England in the ship Rochester, taken at Guinea some time before. The captain commanded this negro to go for the long boat, and turn her about, which he does, but goes away with her himself, and in the night says the ship blew up by an accidental fire, and several were lost. This negro I got to look after me, and he did really feed me, and got me all necessaries belonging to me, and by that means I saved my life. Now when captain Every came in again, I could not go nor in.

L. C. J. Holt. Do not call him captain; he was a pirate.

May. He commanded me, I was forced to obey him.

L. C. J. Holt. For that matter call Gravel again, because you and he were very kind to gather your shack hands with him, and bid him farewell, and remember you to your wife. Mr Gravel, do you remember, when you went into the boat, did W. May take his leave of you, or was he unwilling to be left behind?

Gravel. When we had liberty to go out of this ship, this man, W. May, took me by the hand, I dismissed me well home, and bid me remember him to his wife, and was very merry and jocund, and knew whether they were going.

Just Fort n. Did he express any inclination to go with you?

Gravel. No, my lord, not at all.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any more to say?

May. Yes, my lord. I remained in this condition till I came to Providence; and the king's evidence can testify what I say. I only beg mercy of this honourable bench, to consider my weak state and condition that I have been in.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you done?

May. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then the next. W. Bishop what have you to say?

Bishop. I belonged to the ship James, and at the Groyne the men began to complain about wages, and that was the first beginning of the disturbance about this plotting. We were shipped out of England in Mr James Houghlin's service, to the Spanish West Indies. Upon this mutiny among the men for their wages, several men went aboard the king's ships, and desired to be entertained on board any of them to go for England; and we all went away again to the ship, because we could not be entertained. But this design of Every's I did not know of. On the 17th day captain Humphreys calls, and says, my men are gone aboard the Charles, I think. And he calls out, says he, Mr Drut, man the pinnace. I being then on the deck, at night, the men all quiet, as I thought, I went into the pinnace, and I was no sooner in, but in comes fifteen or sixteen more that knew of the design, but I was then sent, and knew it not. And they put off the boat and overpowered us; and several of us would have gone aboard again, and they would not suffer us. And when we came aboard the ship Charles, they had cut the cables, and the sails were loose, and several men went from the Charles to the James in a boat, and they commanded the innocent to do what they pleased, with pistols and cutlasses, and they commanded me to go into the hold to do what they pleased. And I not knowing of this matter, the men that were in the boat called round the buckets, or we shall sink. And I heard afterwards that none went ashore, but whom they pleased, that is, Every and his crew. And I not knowing of it, could not go, and if I had known it, I had not been admitted to go. Then we were carried two leagues without the Groyne.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any witnesses to call?

Bishop. The king's evidence is my witness, he commanded me to go into the boat.

L. C. J. Holt. Will you ask him any questions. — Bishop. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. James Lewis, what have you to say?

Lewis. I had been in France, a little before the ship came to the Groyne, a prisoner there; but I knew nothing of Every's design. By the command of our officer I went aboard the boat, and as soon as we were in her, we were overpowered, and carried away; they took the boat out of our hands, and carried us to the ship Charles. And when we came aboard, they put the boat adrift, and then they commanded me into the fore-castle; they had arms, but we had none, and so were forced to obey them. When the boat was going off, I heard a noise of crying out for a bucket. And when we were gone from the Groyne, we were forced to do what they would have us; it was against my consent, and against my will.

L. C. J. Holt. J. Sparkes, what say you?

Sparkes. When captain Humphreys called to them that were gone into the boat, I was asleep, but with the noise of Gravel's crying out, I was coming, I awaked; and all put the candles out, for fear I should see them. And when the men were come aboard, I went on the deck, and they threw the hammocks, and knocked me down.

L. C. J. Holt. Who did it?

Sparkes. The hammocks they brought from the other ships. I durst not do any other wise than they bid me; I was innocent of the thing. I asked what they were going to do, and they said they were going for England.

L. C. J. Holt. Who told you so?

Sparkes. John Dan.

L. C. J. Holt. J. Dan, did you tell J. Sparkes the ship was going for England?

Dan. I do not remember I saw him all the night.

L. C. J. Holt. I would ask you, if you had no share of the plunder?

Sparkes. I was forced to take it.

L. C. J. Holt. Phil. Middleton, you had some share, had you not?

Middleton. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. What became of it?

Middleton. They took it away from me.

L. C. J. Holt. Who took it from you?

Middleton. J. Sparkes robbed me of it by night.

L. C. J. Holt. Did he take all away?

Middleton. Yes, all that I had there: 270 odd pieces of gold; it was in a belt.

Sparkes. He took out his money and shewed it to the troopers, and they made him drunk, and got it from him; and the next morning he said they took it from him.

Middleton. I was forced to say so, because if I said he had it, he would have made no more but to cut my throat.

L. C. J. Holt. Have you any more to say?

Sparkes. No, my lord.

Sol. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this case for the king against the prisoners at the bar. They are arraigned for a very high crime, a robbery upon the seas. It was not a less crime because committed on the sea, but rather the more. These men had a trust reposed in them to assist their captain in his voyage; but instead of that, they resist their captain, turn him out, and run away with the ship. They could not find shelter in any other part of the world, and I hope you will make it appear such crimes shall not find shelter here, more than in other parts of the world. These are crimes against the laws of nations, and worse than robbery on the land: for in case of a robbery on the land, we know who is to pay it; but in a robbery by sea, it often happens that innocent persons bear the loss of what these men do. It has been very plainly proved against the prisoners, that the ship Charles was run away with from the Groyn. And it is as plain by two witnesses, that all the prisoners at the bar were in this ship; by three, that W. May in particular was one of them; and by one, that W. May was so far concerned, that because J. Gravel seemed to dislike it, he said he deserved to be shot through the head: so that he that would make himself the most innocent of the five, is most guilty.

Now they have only this to say for themselves, that they were forced to do what they did. But it has been proved to you that they were not forced; it was said, all might go that world. And it is not proved on their side, that any one of the prisoners did seem to dissent from their going away. It is proved, that they all made use of this ship to very bad purposes; that they took and plundered several ships, and shared the booty. We do not produce this to prove them guilty, but to shew that they made use of this ship to this very purpose. Now if you allow what they say, that they were forced to go away; then you must never convict, at any time, one or two highwaymen that rob in the company of four or five; for they may say too, that they were overpowered, and forced by their company. It is so, not only in case of robbery, but in all other crimes also. They have said a great deal indeed, but without any manner of probability of truth. They have produced no witnesses for themselves, to prove any thing they have said. And the witnesses for the king have given testimony without any exception. And, I hope, you will vindicate the credit of the nation, and find them guilty, as the evidence has proved them.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen of the jury, these five prisoners, E. Forcib, W. May, W. Bishop, Ja. Lewis, and J. Sparkes, are indicted for a piracy and robbery committed on the high seas, some distance from the Groyn, in taking and carrying away a ship, and several goods therein contained. She was called the Charles the Second. This was done in May last was two years, 1694. You have heard what evidence has been given on this indictment against the prisoners.

It has appeared that this ship was bound in a voyage to the West Indies. Two of the prisoners, W. May and J. Sparkes, were seamen then on board this ship, and engaged in the voyage; the other three were not mariners in that, but in another ship, called the James, that lay, at that time, near the Groyn; but they came aboard the ship Charles before, and continued on board her when she was carried away.

That there was a piracy committed on the ship Charles, is most apparent by the evidence that hath been given; that is, a force was put on the master, and some others of the seamen on board her, who, because they would not agree to go on a piratical expedition, had liberty to depart, and be set ashore. But the ship was taken from the captain, who was possessed of her for the use of the owners, and was carried away by Every, and others of his crew that remained on board her; and others came from the James which taking was a piracy; that is manifested by the use they did put her to; for they did afterwards commit several other piracies with her, and took several English and Danish ships, and then went to several islands, countries and places, as to the isles of May and Princes, to Madagascar, and then to Joanna, and afterwards to Ment, and then to the Red Sea; and at the entrance of the Red Sea committed more piracies, in the manner as you have heard, and has been very particularly described to you. So that I must tell you, beyond all contradiction, the force put on the captain, and taking away this ship, called the Charles the Second, was a piracy; and for that particular fact these prisoners were now charged.

The matter you are now to enquire after, is, whether all the prisoners were guilty of this piracy, or which of them.

As for E. Forseith, Bishop, and Lewis, it hath appeared to you, that they, with others, were aboard the ship James; and that there was a report spread about of a plot against the captain of the Charles the Second, and a design to carry that ship away. To prevent which, there were some of these men sent out in a boat, by the captain of the James, to this ship, to assist captain Gibson; but instead of preventing this piracy, they staid behind, and went along with these men that carried away the ship.

As to W. May and J. Sparkes, that were of this ship's crew, they continued on board, and were parties in all those piracies.

There was a consult, it seems, by some particular persons, of which Every was the ring-leader, how to effect this design; capt. Every, as they call him, though he was no captain, but was under the command of capt. Gibson, that had the conduct of this ship.

It is true, it is not proved to you that these men were at that consult; for, it seems, they were too many, for they were about 100 that remained on board when the ship was carried off.

Now for W. May, Jo. Gravet, second mate, that was aboard, though he had a pistol clapped to him to prevent any resistance, yet had liberty to depart; and upon his going off, discoursed with May, who shook hands with him, and bid him farewell, and remember him to his wife. And therefore it is evident that W. May was under no force to stay; he staid with his good will, and did consent to the piracy. And then another witness is D. Creagh, who says, that May was so zealous in the matter, that he said to him, 'God damn him, he deserves to be shot through the head.'

Sparkes was on board the ship, and had a designed end, and no compulsion was used towards him, since he had liberty to depart; but the staying behind by the rest, is a great evidence to induce you to believe they were parties in the design; for why else should not they go ashore as well as others, since there doth not appear any restraint upon them to stay, especially when a general word was given, that those who would go on shore should go on the deck, and a boat was ready to carry them off?

They say, they wanted a bucket in the boat, and they gave them one to lave out the water; that is a plain evidence they were willing to be rid of those that were not willing to engage with them; and if they had not approved of the design, they were not hindered from going in the boat. As for those that came from the James, there was no manner of force on them, but they were sent from the captain to assist the captain of the Charles; for those two ships having lain near together at the Graves, there was some intelligence of such a design in agitation, and these three forsook their own ships. Every declared his design to some: And he told them what shares they should have; and because he was their captain and commander, he thought himself entitled to a double share.

And then you have heard what was done in the whole progress of this wicked design; every one of these men had their share; even this W. May, though he was sick for some time, and was set ashore at Joanna, and at the ship's return taken in again, yet he had his share of all the prizes. W. Bishop had his share, James Lewis had his share, and John Sparkes had his share; and, says this young man, Philip Middleton, I had my share, which was above an hundred pound, which was thought by them to be a good share for a boy; and Sparkes took him at a disadvantage, and having an opportunity, took it from him.

Now if there be a piracy committed, though contrived but by one man, yet if others do concur in it; they are equally guilty.

Now, though these prisoners tell you, there was a force upon them, it is a mere suggestion, without any manner of evidence; but there is evidence of their consenting and confederating in this wicked enterprize.

Indeed there hath been a trial before, which you have all heard of; for the city and nation have discoursed of it; consider therefore the evidence. You have a great trust reposed in you, for you are not to act arbitrarily, but you are accountable to God Almighty, to whom you are sworn, and to the government for the verdict you give. If you are not satisfied in your consciences that the evidence is sufficient to find these men guilty, in God's name acquit them. But if you are satisfied in the sufficiency of the evidence to convict them, you must find them guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, swear an officer to keep the jury; which was done, and the jury went out to consider of their verdict. And, in the mean time, the six prisoners were again arraigned upon two several indictments; the one for piratically taking away a Moorish ship, and the other for committing piracy upon two Danish ships. To both which indictments Joseph Dawson pleaded Guilty; the other five pleaded Not Guilty, and put them upon their trials.

Then the Jury having been withdrawn a little while, returned into court.

Foreman. If there be any evidence to prove that John Sparkes consented to the running away of the ship, we desire it may be heard again.

L. C. J. Holt. He was with them at the carrying off the ship, and at the taking of the several prizes; and had his share afterwards. What is consent? Can men otherwise demonstrate their consent, than by their actions?

Juryman. But we understand, my lord, that he was tried upon his consenting to carry away the ship

L. C. J. Holt What do you mean by consenting? If a ship be carried away with force from the captain, divers pirates are concerned with her, one continues aboard and receives a share of the profit of the several prizes; is not that an evidence of consent to the piratical design? Was it not proved that many went out of the ship that were not willing to go on that design? And that was with the leave of the rest that remained

Just. Eyre And one stood on the deck, and said with a loud voice that they that will not go, may have liberty to go ashore

Mr. Conyers No man was hindered but the Doctor, being a useful man

L. C. J. Holt When a ship is run away with and people are aboard that ship so run away with that proves their consent unless they can produce evidence to the contrary

Just. Fu. m. The captain was in his bed sick of a fever at that time, and was not willing to go with them, and they sent him away from them

Just. Jure And every man had his share

Then the Jury consulting together a very little time agreed on their verdict

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen of the jury, answer to your names. J. Digrave

L. C. J. Holt Gentlemen, you have done extremely well and you have done very much to regain the honour of the nation, and the city.

Then the Court adjourned to Friday next the 6th of November, two of the clock in the afternoon, on which day Edward Forsyth, &c. were tried upon two other Indictments for several practices

VOL. XIII.

An Abstract of the Trial of Edward Forsyth, James Lewis, William May, William Bishop, John Sparks, (Joseph Dawson having pleaded Guilty upon his Assignment) at the Sessions House in the Old Bailey, Friday, November 6, 1696 where were present Sir Charles Hedges Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, the Lord Chief Justice Holt the Lord Chief Justice Trenchard, with several others of his Majesty's Judges and Commissioners

After several challenges made by the prisoners of the person returned upon the Jury, these twelve gentlemen were sworn viz. River Mott, John James, Richard Rid, William H. ut, John Hammond, Abraham Hickman, John Watson, Benjamin Hooper, John Hibbert, Richard Chiswell, Daniel Ray, William Hatch

Then the Clerk read the two Indictments upon which they were tried, viz. one for seizing, robbing, and carrying away two ships belonging to Denmark, on the 29th of August, 1694. The other for that they, on the 18th of September, 1695, in a place 40 leagues distant from Surinam, did forcibly and piratically set upon a Moorish ship, and take away her tackle and goods, to a great value

Then Dr. Neel, one of his Majesty's Advocates, spoke to the Jury as followeth

My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury; This crime the prisoners at the bar stand charged with, and which has been opened to you upon the indictments, is piracy, which is the worst sort of robbery, both in its nature and its effects, since it disturbs the commerce and friendship between different nations, and if left unpunished, involves them in war and blood for sovereign powers and nations have no courts of justice afterwards to resort to, as the subjects of princes have, in their own countries, for redress or punishment; but they can only have recourse to arms and war, which how expensive, and how dangerous they are, and what calamities and ruin they carry along with them, no person can be a stranger to. So that those who bring not such criminals to judgment, when it lies in their power, and is their duty to do so, are answerable, in a great measure, before God and man, for all the fatal consequences of such acquittals, which bring a scandal on the public justice, and are often attended with public calamities—It is not therefore, gentlemen, to be supposed, that wise or honest men, (and there are none who would be the right to be otherwise) who love their country, and wish its peace and prosperity, would be guilty in that kind.—Gentlemen, this piracy was begun in Europe, carried on through Africa, and ended in the remotest Indies; so that, in a manner, all the world is concerned in this trial, and etc.

pects and demands justice of them, if they are guilty, at your hands.

Then the Witnesses were produced to prove the facts charged upon the prisoners, viz. Jo. Dann, David Creagh, Phil. Middleton, and others; who fully proved against them, That the prisoners, with several other wicked persons not yet taken, did forcibly take away the ship Charles the Second from the lawful commander, captain Gibson, with a piratical design; and in the said ship did afterwards commit several piracies. At the Isle of May they took three English ships. From thence they went to the coast of Guinea; and when some of the natives came on board with their gold, to trade with them, they took away their gold, and carried them away for slaves. And then went to the Isle of Princes and took two Danish ships, and took out what was in them, viz. 40 pound weight of gold dust, and other merchandise; and they offered to restore one of the ships to the master after they had robbed her, but the master said she was insured, and he would not take her again. And afterwards they burnt one of the ships, and carried away the other. Then they went to Bab's Key, at the mouth of the Red Sea, waiting for the Mocha fleet, which one night passed by them unseen; but were informed the next day that they were gone. And then calling a council, they agreed to follow them; and accordingly went after them, and came up with one of them which was about 250 ton, and with small resistance took her, and put some men on board her, and took gold and silver out of her to the value of 30 or 40,000*l.* with other merchandise; and afterwards met with the ship called the Gunsway, and robbed her likewise of all her furniture, to a very great value. And about a week after, they shared all the prizes they had taken; and some had 1,000*l.* some had 800*l.*, some 700*l.* some 500*l.* every man in the ship his share, as they thought they deserved. And it was particularly proved by the evidence against the prisoners, that they had their shares. [The more particular relation of which is already printed at large in the foregoing Trial.]

When the king's evidence had done, the prisoners were permitted to say what they could in their defence; but the same appearing to be very weak, the lord chief justice Holt summed up the evidence; and the jury going out to consider their verdict, after a short stay, brought them in all Guilty.

Then the Court adjourned to the 10th of November following.

After the Trial of John Murphey was over, the Prisoners were brought to the Bar.

Cl. of Ar. Joseph Dawson, you by your own confession are convicted of piracy and robbery: what have you to say why sentence of death shall not be passed upon you according to law?

Dawson. I submit myself to the king and the honourable bench.

Cl. of Ar. Edward Forseith, what have you to say, &c.

Forseith. I am, an innocent man;—and went on to justify himself, &c.

Judge of the Admiralty. You and the rest of the prisoners at the bar have had a very fair trial, and been fully heard upon your defence; but the jury, your countrymen, upon whom you put yourselves to be tried, have found you guilty: so that the insisting upon your justification cannot now avail you any thing, the verdict being given; but if you have any thing to offer in arrest of judgment, or can shew any cause why the court should not proceed to give judgment according as the law directs, against persons convicted of piracy, you shall have liberty to speak, and will be heard.

Forseith. I desire to be sent into India to suffer there.

Cl. of Ar. William May, what have you to say, &c.

May. My lord, I being a very sickly man, never acted in all the voyage. I have served my king and country this thirty years, and am very willing to serve the East-India company where they please to command me; and desire the honourable bench to consider my case, and if I must suffer, I desire to be sent into India to suffer there.

Cl. of Ar. William Bishop, what have you to say, &c.

Bishop. I was forced away; and when I went, was but 18 years old, and am now but 21, and desire mercy of the king and the court.

Lewis. I am an ignorant person, and leave myself to the king's mercy.

Sparkes. I leave myself to the king's mercy, and to the honourable court.

Judge of the Admiralty. Joseph Dawson, you stand convicted upon four indictments, by your own confession, for piracy and robbery. And you, Edward Forseith, William May, William Bishop, James Lewis and John Sparkes, having put yourselves upon your trials according to the customs and laws of your own country, have been found guilty upon three several indictments, for the same detestable crimes committed upon the ships and goods of Indians, of Danes, and your own fellow-subjects. The law for the heinousness of your crime hath appointed a severe punishment, by an ignominious death: and the Judgment which the law awards, is this:

'That you and every one of you be taken from hence to the place from whence you came, and from thence to the place of execution; and that there you, and every one of you be hanged by the necks, until you and every one of you be dead:—and the Lord have mercy upon you.'

According to this sentence, Edward Forseith and the rest were executed on Wednesday, November the 25th, 1694, at Execution-Doek, the usual place for the execution of pirates.

393. The Trial of Captain THOMAS VAUGHAN, at the Old-Bailey, for High-Treason on the High Seas; 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.*

THE Court being sat, at which were present, sir Charles Hedges, judge of the high court of admiralty, the lord chief justice Holt, the lord chief justice Treby, the lord chief baron Ward, Mr. Justice Turtin, and others of his majesty's commissioners; the court proceeded on this manner.

Cl. of Ar. Make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes. All manner of persons that have any thing more to do,

* See 2 Salk. 684, and Holt, 689. See also East's Pl. Cr. c. 2. s. 40. 43.

"Captain Vaughan was not an alien enemy, but being a natural born subject of this realm, he became a traitor; for that he was put in prison, for that he answered, and with his life. But it was for that act of hostility merely. With regard to his character of a subject he remained till the moment of his execution, as if that act had never been committed. There is very little light to be procured from our books, to assist us in our inquiry, how far a neutral joining in an act of hostility is to be considered as having acquired the character of alien enemy. The subject was indirectly discussed in the case of captain Vaughan, to which I have alluded. He was charged in the indictment with adhering to the king's enemies by cruising 'cum subditis Gallicis;' the fact was that many of his crew were not natural born subjects of the French king, but Hollanders. It was made a question whether the Hollanders should be called 'subditi Gallici,' and though the point was not authoritatively decided because some of the crew were certainly French, which was sufficient to support the indictment, yet it was held by Holt, C. J. and agreed to by the rest of the court, that the Hollanders by accepting a commission from the French king became 'subditi Gallici,' and so remained during the continuance of their service in a state of qualified subjection arising out of the service and determining with it. This, had it been the very point in judgment, would have gone a great way towards deciding the present question. The commission under which the plaintiff being a German acted was put an end to by the capture of the frigate, in which he was. After that time he had no opportunity of continuing in the service of the state of Holland, and his temporary character of alien enemy ceased and determined with the authority under which he acted. Captain Vaughan's case as far as it goes draws a line and fairly marks out when that character begins and when it shall end." Per Eyre, Chief Justice in giving judgment in the case of Sparenburgh v. Bannatyne. 1 Bos. and Pul. Rep.

&c. and were adjourned to this hour, draw near and give your attendance. God save the king.

Then the Grand Jury were called over, and the appearances marked. And witnesses being sworn in court to give evidence to them against Thomas Vaughan, they withdrew to hear the same.

Then the Keeper of Newgate was ordered to bring his prisoner, Thomas Vaughan, to the bar. (Which he did.)

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Vaughan, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Thou standest indicted, &c. How sayest thou, Thomas Vaughan, art thou guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty? Vaughan. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Vaughan. By God and this country.

Cl. of Ar. God send thee a good deliverance.

And then the Court proceeded to the Trial of the Pirates, and gave notice to Mr. Vaughan to prepare for his Trial on Friday next, the 6th of November, 1696.

November 6, 1696.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes. All manner of persons, that have any thing more to do at this sessions of Oyer and Terminer, adjourned over to this day, draw near and give your attendance? And you sheriffs of the city of London, return the precepts to you directed, upon pain and peril which will fall thereupon.

Then the Under-Sheriff returned the Precepts.

Cl. of Ar. Make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes. You good men of the city of London, summoned to appear this day, to try between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner at the bar, answer to your names as you shall be called, every one at the first call, and save your issues.

The whole pannel was called over, and the appearances of those that answered recorded, and the defaulters were again called over.

Mr. Phipps.* Will your lordship please to order that two men may be brought from the Marshalsea, on the behalf of the prisoner?

* That the st. 7 W. 3, c. 8, extends to persons indicted under st. 25 H. 8, c. 15, for high-treason committed on the high seas, see East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 2. s. 45. Whether corruption of blood is wrought by judgment of treason committed on the high seas, see East as above, and Foster's Crown Cases, &c. there cited, pp. 222. 226. 1 H. P. C. c. 27, Salk. 85.

L. C. J. Holt: You shall have an order.

Then the court went on the trial of the Six Pirates: and after the trial was over, Thomas Vaughan was called to the bar.

Vaughan. My lord, my iron are very uneasy to me, I desire they may be taken off.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, ay, take them off.

Mr. Phipps. If your lordship please, we have some doubts as to the indictment.

L. C. J. Holt. If you have any exceptions, you ought to have made them before the prisoner pleaded to it.

Mr. Phipps. I thought you had allowed it, my lord, in former cases.

L. C. J. No, we did not allow it as of right due to the prisoner; the exceptions should have been made before the plea. You were indulged in being heard at first in the cases of Rookwood, Cranburne, and Lowick: but it was not the intent of the act to alter the method of the proceeding, and so upon consideration hath it been determined. The prisoner hath time given by the act to make any exception to the indictment before he pleaded; but you may move what you will afterwards in arrest of judgment, if it be material.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Vaughan, those men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of life and death; if therefore you challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

Mr. Phipps. There was one man here that desired to be excused, because he was on the grand jury; therefore it seems there are some returned upon this jury that were on the grand jury, which I think ought not to be.

L. C. J. Challenge them then.

Mr. Phipps. We do not know the men.

Then the Panel was called over, and a great many challenges made, and the twelve men that were sworn, were these: Edward Leeds, Nath. Green, Hen. Sherbrooke, J. Sherbrooke, T. Emms, Peter Parker, Caleb Hoak, Jacobine Roberts, Tho. Parker, Peter Gray, Roger Poston, — Woolley.

Cl. of Ar. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes. If any one can inform my lord the king's justices, and the king's serjeant, the king's attorney-general, the king's advocate in his high-court of admiralty, before this inquest be taken of the high-treason whereof Thomas Vaughan, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoner at the bar stands upon his defence; and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance.

See the preceding Case.

Mr. P. Cr. 2, s. 1, 45. Ligon's Case, 1681, s. 2, 222.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Vaughan, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of Thomas Vaughan.

"Whereas, * That before and until the 8th day of July, in the 7th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king W. 3, there was open war between our said lord the king, and Lewis the French king; And that the said war continued on the said 8th day of July, in the 7th year aforesaid, and doth still continue. And that for all the time aforesaid, the said Lewis the French king and his subjects were, and at present are enemies of our said lord the king that now is: And that at the time of the said war, and before the said 8th day of July, in the 7th year aforesaid, the said Lewis the French king set out, amongst others, a certain small ship of war, called the Loyal Clencarty, of which Thomas Vaughan, a subject of our said lord the king that now is, was commander, with several French subjects, enemies of our said lord the king, to the number of fifteen persons, in a warlike manner, to take and destroy the ships, goods, and monies of our said lord the king, and his subjects, and against our said lord the king, to wage war upon the high-seas within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England. And that at the time of the said war between our said lord the king, and the aforesaid Lewis the French king, Tho. Vaughan, late of Galloway, in the kingdom of Ireland, mariner, being a subject of our said now lord the king, as a false rebel against the said king his supreme lord, and not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor considering the duty of his allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, and altogether withdrawing the cordial love, and true and due obedience which every true and faithful subject of our said lord the king ought by law to have towards the said king; and the said war as much as in him lay, against our said lord the king designing and intending to prosecute and assist; the said Tho. Vaughan, on the said 8th day of July, in the said 7th year of the king being a soldier a-board the ship of war, called the Loyal Clencarty, in the service of the said Lewis the French king, and being then on the high-seas, within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England, about fourteen leagues from Deal, did then and there by force and arms, falsely, maliciously, wickedly and traitorously aid, help, and assist the enemies of our said lord the king, in the ship of war called the Loyal Clencarty. And afterwards the said Thomas Vaughan, in the execution and performance of his said aiding, helping, and assisting, maliciously, falsely, and traitorously went a-cruising to several maritime places within the jurisdiction aforesaid, by force and arms to take the ships, goods, and money of our said lord the king, and his subjects; against the duty of his allegiance, the peace of our said lord the king, and also against a statute in that case made and provided.

"And the said jurors of our said lord the king, upon their said oaths, farther represent, that the aforesaid Thomas Vaughan, as a false traitor against our said lord the king, further designing, practising, and with his whole strength intending the common peace and tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb; and a war and rebellion against the said king upon the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England, to move, stir up, and procure, and the said lord the king, from the title, honour, royal name, and imperial crown of his kingdom of England, and dominions upon the high seas, to depose and deprive, and miserable slaughter of the subjects of the said lord the king, of this kingdom of England, upon the high seas and within the jurisdiction aforesaid, to cause and procure, on the said 8th day of July, in the said 7th year of the king upon the high seas, about fourteen leagues from Deal, and within the dominion of the crown of England, and within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, devilishly, and treacherously by force and arms, with divers other false rebels and traitors (to the jurors unknown), war against our said now lord the king prepared, prompted, hired, and waged. And that the said Thomas Vaughan in performance of his said war and rebellion then and there, by force and arms maliciously, wickedly, and openly assembled and joined himself with several other false traitors and rebels (to the jurors unknown) to the number of fifteen persons, being armed, and provided in a warlike manner with guns and other arms, as well of offensive as defensive. And the said Thomas Vaughan, then and there, being aboard the said ship of war, called the Loyal Clencarty, assembled with the other false rebels and traitors as aforesaid, maliciously, wickedly and traitorously sailed a cruising to several maritime places, with the aforesaid ship of war, called the Loyal Clencarty, with an intent to take, spoil and carry away the ships, goods, and money, of our said lord the king, and his subjects, by force and arms, upon the high and open seas, within the jurisdiction aforesaid, against the duty of his allegiance, the peace of our said lord the king, his crown and dignities, and likewise against the form of a statute in this case made and provided." *

If you find him guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since. If you find him guilty, you are to enquire whether he fled for it. If you find that he fled for it, you are to enquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty. If you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so and no more; and bear your evidence.

Mr. Whitaker. May it please you, my lord, and the gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar, Thomas Vaughan, stands indicted for high-treason: that whereas on the 9th of July, there was a war between his majesty the king of England, and Lewis the French king; amongst other warlike preparations that the French king did make, he did set forth a ship called the Loyal Clencarty; that the prisoner at the bar, as a false traitor, did list himself aboard this ship; and on the high-seas, about eleven leagues from Deal, did traitorously aid the king's enemies to take the king's ships. This is said to be against the duty of his allegiance, and the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. He stands further indicted, for that he, the said Thomas Vaughan, with several other false traitors, did levy war, and arm themselves with arms, offensive and defensive, and was cruising on the high-seas, off of Deal, with an intent to take the king's ships, and to kill and destroy the king's subjects, against the duty of his allegiance, and the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. To this indictment he has pleaded not guilty. We shall call our witnesses, and prove the fact, and doubt not but you will do your duty.

Dr. Littleton. Gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the indictment opened, as also what sort of crime the prisoner at the bar stands charged with, viz. That he, being a subject of the crown of England, has, together with his accomplices, armed himself in a military way, to murder and destroy his fellow-subjects, and as much as in him lay, to ruin his native country, by running the trade and traffic, which is the great support and riches of the nation. And that this crime might be consummate, he, with his accomplices, has done what in him lay, to dethrone and dispossess his sacred majesty; as well knowing it was in vain to expect to make the nation unhappy, as long as we enjoy so great and good a prince. So that you are to look on the prisoner as an enemy and traitor in his own country; and not only so, but as one of the worst and most dangerous enemies; since he being a subject of these islands, was the better able to spy out our weaknesses and defects, and thereby to do us the greatest mischief. It is not to be expressed what ruin and desolation it would have caused to this nation, had this man and his accomplices brought their wicked intentions to effect. And till this was done to aid and assist the grand enemy of Christendom, and of our own country in particular, the French king. Therefore, as you are lovers of your king and country, and your fellow-subjects, whom the prisoner and his accomplices would have destroyed; I am sure you will take care to do the nation justice, and that he be brought to condign punishment. Gentlemen, there is one thing further that I must not omit, viz. That the prisoner at the bar being in custody for these very crimes about a twelve-month since, did not think fit to trust to his innocency, nor to his pretended French extraction, but the day before he was to be tried, he thought fit to break prison, withdraw from justice, and run his country: which, though not a confession and full proof, yet is a great evidence of his guilt.

Sol. Gen. (Sir John Hawles.) May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar, Thomas Vaughan, stands indicted for two sorts of treason: the one is for levying war against the king, the other is for aiding and abetting the king's enemies. And to prove the first, the levying of war, we shall prove that he was a captain of a French ship, called the Granado, of St. Maloes; and that with that ship he took and carried away many of his majesty's subjects, and took several merchant ships, and carried them to France. We shall likewise prove that he was captain of another French ship, called the Loyal Clencarty, with which he was cruising off of Deal, where we had several ships lying at the same time: and there he being on board the said ship Clencarty, was taken prisoner, with a commission, by which he was constituted captain of the Loyal Clencarty, under the band of Lewis the French king.*

And to prove him aiding and abetting to the king's enemies, we shall prove against him this particular fact; that he and his accomplices did in the year 1693, come to London, and went to Tower-wharf, to enquire what vessels were ready to go down the river; and there was one laden with piece-goods; and he put himself, and several other of his accomplices into this vessel, to go down the river: but they had contrived the matter, and brought it so to pass, that they fell on those men who had the government of the ship, and carried away this vessel to France. Now, if this be true, the prisoner is certainly guilty of aiding the king's enemies: and to prove he was guilty of this, we will prove to you, that even in France, where he was at perfect liberty, he owned he was the contriver of all this, and that he had a thousand pound for his share of what was taken from our merchants. If we prove these two facts against him, I doubt not but you will find him guilty. We will call our witnesses.

Cl. of Arr. T. Eglington, Rich. Crouch, Samuel Oldham, John Bub, — Noden. (Who appeared, and were sworn.)

Vaughan. With submission to your lordships, and the honourable bench, I beg that they may be put asunder, out of hearing of one another.

L. C. J. Let it be so; though you cannot insist upon it as your right, but only a favour that we may grant.*

Mr. Cowper. Set up Richard Crouch. Is your name Richard Crouch?

Crouch. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. Give my lord and the jury an account of what you know of the ship Coventry taking of the Clencarty, and what you know concerning the prisoner at the bar in taking of her?

Crouch. We weighed our anchor about four o'clock.

Mr. Cowper. Where were you?

Crouch. At the Nore.

Mr. Cowper. In what ship?

Crouch. The Coventry. After we had been under sail a matter of an hour, we came to an anchor with a little wind; so, sir, this Thomas Vaughan met with a couple of pinks, they were small vessels, that he designed to take; but he saw up, and so lay by all night.

Mr. Cowper. Who lay by?

Crouch. Thomas Vaughan, the prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Cowper. In what vessel was he?

Crouch. In a two-and-twenty-oar barge; he lay by at the Gun-fleet: The next morning we weighed anchor at day-light; we saw him, and chased after him, and we made them, and he made us; and we made what haste we could, and coming up, we fired a gun at him, and then we fired another, and then we went ashore.*

Mr. Cowper. What do you mean that he run his vessel on the sands?

Crouch. Yes; and then we fired another gun at him, and then he got off again; and then we fired another gun, and could not bring him to, and then he got off the sands again; and when we came up to him, we manned our long-boat, and pinnace, and barge, and had him at last. When he came on board, he said, I cannot deny but I am an Irishman, and that my design was to burn the ships at the Nore.

Mr. Cowper. Did he himself confess it?

* See Peter Cook's Case, p. 311, of the present volume; and Becke's Law of Evidence as there referred to.

Crouch. Yes, he did; that is the man, I know him well enough.

L. C. J. When you took him, in what ship was he?—Crouch. In the Coventry.

L. C. J. Out of what ship was he taken?

Crouch. The two-and-twenty-oar barge.

L. C. J. What ship did he belong to?

Crouch. I reckon it was any lord Harsley's barge.

L. C. J. Who did it belong to then?

Crouch. To the king of France.

L. C. J. What company was there in her? How many men had she aboard?

Crouch. About five-and-twenty hands.

Mr. Cowper. Did you ever hear him say any thing of a commission he had?

Crouch. I heard he had a French commission, but I did not see it.

Mr. Cowper. Did you hear him say any thing of it?—Crouch. No.

Mr. Cowper. But he told you his design was to burn the ships at the Nose?—Crouch. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. What ships?

Crouch. The English ships; there were several ships there then.

L. C. J. Were there no Frenchmen aboard the barge?—Crouch. No, that I can tell.

Mr. Lockmere. From whence did he come, from England, or France?

Crouch. From Calais in France.

L. C. J. Pristee hear me, This two-and-twenty-oar barge, did it belong to any other ship?

Crouch. No, not that I can tell.

L. C. J. Did he call that vessel the Loyal Glencasty?—Crouch. Yes, my lord.

Then Edmund Courtney was called.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Courtney, pray tell my lord and the jury what you know of the going away of a Custom house boat?

Courtney. I will tell you, if you please.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, I think they ought not to excuse to that, because it is not laid in the indictment. The carrying away of the Custom-house barge is not mentioned in the indictment; and by the new act for regulating trials in cases of treason, no evidence is to be admitted or given of any overt act, that is not expressly laid in the indictment.

L. C. J. Nothing else? Suppose a man be indicted for levying of war against the king, or adhering to the king's enemies, cannot they prove any act that makes out a levying of war, or an adherence to the king's enemies?

Mr. Phipps. With submission, not by that, my lord, unless it be laid in the indictment.

L. C. J. Levying of war is the treason; may they not prove that levying of war, without being confined to any special or particular act?

Mr. Phipps. With submission, by the 25th of Edw. 3. levying of war, as well as imagining the death of the king, must have the compassing, that was a general expression in the indictment.

L. C. J. Levying of war is an overt act.

Sol. Gen. The compassing of overt acts, when the compassing and imagining the king's death is a crime in question; and this must be discovered by overt acts. But if reason be falsifying of the king's money, this is treason; but there can be no overt act of that, for that is an overt act itself; but there must be an overt act to prove the compassing; and imagining the death of the king, and is no other sort of treason.

L. C. J. Levying of war, that is an overt act; so is adhering to the king's enemies. Now compassing and imagining the death of the king is not an overt act in itself, but is a secret imagination in the mind, and a purpose in the heart; but there must be external acts to discover that imagination and purpose.

Mr. Phipps. What is the meaning of the new act, then, that there shall be no evidence of any overt act, but what is laid in the indictment?

L. C. J. What overt acts are there in clipping and coining?

Mr. Phipps. That is not within the new act of parliament.

L. C. J. That is most true; the one is excepted, the other is not comprehended: but the question is upon the statute of 25 Ed. 3, to which the late act doth refer. Now proving an adherence to the king's enemy is proving an overt act. Suppose it be the killing of the chancellor, or treasurer, or judge in the execution of his office, what overt acts will you have then? Adhering to the king's enemies, is a treason that consists in doing an overt act.

Mr. Phipps. Yes, my lord, I take it that it is; for the new act, by saying, 'that no evidence shall be admitted of any overt act that is not expressly laid in the indictment,' must be intended of such treasons, of which by law overt acts ought to be laid. Now the killing of the chancellor, or treasurer, or judge in the execution of his office, are not such treasons of which it was necessary to lay any overt acts in the indictment, and so not within the meaning of this new law. But levying war, and adhering to the king's enemies, which are the treasons in this indictment, must, by the express purview of 25 Ed. 3, be proved by overt acts, which are to be alleged in the indictment.

Sol. Gen. The new act does not alter the law in this particular; what was law before is law now; it leaves the overt acts as they were before; and it says not that an overt act need to be expressed where it was not aforesaid before. Now if a man be indicted for compassing the death of a private person, there ought to be some overt act to prove his design; but if there be an indictment for murder, there needs no other overt act to prove it, but the murder itself.

L. C. J. But the force of the objection lies in this, viz. to say a man levied war, or adhered to the king's enemies, is no good indictment; but it is necessary to allege in what manner he levied war, or adhered to the king's enemies; as that he appeared in such a warlike man, or did adhere to and assist the king's enemies, by joining forces with them, or otherwise assisting them, or confederating with them; that must be specified. But if you indict a man generally for adhering to the king's enemies, and not say how and in what manner he did adhere to them, that is not a good indictment; therefore, if you particularize what enemies, and how and in what manner he adhered to them, no evidence can be given of any other kind of adherence, but that which is so specified in the indictment.*

Sol. Gen. Then we must put all our evidence into the indictment.

Mr. Phipps. So you must, as to the overt acts.

Sol. Gen. That will be the same thing as to put in all our evidence, if we must give evidence of no overt act but what is expressed in the indictment. But I do not take it, that the act requires all overt acts to be put in the indictment.

Mr. Phipps. The act says so. Suppose you had left out the overt act, would the indictment have been good?

Sol. Gen. We did not intend to put in all the overt acts, but only what related to that part of the treason.

Mr. Phipps. The treason must be proved by overt acts, and the overt acts that prove the treason must be mentioned in the indictment.

Sol. Gen. What! the overt acts of the treasons before mentioned, as counterfeiting the king's money, and the like, are all to be mentioned?

L. C. J. Consider, if you can make that a good indictment, to say, that the prisoner adhered to the king's enemies, without mentioning any overt acts to manifest such an adherence, then your answer to Mr. Phipps is full; but if it be not a good indictment, without alleging particular acts of adherence, then it necessarily follows, that if particulars are alleged, and you do not prove them as is alleged, you have failed in the indictment, and so his objection will lie hard upon you.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we framed our indictment according to the letter of the statute.

L. C. J. In compassing the death of the king, you must shew how that is manifested by the overt acts.

Sol. Gen. But compassing and imagining must be discovered by some overt acts.

L. C. J. Treby. This is a doubt I have often thought of: I thought it most natural that the word overt act should relate to the first article, viz. 'compassing and imagining of the king's death.' For overt act seems to be opposed to something of a contrary nature: act is opposed properly to thought, overt is properly opposed to secret. And that sort of treason consisting in secret thought and internal purpose, cannot be known, tried, and judged of, without being disclosed and manifested by some external open act: wherefore it is pertinent and reasonable, in order to attain a man of such treason, that the indictment should charge and set forth the act, as well as the thought. And so it hath been used to be done.

But such order or manner doth not seem so natural or necessary, in framing indictments for other treasons, where the treason consists in visible or discernible facts, as levying war, &c.

Nevertheless, I think an overt act ought to be alleged in an indictment of treason for adhering to the king's enemies, giving them aid and comfort.* And the overt act or acts, in this case, ought to be the particular actions, means, or manner by which the aid and comfort was given.

My lord Coke declares his opinion to this purpose. His words (which I read out of his book here) are these: "The composition and connection of the words are to be observed," viz. [thereof be attained by overt deed.] "This," says he, "relates to the several and distinct treasons before expressed, and especially to the compassing and imagining of the death of the king, &c. for that it is secret in the heart, &c." Now the articles of treason before expressed in the statute of 25 Ed. 3, are four. 1. Compassing, &c. 2. Violating the queen, &c. 3. Levying war; and, 4. This of adhering, &c. (And yet it is hardly possible to set forth any overt act concerning the second, otherwise than the words of the statute, that article expressing so particular a fact).

I do observe also, that these words "being thereof attained by overt fact" do, in this statute, immediately follow this article of adhering, &c. And it would be a great violence to construe them to refer to the first article only, and not to this last, to which they are thus connected. If they are to be restrained to a single article, it were more agreeable to the strict rules of construing, to refer them to this of adhering only.

L. C. J. That which I insist on is this: Whether the indictment would be good, without expressing the special overt act? If it be, then this is a surplage, and we are not confined to it; but if it be not a good indictment without expressing it, then we are confined to it.

Mr. Phipps. I believe Mr. Solicitor never saw an indictment of this kind, without an overt act laid in it.

L. C. J. Can you prove the facts laid in the indictment? for certainly the indictment, without mentioning particular acts of adherence, would not be good.

Mr. Comyn. Yes, my lord; and as to the evidence before you, we would only offer this: whether in this case, if the indictment were laid generally, for adhering to the king's enemies in one place, and in another place levying of war, and nothing more particular, it would be good? I doubt it would not. But when there is laid a particular act of adhering, we may give in evidence matter to strengthen the direct proof of that particular act of adhering

* See East's Pl. C. c. 2, s. 54. 57.

* See Hawkins's Pl. C. c. 17, s. 29.

as the king's enemies, though that matter be not specially laid in the indictment: for the act goes only to this, that the prisoner shall not be convicted, unless you prove against him the overt acts specially laid in the indictment; but whether it shall not be heard, to make the other overt act which is laid, the more probable? Now we have laid a special overt act in the indictment; and we have produced evidence of it, and we would produce likewise collateral evidence, to induce a firmer belief of that special overt act, by shewing you that he hath made it his practice, during the war, to aid and assist the king's enemies: but if the jury do not find him guilty of the special overt acts laid in the indictment, they cannot find him guilty by the proof of any other overt act not laid in the indictment. But if we prove he has made this his practice, in other instances, during the war, whether that proof shall not be received?

Mr. Phipps. My lord, I desire the act may be read. It expressly contradicts what Mr. Cowper says; for it says, that no evidence shall be given in the overt-act, that is not expressly laid in the indictment.

— The Act was read.

L. C. J. That is, you may give evidence of an overt-act that is not in the indictment, if it conduces to prove one that is in it. And if consulting to kill the king, or raise a rebellion, is laid in the indictment, you may give in evidence an acting in pursuance of a consult, that is, an evidence that they agreed to do it: though that doing of the thing is, of itself another overt-act, but it tends to prove the act laid in the indictment.*

Mr. Phipps. The overt-act laid in this indictment, is, his cruising in the Clencarty; and this overt-act you would prove, is no evidence of that, nor relates to it, but it is a distinct overt-act of itself.

L. C. J. You cannot give evidence of a distinct act that has no relation to the overt-act mentioned in the indictment, though it shall conduce to prove the same species of treason.†

Mr. Cowper. We would apply this proof to the overt-act laid in the indictment.

L. C. J. Any thing that has a direct tendency to it you may prove.

Mr. Cowper. We have laid the overt-act, that he did voluntarily put himself on board this vessel of the French king, the Loyal Clencarty, and did go to sea in her, and cruise, with a design to take the ships of the king of England, and his subjects. Now part of the overt-act is, his intention in the act of cruising; we do not charge him with taking one ship; as that his intention is a member of the overt-act; and it must be proved, to make his cruising criminal, that he designed to take the ships of the king of England. Now we think it a proper intention, to shew, that during this war, before and after the time of the treason laid in the indictment, he was a cruiser upon, and taker of, the king's ships; and this fortifies the direct proof given of the intention.

L. C. J. I cannot agree to that, because you go not about to prove what he did in the vessel called the Loyal Clencarty; but that he had an intention to commit depredation on the king's subjects: so he might, but in another ship. Now, because a man has a design to commit depredation on the king's subjects in one ship, does that prove he had an intention to do it in another?‡

Mr. Phipps. He was cruising in the Clencarty; that is the overt-act laid in the indictment; and the overt-act you would produce is, his being in another vessel.

L. C. J. Go on, and shew what he did in the Clencarty. You the prisoner, will you ask this man any questions?

Mr. Phipps. Crouch, you said, that the prisoner did say he could not deny but he was an Irishman; how came you to talk about it?

Crouch. He said, I cannot deny but I am an Irishman.

L. C. J. Did he say he was an Irishman? What were the words he used?

Crouch. He told the lieutenant he was an Irishman.

Mr. Phipps. What discourse was there? How came he to say that?

Crouch. I went by only, and heard the words spoken to the lieutenant.

L. C. J. Did he speak English?

Crouch. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. If he spoke English, that is some evidence he is an Englishman, though the contrary may be proved by him.

Vaughan. That would no more prove me an Englishman, than if an Englishman were in France, and could speak French, would prove him a Frenchman, because he could speak French.

L. C. J. You shall be heard by and bye to say what you will on your own behalf.

Mr. Phipps. Were there any Frenchmen on board the Clencarty?—Crouch. No, Sir.

Mr. Phipps. Mr. Vaughan, will you ask him any questions yourself?

Mr. Cowper. Call T. Noden.

Vaughan. How did you know that there were no Frenchmen aboard? Did I address myself to you when I came aboard?

Crouch. No, Sir.

Vaughan. Did I not address myself to the captain when I came aboard? How came I to tell you I was an Irishman?

Crouch. They were all Scotchmen, Englishmen, and Irishmen.

Mr. Phipps. Mr. Vaughan, you need not take up this time of the court about that matter.

* As to the Evidence applying to the overt-act laid in the indictment, and to no other, see Hawkins's Pl. C. b. 2, c. 46, s. 126.

‡ See East's P. C. c. 2, s. 47.

Mr. Cowper. You may go on.

Sol. Gen. Did the prisoner own that he acted by the French king's commission? Did you know any thing of his having a French commission?

Crouch. Yes, I heard he had one, but I did not see it; but I heard so by the company.

L. C. J. Were there any Frenchmen aboard?

Crouch. No, not that I know of. They were Dutchmen, and Englishmen, and Scotchmen and Irishmen.

Mr. Cowper. Call T. Noden. (Who appeared, and was sworn.) Do you give my lord and the jury an account of taking the vessel, called the two-and-twenty-bar barge.

Noden. Last year, about June or July, to the best of my remembrance, I belonged to his majesty's ship the Coventry, and we took the two-and-twenty-bar barge.

L. C. J. How many Dutchmen were aboard?—Noden. I do not know of above one.

L. C. J. Thoby. What were the rest? Were there any Frenchmen?

Noden. Yes, there were several Frenchmen aboard. I belonged to the Coventry; and as we were sailing by the Nore, and the Gunfleet, our captain spied a small vessel sailing by the sands, and he supposed her to be a French privateer, and he fired a gun to make them bring to, and they did not obey; and at last fired a gun, shot and all, and they would not come to. Then the captain ordered to man the boat, and row after them: so the barge, and pinnace, and long-boat were manned, and they came pretty near them. This barge we took, was aground also; and they got her afloat, and she ran aground again: and as they were aground, most of them out of the boat, our long-boat struck aground, and waded after them near half a league; and when we came to the barge, there was this captain Vaughan, and two or three and twenty more; and there was two Dutchmen, and, as I apprehended, some Frenchmen. There was in her a blunderbuss and small arms, and a considerable quantity of hand-granadoes.

L. C. J. What vessel was you aboard?

Noden. The Coventry.

Sol. Gen. What countryman did captain Vaughan say he was?

Noden. I did not hear any thing of it. Our captain examined the Dutchmen what countryman the commander was, and he said he was an Irishman; but I did not hear it myself. When captain Vaughan was brought aboard the Coventry, I was put aboard the prize we had taken.

Mr. Cowper. Had you any discourse with captain Vaughan?—Noden. No.

L. C. J. Did they endeavour to take your ship?

Noden. No, but endeavoured to get away from us.

L. C. J. What guns or ammunition had they?

Noden. I cannot tell particularly; there was some canvas bags, every man had a cartridge bag, and there were some hand-granadoes.

Mr. Whitaker. What fire-arms had they?

Noden. I cannot say how many; but they had muskets, and pistols, and two blunderbusses.

Mr. Cowper. Did you understand whence this ship, the Loyal Clencarty came?

Noden. The Dutchmen said they came from Calais. As near as I can guess, we spied them about eleven o'clock, and we weighed anchor in the afternoon, on Sabbath-day, and they took us to be a light collier, and endeavoured to board us, as the Dutchman said; but when they knew what we were, they endeavoured to escape from us.

Mr. Cowper. Call Sam. Oldham. (Who appeared, and was sworn.) Mr. Oldham, was you aboard the Coventry when she took the ship, called the Clencarty?—Oldham. Yes, I was.

Mr. Cowper. Pray give an account what you observed of the prisoner T. Vaughan then?

Oldham. We weighed our anchor first at the Buoy and Nore; so we saw a prize in the morning; the captain said it was a prize, and we made sail after him, and they ran on the Goodwin Sands: and the captain seeing the barge run aground, we fired at her to bring her to; we fired a second, and she would not come to, but ran aground again. When she was aground, by the captain's order we manned our boats, and out we went after her.

Mr. Cowper. Did you take her?

Oldham. We went, and our long-boat ran aground; I was in the long-boat, and we waded, I believe, a mile and half after her.

L. C. J. What Frenchmen were aboard?

Oldham. I cannot justly say whether there were any.

L. C. J. Were there any?

Oldham. I think one or two.

Mr. Cowper. Were there any Dunkirkers or Walloons aboard?

Oldham. There was a Dutchman, who they called a Fleming; and I discoursed him.

L. C. J. How many outlandish men were there aboard? Was there a dozen, or how many?—Oldham. I cannot say the quantity.

Mr. Cowper. Was there more than two or three?—Oldham. Yes, more than two or three.

L. C. J. What, foreigners?

Oldham. Yes. And there were two Englishmen.

Mr. Cowper. What did you observe of the prisoner at the bar, at the taking of the ship?

Oldham. I did not come aboard along with the prisoner, but with his man; and his man said he was an Irishman, and that he was commander of the boat.

Sol. Gen. What was their design in that ship Clencarty?—Oldham. I cannot tell that.

Mr. Cowper. Did they resist in their being taken?

Oldham. I cannot tell that; I saw no arms.

Mr. Cowper. You were in the action; was there any resistance made?

Oldham. I saw no resistance; they offered to run, they were aground once, and got off again.

Mr. Phipps. You say there were foreigners; what countrymen did you believe those foreigners to be?

Oldham. I cannot justly say, I believe Dutchmen.

L. C. J. How many Dutchmen were there?

Oldham. I cannot say.

Dr. Oldsh. But you said there were some two or three Frenchmen, and that they spoke French; do you understand French?

Oldham. No, Sir.

Mr. Oldsh. Then how do you know they were Frenchmen, and spoke French?

Oldham. They said they were; they did not speak English; several of the ship's company said they were French.

L. C. J. If they were all Dutchmen, and appear in a hostile manner against the king of England's subjects, they are enemies, though we are in league with Holland, and the rest of the seven provinces.

Mr. Phipps. The indictment runs, That the French king, 'quandam Navicularum vocat, The Loyal Clerency, cum quatuordecim Subditis Gallis, Inimicus Dom. Regis nunc, ad numerum quindecim Personatum, replet' preparavit.

L. C. J. Suppose it doth?

Mr. Phipps. It is 'Subditis Gallis,' my lord.

L. C. J. They will be subjects in that matter, if they act under his commission: They are enemies to the king of England, and they have made themselves the French king's subjects by that act.

Mr. Phipps. It appears not that they are Frenchmen, my lord.

L. C. J. If Dutchmen turn rebels to the state, and take pay of the French king, they are under the French king's command, and so are his subjects. Will you make them pirates, when they act under the commission of a sovereign prince? They are then 'Subditi' to him, and so 'Inimici' to us.

Mr. Phipps. It does not take away their allegiance to their lawful prince. They may go to the French king, and serve him; yet that does not transfer their allegiance from their lawful prince to the French king, and make them his subjects. But however, to make them subjects within this indictment, they must be 'Gallis Subditi'; so they must be Frenchmen as well as subjects.

L. C. J. Acting by virtue of a commission from the French king, will excuse them from being pirates, though not from being traitors to their own state; but to all other princes and states against whom they do any acts of hostility, they are enemies: And their serving under the French king's commission, makes them his subjects as to all others but their own prince or state. And though they be not Frenchmen, yet they are 'Gallis Subditi'; for it is the French subject that makes them so be 'Gallis Subditi.'

Mr. Phipps. Pray, my lord, suppose a subject of France should go over to the French, and fight against England; I take it, he may be termed an enemy of the king of England, though his prince be in league with our's; but, with submission, he cannot properly be said to be a subject of the French king. For suppose an indictment of treason against a foreigner, should say, 'that he being a subject, did commit treason'; if it be proved he is not a subject, with submission, he must be acquitted.

Mr. Cowper. There is a local allegiance while he is in the country, or fleet, or armies of the French king.

L. C. J. Dutchmen may be enemies, notwithstanding their state is in amity with us, if they act as enemies.

Mr. Cowper. Call R. Bub. (He was sworn) Was you aboard the Coventry when she took the Clencaity?—Bub. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. Give an account what you know of the prisoner, Thomas Vaughan, at the taking of that ship.

Bub. We came aboard the Coventry, and were at the Nore at anchor; our pennant was taken down to be mended. So in the night captain Vaughan, with his two and twenty oar barge, rounded us two or three times. In the morning we weighed anchor, and fell down, in order to go to the Downs; and we came up with them, and fired at Captain Vaughan, and he would not bring to. With that, our captain ordered to have the barge, and pinnace, and long boat to be manned, to go after him. They followed him, and at last came up with him, and came up pretty near; but could not come so near with the long boat, but were fain to wade up to the middle a mile and a half. We hoisted our colours, in order to fight them, and bore down still upon them, and they would not fight our men. And we took them out; and when they came aboard, the Englishman that was a pilot was to have his freedom, to pilot them up the river. He confessed to the captain, that captain Vaughan intended to burn the ships in the harbour: And the next day after the pilot had confessed it, captain Vaughan himself confessed it on the deck, that he came over with that design.

Mr. Cowper. Who did he confess it to?

Bub. To the boatswain and gunner, as he was on the deck, on the larboard side; that he came on purpose to burn the shipping in the harbour.

L. C. J. Did he confess that himself?

Bub. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Whereabout was this, at the Buoy in the Nore?—Bub. In the Downs, my lord.

L. C. J. Where did the ships lie that were to be burned?—Bub. At Sheerness.

Sol. Gen. He owned himself to be an Irishman, did he not?—Bub. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. And that he came from Colest?

Sub. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. Had you any discourse with him about a commission?

Sub. No. But our lieutenant and captain had, but it was not in my hearing; I will not speak farther than I heard, and what I can justify.

Sol. Gen. Will you ask him any questions?

Mr. Phipps. No.

Sol. Gen. Then call Mr. J. Crittenden, marshal of Dover Castle. (Who was sworn.) Mr. Crittenden, Pray what did you hear the prisoner at the bar confess of his design in coming to England?

Crittenden. I did not hear him say any thing of his design.

Sol. Gen. What did he confess?

Crit. He confessed he was an Irishman.

Mr. Whitaker. Upon what occasion did he confess that?

Crit. When I entered him into my book, I asked him what countryman he was.

Mr. Cowper. What are you?

Crit. I am the marshal of Dover Castle.

Mr. Cowper. By what name did he order you to enter him?

Crit. Thomas Vaughan, an Irishman.

L. C. J. Upon what account did you enter him?—Crit. As a prisoner.

Mr. Cowper. Did he speak any thing of a commission?

Crit. I did not hear him say any thing of that.

Mr. Phipps. Have you your book here?

Crit. Yes, sir.

Dr. Oldish. Was he not in drink when he said so?

Crit. I believe he was not very sober, indeed.

Mr. Phipps. Did you ever after hear him say he was an Irishman?

Crit. The next day he denied it.

Mr. Cowper. When he had considered the danger of it.

Crit. The next day he was examined by some of the justices of the peace.

Sol. Gen. Was you by when he was examined by the justices?—Crit. Yes.

Sol. Gen. What did he then say?

Crit. Then he said he was of Martenico.

Sol. Gen. Set up Mr. Bullock. (Who was sworn.) Mr. Bullock, Do you know the prisoner at the bar?—Bullock. Yes.

Sol. Gen. Pray what have you heard him say of his design that he came into England for?

Bullock. He came to Dover about the 14th of July, 1695, as I remember: I went with several others, who were brought by the captain of the Country, and the lieutenant, and some others; and when we came thither, he there owned himself an Irishman; but when he went the next day to be examined, he said he was of Martenico. He told me he had that barge from the duke of Bulloign; and came on the coast, and was chased into the Flatts, where they took him.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say he had any commission from the French king?

Bullock. I know nothing of that; it was late, and we did not examine him then; but the next day, when he came to be examined, he said he was of Martenico.

Sol. Gen. What did he say his design was?

Bullock. He said, that seeing the boat at Bulloign, he bought it of the duke of Bulloign; and the duke asked him what he would do with her? And he said, he would fit her up, and go and take a ship at sea, that is upon our coasts.

Mr. Phipps. We are in your lordship's judgment, whether we need give any evidence; for we think they have not proved their indictment: for the indictment sets forth, 'That the French king fitted out the Loyal Cleuncarty, of which Thomas Vaughan was commander; and that very many Frenchmen, subjects of the French king, were put on board.' Now the first witness swears there were no Frenchmen; and another swears there was one or two; another that they were foreigners; but does not believe they were Frenchmen. So there is no proof of that part of the indictment; nor is there any proof that he was captain of the Loyal Cleuncarty: So that none can say, it is the same vessel mentioned in the indictment. Nor is any act of hostility proved; for all the witnesses say, that Vaughan never pretended to attack them, but run from them. So that all they depend on, to support the indictment, is to prove that he had a design to burn the ships at Sheerness; which will not serve their turn; for the words of the indictment are, 'ad prædandum super altum Mare.' Now Sheerness is not 'super altum Mare,' but 'infra Corpus Comitatus;' and then not within the indictment.

Mr. Cowper. The words ships at Sheerness, do not imply, that the ships lay within the town of Sheerness, but off of Sheerness, which is 'altum mare.'

Mr. Phipps. Then it is not in your indictment; for that says, at Sheerness.

Mr. Cowper. No, off of Sheerness.

Sol. Gen. It is no contradiction, to say the sea is within part of a county.

Mr. Phipps. The indictment says at Sheerness.

Sol. Gen. Off of Sheerness is the high sea.

Mr. Phipps. Sheerness is not the Buoys in the Nore. Then you must prove he was captain at this time; for the indictment says, 'Ad tunc fuit Capitaneus et Miles.'

L. C. J. One overt-act of adhering to the king's enemies is, that he put himself as a soldier on board the ship.

Mr. Phipps. You will make one part agree with another, That the French king did set out a ship, and gave him a commission to be captain of her.

L. C. J. The witnesses have proved he acted as a captain.

Mr. Phipps. He was taken; and sure, if his was taken, he must have his commission with him.

Sol. Gen. Examine the marshal, he took an account of him: and by direction of Mr. Vaughan himself he entered him as captain; and he entered several men in the ship as Frenchmen, by their own direction. (Mr. Crittenden was called.) Mr. Crittenden, have you got your book in which you made the entry?—Crit. Yes, I have it.

Sol. Gen. By whose order did you enter them?

Crit. By the direction of captain Vaughan, the prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Cooper. How did you know he was a captain?

Crit. Because he told me he was captain, and I entered him as such in my book.

Sol. Gen. Captain of what?

Crit. The Loyal Glencarty.

Sol. Gen. Pray read your entry in your book.

Crit. Thomas Vaughan, captain, Irishman, the 14th of July, 1695; and so of all the rest of the ship's crew.

Just. Turton. Did you write these in the presence of captain Vaughan?

Crit. Yes, in the same room where he was.

Mr. Phipps. Did you write it by his direction?

Crit. For his own part, by his direction; and for the rest, by their direction.

L. C. J. Take all the circumstances together, it is great evidence, considering what they were about, and what vessel they had. Mr. Crittenden, can you tell how many Frenchmen were there?

Crit. I will tell you presently. (He counts them in his book.) There were thirteen.

Sol. Gen. Did captain Vaughan hear any of them bid you enter them as Frenchmen?

Crit. I cannot be positive in that, I suppose he did; he was in the same room.

L. C. J. Do you expect witnesses from France to testify where they were born and christened?

Mr. Phipps. One witness says, there was not one Frenchman there.

L. C. J. Not to his knowledge.

Sol. Gen. What do you know of his having a French commission?

Bullock. I did not see it.

Mr. Whitaker. Did he own his having any French commission?—Bullock. I cannot tell.

Just. Turton. He owned himself a captain.

Mr. Phipps. He might be a captain in another ship, but not in this ship; they ought to prove he was captain at that time, in that ship, by the French king's commission.

L. C. J. All the witnesses say he acted as a captain at that time.

Mr. Cooper. He owned himself the captain of the Loyal Glencarty.

Baron Powis. What can be plainer, than that he owned himself captain?

Dr. Oldish. This seems to me a very strange proof, to be built only upon the sayings of these persons, that they were Frenchmen:

and this to a man who had no authority to examine them, when it might have been easily proved in a regular way, in case they had been so; they might have been examined before a magistrate, and thereby it would have appeared whether they were French or no. And it was absolutely necessary in this case, because of the contrariety of the witnesses; for the first witness said, there were no Frenchmen aboard; the next said, there were two Frenchmen and a Dutchman; and Crittenden said there were thirteen. Now how can these be reconciled, unless there had been a legal examination of the parties? But the thing we would chiefly go on is this; I think they have failed in the foundation of the treason; that is, to prove the prisoner a subject of this crown; neither is there the least colour of proof thereof. At night he came to Mr. Crittenden, and is in drink; there he says he is an Irishman: the next morning, when he is examined before the justices, then he comes in a kind of judgment, and then such a confession would be of moment; but then he confesses himself to be a Frenchman of Martenico. Now, my lord, what credit is to be given to these confessions; when before the marshal he shall say, I am an Irishman; and the next day, when he is on examination, he declares himself a Frenchman; in one confession he is in drink, in the other sober? Now, my lord, I say, what proof is here? Here then the foundation of the treason fails: for the indictment is, 'That he bring a subject of the king of England, levies war.' Now, my lord, if this quality be not proved, all the rest of the indictment falls to the ground: for it is impossible for him to commit treason, where he is not a subject; because there can be no violation of allegiance. So that if he be a Frenchman, as he declared before the justices, he cannot be guilty of treason. So that here they have failed in the foundation of all; that is, to prove him a subject of England. And because they affirm him to be so, it lies on those that affirm it to prove it. But perhaps, now they will say, that these little confessions of his will throw the burden of proof on him. By no means; when here is a stronger presumption on the other side, a mere extrajudicial saying to scoundrels, that he is an Irishman, cannot balance his confession examined before the justices, wherein he says he is a Frenchman; and so can never throw the burden of proof on him. Therefore it lies on them that assert this to prove it. But, my lord, though it doth not lie on him, yet we will prove him to be a Frenchman, and born at Martenico, by those that were at the christening of him, and have known him from time to time ever since. And because they say he can speak English, if you please to examine him, you shall hear him speak natural French; so that that cannot prove him to be a natural Irishman.

Mr. Phipps. Such a saying of a foreigner will be of no great weight; because, if a man go into a foreign country, he may say he is that countryman to get the more favour.

L. C. J. What, to hang himself?

Mr. Phipps. No, my lord; a man that comes into a strange country, may very well think he shall find better usage, by pretending to be of that country, than by owning himself to be a foreigner. But we will prove Vaughan to be a Frenchman. Call Robert French. (Then Robert French was sworn.) Mr. French, pray give the court and jury an account, whether you know Mr. Vaughan the prisoner at the bar, and how long you have known him, and what countryman you take him to be, and the reason why?

French. I have known him this fourteen years.

Mr. Phipps. Where did you see him then?

French. I saw him in Saint Christophers.

Mr. Phipps. Pray give an account how you came to know him.

French. About sixteen years ago I was at Mount-surat, and I came to St. Christophers, and there I chanced to come into English ground, among the factors; and so they brought me to the French ground; and coming there, I was in company with several others that night, and it happened I was told there was one Mr. Vaughan there; and I coming acquainted with him, he shewed me this youth (he was a youth then): he told me he was his son, and recommended him to me, because he looked on me to be a man in trust and business.

Mr. Phipps. From that time what has he been reputed?—French. A sea-faring man.

Mr. Phipps. But what countryman?

French. To be born in Martenico.

Mr. Phipps. In whose dominions is that?

French. In the French king's dominion.

Just. Turton. What occasion had you to discourse of the place of his birth?

French. Because his father was looked upon to be a Frenchman.

Just. Turton. His father was a Frenchman?

French. Yes, my lord, and lived at Martenico?

Mr. Cowper. How old might he be at that time?—French. About fifteen or sixteen.

Mr. Cowper. How came you to be talking of his birth, and with whom?

French. One that was talking with me told me his name was Vaughan, and that he was born there.

Mr. Cowper. What introduced this discourse? How came he to tell you this, that he was born in that place?

French. His father told me so.

Mr. Cowper. You were talking of one Vaughan of his name: how many were in company when there was this talk?

French. There were many of them.

Mr. Cowper. Name them.

French. It is so long ago I cannot remember them.

Mr. Cowper. Name as many as you can of them, as many as you do remember French. One Mr. Bodiken, a factor.

Mr. Cowper. Who else?

French. Several others.

Mr. Cowper. You named one Vaughan before.—French. Yes, I did.

Mr. Cowper. But you had forgot him now.

French. No; there was one Vaughan.

L. C. J. Were there any more?

French. Yes, there was; I remember the company that went along with me.

L. C. J. Who were they?

French. There were several passengers that went over with me

L. C. J. How came you to talk of this man's nativity?

French. Because his father said, he had not been out of the island in 20 years. (At which the people laughed.)

Mr. Cowper. What place was this discourse in?—French. At St. Christophers.

Mr. Cowper. How did his father's saying, he had not been out of that island in 20 years, prove his son was born there?

French. Because he recommended him to me as a sea-faring man.

Mr. Cowper. What is that a reason of? What is that to his being born at Martenico?

Justice Turton. What countryman are you?

French. I am an Irishman born.

L. C. J. His father acknowledged himself to be an Irishman born, did he not?

French. No, my lord, he did not say where he was born: I do not know.

Justice Turton. Have you continued any acquaintance with Mr. Vaughan since? How long did you stay at St. Christophers?

French. I staid but 24 hours, to take in water.

L. C. J. How long was it after this, before you saw this gentleman, captain Vaughan?

French. I never saw him since, till I saw him in London. (Then the people laughed.)

L. C. J. Pray, gentlemen, have patience. How do you know now, that this is the same man that you saw 14 years ago? for there must be a great alteration in a man in 14 years time, from what was at that time, being but 15 years of age.

French. I believe in my conscience this is the man.

L. C. J. Can you take it upon your oath he is the man?

Bar. Powis. In what language had you the discourse?

L. C. J. How long were you in company with him and his father?

French. I believe five or six hours.

Bar. Powis. In what language was this discourse with his father?

French. My lord, he spoke English, a sort of broken English.

L. C. J. Where do you live yourself?

French. I live in Ireland.

L. C. J. How long have you lived there?

French. Nine or ten years.

L. C. J. Whereabout in Ireland?

French. In Connaught.

L. C. J. Nine or ten years?

French. Yes, my Lord.

Dr. Littleton. Did not captain Vaughan, not his father, speak Irish to you in that six hours?—French. No, my lord.

Just. Turton. How long have you been in England?—French. Not above two months.

Just. Turton. Did you hear of captain Vaughan being to be tried?

French. No, my lord.

Just. Turton. How did he come to hear of you, then?—French. I heard he was in town.

L. C. J. It is a strange thing; you have a most admirable memory, and captain Vaughan has as good a memory as you; that you should never have any intercourse for 14 years, and yet should remember one another after so long a time. It is a wonderful thing too, that when he could not know you were in town, yet he should call you a witness on his behalf; sure he must have the spirit of prophecy.

French. He did not send to me at all.

L. C. J. How did you come to be here, then?

French. I will tell you. It was my custom always to go and see prisoners; and I heard there were prisoners in Newgate; so I went to Newgate, and I met with one Dwall; and I asked him of another gentleman that was there; and I went to the other side by chance, and I met with captain Vaughan.

L. C. J. What was thy design? Why didst thou visit Newgate?

French. Because it was my custom, because it was an act of charity.

L. C. J. Did you go to Newgate out of charity?

French. I went to see my friend, and carried a letter to him. I went out of charity.

Mr. Phipps. You were in the West-Indies, upon the French ground; do not they speak English on the French ground, and French on the English ground?—French. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. So they do here. Did you ever see captain Vaughan before that time?

French. No.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you visit lately any other prisoners in Newgate, besides captain Vaughan?—French. Yes.

Mr. Whitaker. Give their names.

French. I have visited Mr. Noland, and another gentleman that is with him; and I went into the house, and drank with him there.

Mr. Whitaker. What is that other gentleman's name?

French. I do not remember his name at present; but he is a companion of Mr. Noland's.

Mr. Whitaker. Do you know him if you see him?—French. I, I would.

L. C. J. Treby. How long have you been in England?

French. But two months.

L. C. J. Treby. Have you usually visited prisoners in former years?

French. My lord, wherever I have been it was my custom to do so.

L. C. J. Treby. But how doth it consist that you, who are an Irishman, should come hither to visit prisoners in Newgate?

French. I can prove under my lord mayor of Dublin's hand, that I came here upon business; and I went to the prison to visit the prisoners for charity-sake, and did bestow it according as I was able.

L. C. J. You had best stay there, and not go away; for we may have occasion to ask you some questions.

Mr. Cowper. Do you not use, out of charity, to be evidences for them?

French. No, never before in my life.

Mr. Whitaker. What other prisons have you visited besides Newgate?

French. I did visit none.

L. C. J. Treby. Had you no charity for other prisons?

Bar. Powis. When you so visit prisons, on what account is it? Is it to give ghostly advice?

French. Upon a charitable account, my lord.

L. C. J. Ghostly advice and charity.

Mr. Phipps. Where is Mr. Lefeur? (He did not appear.) Call Mr. Gold. (Who appeared.)

Cl. of Arr. That man is attainted, but pardoned.

Mr. Phipps. Mr. Gold, how long have you known captain Vaughan?

Mr. Gold. I never knew Mr. Vaughan, before I saw him in the Marshalsea.

Mr. Phipps. Is Monsieur Lefeur here? Is Mr. Deherty here?

(Mr. Deherty appeared, and was sworn.)

Mr. Phipps. Do you know Mr. Vaughan, the prisoner at the bar?—Deherty. Yes.

Mr. Phipps. How long have you known him?—Deherty. Five years.

Mr. Phipps. What has he been reputed all along, since you have known him.

Deherty. A Frenchman.

Mr. Phipps. Did you know him in France?—Deherty. Yes; and he was reputed a Frenchman there.

Just. Turton. What occasion had you to enquire into that, the place of his nativity?

Deherty. I did not enquire at all; but one that was his servant was my comrade a great while.

Mr. Phipps. Now we will prove where he was christened, by one that was at his christening, Mr. Dascine. (He appeared and stood up, being sworn, and spoke in French to the court, pretending he could not speak English.)

L. C. J. If he cannot speak English, there must be an interpreter.

Sol. Gen. They must find an interpreter, he is their witness.

[Then a person in court stood up, and told the court he could speak English as well as he; that he had been a Bailiff's follower for several years.]

L. C. J. You can speak English, can you not?

Dascine. I will speak as well as I can.

King's Messenger. I am a messenger to the king, do you know me?—Dascine. Yes.

L. C. J. Pristhee speak English.

Dascine. As well as I can, my lord, I will speak.

Mr. Phipps. Are you sworn?

Dascine. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Phipps. Do you know captain Vaughan?

Dascine. In 1669 I was in St. Christophers? I went from Roan, and from thence I went with hats and cloth to Crebeck, and had a letter to one Thomas Williams, a factor in Martenico. And after I had done, as I was coming away, Mr. Williams desired me to go to a christening, a mile and a half from Port-Royal. He told me there was one Mr. Vaughan had a plantation there, and desired him to be godfather. And about two days after, I went from Port-Royal to St. Christophers again, and I came to Roan again in a ship called St. Joseph. So in 1677, I went to St. Christophers again, and from thence to Martenico, to Mr. Williams; I asked him, What is become of that young man we were at the christening? and so he shewed me him that is here (pointing to the prisoner).

L. C. J. That was in 1677?

Dascine. In 1677. So I came from Port-Royal; I went to St. Christophers, and so took sail, and came to France again. And 13 years ago I went to St. Christophers again, and to Mountserat and Martenico; and so when I was at Martenico, and asked Mr. Williams of this young man, that I was at his christening, and he said, he is at such an house, and I saw him there.

L. C. J. Thirteen years ago.

Dascine. And we went and drank punch together, and I came back for Roan.

L. C. J. When did you see him since that?

Dascine. Never till I saw him here a prisoner.

L. C. J. How do you know he is the man?

Dascine. He has a bruise in his side.

Mr. Phipps. What was the gentleman's name, at the christening of whose child you were?—Dascine. Thomas Vaughan.

Mr. Phipps. What was the child's name?

Dascine. Thomas Vaughan.

Mr. Phipps. When you went the next time to Martenico, did Mr. Williams, you speak of, that was the godfather, present this person, captain Vaughan, to you, as the man who was then christened?

Dascine. Yes, the next time.

Mr. Phipps. Now, is captain Vaughan that stands at the bar, that very gentleman?

Dascine. I am sure it is he.

L. C. J. You say this meeting was about 1669?—Dascine. Yes.

Sol. Gen. Pray what was the reason you were so inquisitive to know what became of that person that was christened when you was there?

Dascine. Because I being at the christening, I asked him how the child did.

L. C. J. How came you to take such extraordinary observation of that child? Was he such a remarkable child?

Dr. Newton. Where were you born?

VOL. XII.

Dascine. In France.

Mr. Whitaker. What are you?

Dascine. A barber by trade.

L. C. J. What employment have you?

Dascine. An officer in the Marshal's court sometimes.

Justice Turton. What was this man's father, what sort of man was he?

Dascine. A tall man.

Baron Powis. What was his father's name?

Dascine. Thomas Vaughan.

Justice Turton. Was his father living when you was there the second time?

Dascine. The last time I was there I did not see his father, but I saw his father the second time.

Justice Turton. But you saw Mr. Williams his godfather.—Dascine. Yes.

Mr. Phipps. Call Simon Danneau,

Vaughan. My lord, he is sick, and not able to come out of his bed.

Mr. Phipps. Call Francis Harvey. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Phipps. Do you know captain Vaughan?

Harvey. Sir, in the year 1693, I was in France with one captain Bontee, who was taken prisoner in August the same year; and my captain he had the liberty to go up to Paris with a guard, for his pleasure, and to learn the speech. And, as it happened, we came to lodge in a street, called Dolphin street, at the sign of the Crown; and there was some gentlemen that were there to learn the speech, that were my countrymen; and there was a young man there, and he was acquainted over the way, where this gentleman, captain Vaughan, lodged; he lodged at his aunt's that sold silks; her name was madam Wotton; I saw this gentleman there; I am sure it is he; and with that I came acquainted with him, as well as the rest.

Mr. Phipps. What was he reputed there?

Harvey. A captain of a ship.

Mr. Phipps. What did he go for there? A Frenchman, or an Englishman, or an Irishman?

Harvey. He went for a Frenchman, as I heard; one time his aunt, she said, that he was born in the West Indies, at Martenico, and that he was her sister's son, that lived in Martenico.

Sol. Gen. You say he was a captain of a ship? what ship?

Harvey. That I cannot tell.

Sol. Gen. When was that?

Harvey. In 1693.

Mr. Phipps. Is Mr. Lefleur here?

Cl. of Ar. He is a prisoner in the Savoy; he was taken in the same ship with Mr. Vaughan.

Mr. Phipps. It is reasonable he should have been here, to give an account of the prisoner.

L. C. J. Then they should have taken care to have had him here. Have you any more witnesses?

Sol. Gen. I think we have given sufficient evidence that he is an Irishman. But now we shall show you, that all your witnesses have given a very extravagant evidence to prove that he is a Frenchman. All he hoped for was, that the prosecutors for the king could not be able to prove him an Irishman; he believed these were but three men could prove him so; that was David Creagh, and two more; and so he writes to David Creagh, and tells him, That his life was in his power, and he hoped he and the other two would not discover it. This David Creagh was his neighbour in Ireland; we will call him to prove that captain Vaughan was born at Galloway in Ireland.

Mr. Whitaker. And here is his letter under his hand. Bring David Creagh. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Cowper. I desire, before he give his evidence, he may look upon those that have given evidence about the prisoner, one by one. (Then he looked upon Robert French.) Mr. Creagh, do you know him.

Creagh. No. (Then he looked upon the rest.)

Mr. Cowper. Have you had any of these men come to you on a message?

Creagh. No, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Do you know Thomas Vaughan, the prisoner at the bar?—Creagh. Yes, I do.

Sol. Gen. How long have you known him?

Creagh. About two years.

Sol. Gen. Was that your first acquaintance with him?—Creagh. Yes.

Sol. Gen. What place was he born at, as you have heard?

Creagh. At Galloway in Ireland.

Sol. Gen. From whom did you hear it?

Creagh. From all persons that I have heard speak of him.

Sol. Gen. Did he ever own to you that he was born there?

Creagh. Yes, oftentimes in my company.

Sol. Gen. Did you ever receive a letter from him about your giving evidence in this matter?

Creagh. Yes, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Do you know this letter? (Which was shewn him).—Creagh. Yes, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Do you know his hand?

Creagh. Yes, I partly know it.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you ever see him write?

Creagh. This is the letter I received from him.

L. C. J. Read it. Do you think it is his hand?

Creagh. I cannot swear it; but I believe it is his hand.

Mr. Phypps. Have you seen him write?

Creagh. I have seen him write several times.

L. C. J. Do you believe it is his hand?

Creagh. Yes, my lord, but I cannot swear it.

[Then the Letter was read.]

To Mr. David Creagh, in Newgate, There.

"Mr. Creagh;

"I have some assurance that Mr. Whitaker has no witness to produce a soldier of Galloway, but you, and two more, which I am glad of with all my heart: I hope I may have more against me that wish me worse than you and captain Etherington. If Mr. Whitaker has not sworn you yet, I hope you will not appear against me. I declare, if I had more than my life, I would lay it in your hand. I am like to be sent to Newgate this day, and it is like you and some more will be sent here, that we may not talk together. The Dutch dogs took from me eleven hundred dollars in money, which certainly troubles me more than the thoughts of death, which I value not a straw; but I hope in four or five days to be supplied. I fear they will keep me close. I have all the liberty imaginable here to write, and my friends suffered to see me. I can say nothing that is comfortable, but that I am very well in health, and nothing concerned, if my money come in time.

T VAUGHAN "

Friday morning.

Mr. Phypps. Is that letter proved? That is not to the purpose; nor of any weight, considering who proves it.

L. C. J. No, that none could prove him a subject, but he and two more?

Sol. Gen. We will produce only one witness more. Call Mr. J. Rivet.—[The court being informed by some gentlemen then on the bench, that there was a gentleman then in court, one Mr. Rivet, who being of Galloway, could probably give some account of the prisoner; he was immediately called, and required to depose what he knew.]

Rivet. My lord, I am sorry I am called where life is concerned, when I came hither only out of curiosity; but the service I owe to the government, obliges me to speak what I know, now I am called to it. [Then he was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Do you know the prisoner at the bar? What countryman is he?

Rivet. I have known him a great many years; we were children together in the same town; we lived in Galloway in Ireland. I knew his father, and mother, and brothers, and sisters; and I remember him a child, as long as I can remember any thing, I cannot determine to a certain number of years; and I remember him not only a school boy, but also an apprentice to our Mr. Coleman. And I wonder very much at what Mr. French says, for by the name in place of his birth, he must have sworn what he knows to be otherwise; for the Frenches are a family in Galloway; his father was an honest gentleman, and went over into Ireland in the rebellion, in 1641, and he there married a woman, a native of Galloway, and had several children, one of which, in the latter end of king Charles's reign, turned Papist, and I believe the grief for it hastened his father's death. I own part of the evidence may be true about his being in the West Indies; but his mother, I believe, was never out of Ireland in her life.

Dr. Olden. What was his father's name?

Rivet. John.

L. C. J. You say, you knew this very gen-

He was an apprentice to one Thomas Coleman at Galloway.

Rivet. I did so, my lord.

L. C. J. How long is it since you saw him?

Rivet. I cannot be positive, I think at the reduction of Galloway in 1691. I cannot say whether at or after; but I saw him about that time, and knew him, and have known him from a child; I knew him a school boy, and knew his brothers.

Justice Turlton. What year did you know him first?

Rivet. I dare not be positive; I remember him particularly well.

L. C. J. Are you sure this is the man?

Rivet. I know him as well as any face I ever saw. I came accidentally into court out of curiosity; and one that knew me, that was of Galloway, gave an account to the king's counsel, and so I am called to give evidence.

L. C. J. Do you know this Robert French?

Rivet. I cannot say I know him, for I see him but in the dark; if I saw him in a better light, it may be I may. (Then Robert French was set up for Mr. Rivet to see him.) I think I recollect the face, I am not certain.

L. C. J. Do you know this gentleman?

French. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Where did you live?

French. In Connaught.

L. C. J. Did you know John Vaughan of Galloway?

French. I have heard of him, my lord.

Baron Powis. What trade was the prisoner's father?

Rivet. He had the market several years; he lived very well, and kept a public house in the town.

Mr. Phipps. Did you know any other Thomas Vaughan but this?

French. No, not in Galloway.

Rivet. This may be a confirmation of what I say: if it be the same gentleman, his hair is reddish.

L. C. J. Pull off his peruke. (Which was done.)

Vaughan. My hair is not red.

L. C. J. How are his eye brows?

Vaughan. A dark brown, my lord, the same as my wig.

Baron Powis. Let somebody look on it more particularly. (Then an officer took a candle, and looked on his head, but it was shaved so close the colour could not be discerned.)

Mr. Phipps. We can give an answer to this, my lord; we shall prove that there was one John Vaughan at Galloway, and he had a son Thomas, that died ten years ago. As for Mr. Rivet, he is a mere stranger to us, we know nothing of him; and, by what I can perceive, he comes in as a volunteer, not subpoena'd by either side. And for Mr. Creagh, we shall shew he is not to be credited in any thing; for we shall prove him guilty of felony, and that he swore, that if his brother would not supply him with money, he would swear treason against him, and shew him in Newgate, and that he should not come out till he came upon a sledge; and if so, there is nobody surely can believe he will stick at perjury or forgery, or any thing else which may be for his advantage. Call Mr. Christopher Creagh.

[Who was sworn.]

Mr. Phipps. Pray do you know David Creagh?—C. Creagh. Yes.

Mr. Phipps. Is he any relation to you?

C. Creagh. Yes, he is my brother.

Mr. Phipps. Give the court and the jury an account what you know of your brother?

C. Creagh. It is an unnatural thing to come on this occasion, and I am sorry I am called upon this account.

D. Creagh. Speak what you have to say?

Mr. Phipps. What do you know of your brother, whether you have not found him guilty of stealing any thing?

C. Creagh. My lord, I am upon my oath; I have known something of it, he has stolen some gold from me.

L. C. J. You pretend to be so very nice; you are to answer to what you know of his reputation in general, and of his way of living.

C. Creagh. His reputation has been but very slender, I am very sorry for it; several in the court can give account of it, as well as I. He served a relation of his at Newcastle; he served there some time, and came to town, and came to me, and depended upon me, and I subsisted him; and he took an opportunity one day, when I and my wife were gone abroad, and nobody at home but the maid, and went up stairs, where my wife's room is, and there being a sash window, he opens it, and took out of my wife's closet several pieces of gold.

L. C. J. How did you know that he did it?

C. Creagh. I found it out afterwards; he was my brother, and therefore I did not prosecute him. I did not know he had it, till afterwards that I found to whom he had disposed of the gold. I inquired who was in the house, and thought the maid had it: and she said none had been there but my brother; and he at last owned the fact, and I had it again.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say of your brother?

Mr. Phipps. Did he ever threaten to swear against you?—Vaughan. Or me?

C. Creagh. He has been confined in Newgate 18 months, and I subsisted him in charity; I allowed him all along; and he has been sending to me by several messages, that if I subsisted him not with more money than I did allow him, he would swear me into a plot.

L. C. J. Did he tell you so?

C. Creagh. No, but he sent me word so.

L. C. J. Is the man here that he sent this word by?

C. Creagh. Yes, the man is here.

Mr. Phipps. Let him stand up.

L. C. J. Where do you live?

C. Creagh. In Water-street; I am a merchant; I declare it is not in favour or affection, but only in conscience, that I declare this.

D. Creagh. This is only to hinder me from giving my evidence against a merchant that I have taken up.

Vaughan. What character had he in Spain? [Then David Creagh spoke, but was not heard.]

L. C. J. What do you say of the gold?

D. Creagh. He had it, my lord.

D. Creagh. Why did you not prosecute me then, if I had it?

L. C. J. You are not sure he took the gold.

C. Creagh. I was so sure he had it, because I had it from him again by another hand.

L. C. J. Did he tell you so, that he had it?

C. Creagh. No; but I had a letter about it.

L. C. J. Where is that letter?

C. Creagh. I have it not here.

L. C. J. Give not an evidence of a letter, without the letter were here; it ought to have been produced.

Mr. Phipps. Call Christopher Heyden [He was sworn.] Do you give the court an account what David Creagh has said to you of swearing against any body.

Heyden. Several times, when my master has sent me to him, to pay him 5s. a week, or 5s. 6d. a week, to subvert him.

Dr. Oulsh. Who are you servant to?

C. Creagh. He is my servant.

Heyden. This David Creagh has often told me, that I should tell his brother, that if he would not supply him with more money he would swear against him. When I came to the Sessions-house, when the pirates were tried the first time, I was going through the bail-dock, where this David Creagh called to me; and I asked him what he did there? He said he was to be evidence against captain Vaughan. No certainly, said I, you do not know him, do you? Says he, Here is the thing, it had been better for me that I had been an evidence against him before this; and I am forced to be an evidence against him, to save myself: and he bid me tell his brother, God, damn his soul to all eternity, if he did not send him supply that day, he would have him in Newgate, and that he should not come out again till he came out upon a sledge?

L. C. J. Did he say so?

Heyden. Yes, my lord.

C. Creagh. How long is it ago, Mr. Heyden?

Heyden. It was the day the pirates were tried; more than that, here was Mr. Wroth's man was with me at the same time; and because he should not hear what you said, you took me to the door.

Mr. Phipps. Is Daniel Bryan here?

[He appeared, and was sworn.]

Bryan. I was subpoena'd here for I know not what; for I know not captain Vaughan.

Mr. Phipps. Give me leave to ask you a question. Do you know, or have you heard of David Creagh?

Bryan. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Phipps. Will you give an account of what he has said of swearing against any body?

Bryan. He has threatened his brother several times, that if he would not send him relief, he would bring him in for something, and would inform against him.

Mr. Phipps. Did he say he would swear against him?

Bryan. He did say he would inform against him.

Mr. Phipps. What did you hear him say of swearing against any one?

Bryan. He said he had rather others should perish, than himself.

Mr. Whitaker. This man was condemned for the same crime.

Mr. Phipps. Mr. Vaughan, have you any other witnesses? Call Creighton [Who was sworn.] What countryman are you?

Creighton. A Connaught man, I was born in Galloway; I believe Mr. Rivet knows me.

Mr. Phipps. Did you know one John Vaughan that lived at Galloway?

Creighton. I know him very well.

Mr. Phipps. Do you know the prisoner at the bar?—Creighton. No.

Mr. Phipps. Do you remember that that John Vaughan had a son Thomas, and what became of him?

Creighton. Yes, he had a son Thomas; but I understood that he went somewhere into the country, and there died; and it was spread all about the town.

Mr. Phipps. Do you know what he died of?—Creighton. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. How long ago did he die?

Creighton. About ten years ago. I knew all the brothers.

Mr. Phipps. Did you know that Thomas Vaughan?

Creighton. I knew him very well.

Mr. Phipps. Is that gentleman, the prisoner, he?—Creighton. No.

Mr. Phipps. Do you believe that is not the man?—Creighton. I believe not.

Mr. Phipps. Did you ever know any other Thomas Vaughan?—Creighton. No.

Justice Turlton. Had not John Vaughan a son apprentice at Galloway to one Thomas Coleman?—Creighton. No, as I know of.

Justice Turlton. How old was that son, Thomas Vaughan, when you knew him?

Creighton. I was born at the next door to that Thomas Vaughan that was reputed to be dead.

Justice Turlton. Was not that Thomas Vaughan apprentice to Mr. Coleman?

Creighton. I cannot certainly tell.

Justice Turlton. How old was that Thomas Vaughan when he went away from Galloway?

Creighton. I cannot tell.

Justice Turlton. What is your own age?

Creighton. My age is about five-and-twenty.

L. C. J. You have not seen him in ten years?—Creighton. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Can you take it upon your oath this is not the man you saw ten years ago, that Thomas Vaughan you knew?

Creighton. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. How old was he when you were acquainted with him?

Creighton. I cannot tell certainly ; I believe he might be about fifteen.

L. C. J. How long is that since ?

Creighton. Ten years.

L. C. J. What is your name ?

Creighton. Creighton.

Mr. Cowper. You say you knew him ten years ago ; pray what sort of person was he, and how did he differ from this man ?

Creighton. He was better set, and not quite so tall as this man, and full of the small-pox ; he was the quarrelsomest boy in the whole town.

Sol. Gen. You say he was not quite so tall as this man ?

Creighton. No, he was not quite so tall.

Sol. Gen. Do you think he might not grow since ? This was ten years ago, when he was but fifteen years old.

Mr. Cowper. You knew him at fifteen ; how long had you known him ?

Creighton. From my infancy, till he departed the town.

Mr. Cowper. During all that time, what employment was he in ? Tell some circumstances.

Creighton. I think this Vaughan went to one Mr. Russel's school.

Mr. Cowper. What to do ?

Creighton. To learn to write and read.

Mr. Cowper. And was he not an apprentice in that time ?—Creighton. I cannot tell.

Mr. Cowper. Were you acquainted with him ?—Creighton. Yes.

L. C. J. You lived next door to him ; sure you must be acquainted with him ?

Creighton. He was a fighting boy ; for I remember he did once thrash my coat soundly.

L. C. J. Where do you live now ?

Creighton. At the Castle and Falcon in Aldersgate-street.

L. C. J. What trade are you ?

Creighton. A shoemaker.

Baron Powis. How long have you lived here ?—Creighton. This ten years.

Baron Powis. What did that Thomas Vaughan die of, that you say was dead before you came away, as it was reported up and down ?—Creighton. I cannot tell.

Mr. Cowper. Just now you said he went away from Galloway, and it was reported there that he was dead ten years ago ; now you say you have been in England ten years.

Creighton. I came into England about ten years ago.

Mr. Cowper. Did you hear it at Galloway before you came away ?

Creighton. I heard it at Galloway before I came to London ; and there are many can testify that there was a report that he was dead.

Justice Turlton. How long was he gone from Galloway before you came away ?

Creighton. I cannot say to an hour ; I heard he was dead.

L. C. J. Well, well, he went away from Galloway.

Justice Turlton. Have you not been here twelve years ?

Creighton. I think not ; I came a little before the Revolution.

Justice Turlton. That is eight years ago ; just now you said you had been here ten years.

Mr. Phipps. Call John Kine. (Who was sworn.) John Kine, did you know one John Vaughan in Galloway ?

Kine. Yes, I lived with him.

Mr. Phipps. What children had he ?

Kine. Four sons.

Mr. Phipps. Had he any of those sons that was named Thomas ?

Kine. Not of those four.

Mr. Phipps. Had he a son Thomas ?

Kine. Yes, he had ; he died about ten or eleven years old of the small-pox.

Mr. Phipps. You say you lived with this John Vaughan ; look upon the prisoner at the bar, is he any of those sons ?

Kine. No, sir, I never saw this man till now.

Mr. Phipps. How long did you live with him ?—Kine. About eight or nine years.

Mr. Phipps. But how long have you been come away from him ?

Kine. About ten years.

Justice Turlton. How well do these two witnesses agree together ? The other said he died at fifteen, and was pitted with the small-pox ; this man says he died at ten, and of the small-pox.

L. C. J. Where do you live now ?

Kine. I live in the city.

L. C. J. How long have you lived there ?

Kine. Twelve years.

L. C. J. How long was this Thomas Vaughan dead before you came hither ?

Kine. Really I cannot be positive, I believe about eight or nine years.

L. C. J. Did Thomas Vaughan die of the small-pox ?—Kine. Yes.

L. C. J. That you are sure of.

Kine. I am sure that was the disease he died of.

L. C. J. You knew him well, I believe ?

Kine. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. How old was he when he died ?

Kine. About ten years.

L. C. J. Where was he buried ?

Kine. At Galloway.

Just. Turlton. Why does not the officer take care ? There is one talking with the witness. Can you now reconcile your evidence ? (To the prisoner's counsel.)

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses ?

Mr. Phipps. No, my lord.

Just. Turlton. What were the names of all the sons ?

Kine. The eldest was John Vaughan, the other William Vaughan, another Edward Vaughan, and another James Vaughan ; that was all that he had alive.

Mr. Whitaker. There is never a Thomas Vaughan among these.

Mr. Cowper. Thomas died up and down in several places.

Mr. Phipps. Mr. Rivet, do you know the sons of that John Vaughan ?

Rivet. He had all these sons, John, William, Thomas, and James. He speaks of a son Edward; I cannot exactly remember whether there was such a son or no; though I have a vague idea of it, but am not certain. I knew this Thomas, I went to school with him, and I saw him in the year 1691, about the surrender of Galloway.

Juryman. Is that man at the bar the same Thomas Vaughan?

Rivet. I am positive of that.

L. C. J. You saw him at the surrender of Galloway?

Rivet. I did; it was about that time.

Vaughan. I am a subject of the most christian king; and I desire, though I speak English, that I may be examined in French, in a matter that touches me so near. And you may see by my commission, my lord, that I am a Frenchman; which I desire may be read.

L. C. J. We shall not trouble you with that.

Vaughan. I can shew you my commission, wherein the king, my master, declares me to be a subject of France.

Dr. Oldish. Mr. Vaughan, I think, you need not trouble the court to read the commission; the commission is the same as for all other subjects of the French king, wherein he is looked upon as a natural-born subject of France; and so he owns himself upon his examination before the judge of the admiralty.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say? As to the examination, who can prove that?

Mr. Cawley. I can prove that, my lord. (Mr. Cawley was sworn.)

L. C. J. Is that Thomas Vaughan's examination.

Mr. Cawley. Yes, my lord, it is signed by him, and taken before sir Charles Hedges the 26th of July, 1695.

L. C. J. Read it. (Then Mr. Cawley read the Examination of Thomas Vaughan.)

The 27th of July, 1695.

Officium Domini contra THOMAS VAUGHAN, Capitum Naviculæ, The LOYAL CLENCARTY.

The Examination of Thomas Vaughan, late Commander of the ship the Loyal Clencarty, aged 36 years, taken before the Right Worshipful Sir Charles Hedges, kt. Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England.

"This examinee saith, That he was born at Martenico within the dominions of the French king, and is his subject; but refuses to answer of what parents he was born: that he came last from thence about four years ago as commander of a ship called the Hare, which had been before taken from the English, and came in her to Nantes in France, and hath ever since been in France, or coming in French ships: That he hath been a commander ever since he was 16 years of age, and hath commanded several French privateers, and was commander of a privateer of St. Malo, called the Grenada, of 36 guns, which about two years ago took the Diamond; and the examinee was never till now taken. Being asked, whether he ever lived in England, or in Ireland? he refuses to answer. Being asked, whether he knew any thing of the taking and carrying off a Custom-house boat from the Downs to Bulloigne? Or, whether he was then in London, or did give directions to any persons, or knew of her being carried off? he answered nothing; but said, that if any person would prove it against him, he was present to answer it: but saith, that in France he heard of her being brought to Bulloigne; and he the examinee bought her at Bulloigne of the men that carried her away, and that she cost him 900 and odd livres, and was then called the Elizabeth and Anne, or Michael and Anne, but which doth not remember: that he the examinee still hath the said vessel at Bulloigne: that he cannot tell the names of the persons he bought her of, and that took her away, but believes they had a commission: that something above three weeks ago the examinee went with a commission from the French king on board a two and twenty oar barge, called the Loyal Clencarty, then at Bulloigne, as commander thereof: and on Monday last was a fortnight was taken by the Coventry man of war, at the Buoy in the Guisfeet; and that the commander of the Coventry took away this examinee's commission. Being asked, upon what design he came out with the barge? replied, that it was not to take the air; that the barge formerly belonged to the lord Danby, and was taken by a French privateer about a year ago; that before he came out, he met with two English seamen upon the court of guards at Bulloigne, who told the examinee, that they had been taken prisoners, and the examinee took them in upon charity; and afterwards met another Englishman, who told the examinee, that he had been taken in land service, and believes it was before Fort Kenuque; and the said person sitting upon a stone at Bulloigne, and not knowing what to do with himself, the examinee took him on board for charity, and designed to put the said three persons ashore in England. Being asked, whether he did not put in a claim for the said Custom-house boat, or for the loss of her captain? Or, whether the persons that took her had any commission from him? he the examinee answered, that they that took her, must answer for what they did, and he must answer for his actions only.

Eodem die Capti coram me,

C. Hedges.

THOMAS VAUGHAN."

L. C. J. Mr. Vaughan, have you any more to say?

Vaughan. It is very hard circumstances I am under; if an Englishman was in France, under the straits that I am here, it would be very hard for him to prove himself an Englishman.

L. C. J. You have had a very fair trial, and you shall have justice, be it for you, or against you.

Vaughan. I hope your lordship will do me right.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar, Thomas Vaughan, stands indicted for high treason, for adhering to the king's enemies, viz. That he put himself as a soldier in the service of the French king, in a vessel called the Loyal Clencarty, with divers other persons on board her, that were subjects to the French king, and enemies to the king of England, with a design to burn the king's, and his subjects' ships: and for that purpose went in that ship. That the prisoner was on board the ship, and with such a design, is proved, without all contradiction, by several witnesses that have been produced; that is, that the two and twenty oar barge, which is the same called the Loyal Clencarty, lay hovering about the Buoy in the Nore; those men in the Coventry imagined they had some design of mischief to the ships, and they made after him with the Coventry. It was apprehended by captain Vaughan and his crew, that the Coventry would be too hard for them, and so they did submit, and were taken. And being examined on what account he came on our coasts, it is confessed by him, That he came with a design to burn our ships. You may observe what sort of men were aboard. You have heard it proved to you, that Crittenden, the marshal of Dover, entered those persons taken aboard the French vessel, of what nation, and what quality they were; and there were about a dozen of these Frenchmen, for they were entered as such. Now, for a subject of England to join with the king's enemies, in pursuit of a design to burn or take any of the king's, or his subjects' ships, that is an adherence to the king's enemies. But it appears, not only that captain Vaughan was in their company, but that he was their commander; which commanding the vessel, on board which were French subjects, enemies of the king and the kingdom of England, is high treason, and the particular fact of treason for which he is indicted. And it appears that he had a commission from the French king to command this vessel, the Loyal Clencarty.

Now the prisoner having this commission to be commander of this vessel, though they who served under him were not native Frenchmen, but other foreigners, yet their subjecting themselves to him, acting by virtue or colour of that commission, makes them to be the French king's subjects, during their continuance in that service; for otherwise all prizes, which they should take, would make them to be pirates; which none will pretend to maintain, when they acted by a commission from a sovereign prince, that was an enemy. And if they shall cruise upon our coasts with a design to take, or destroy any of the king's, or his subjects' ships, they are enemies, though they were the subjects of a prince or state in amity with the king of England. But at this time there is no necessity of entering upon this question, because it is proved that divers, who were on board this vessel, were Frenchmen; the joining with whom, in prosecution of such a design, is that kind of high-treason, of adhering to the king's enemies. So that if captain Vaughan was a subject of England, he is proved guilty of high-treason, if you believe the evidence.

But now it is insisted on by Mr. Vaughan and his counsel, that though he was exercising hostility against the king of England, and designing mischief to his subjects; yet, says he, I was not a subject of England, I was born a subject to the French king. If that be true, then he is not guilty of high-treason; he is an enemy, but not a traitor: and that is the point you are now to consider of, whether he be a subject of England or France?

Now as to that, he being taken under such circumstances, and speaking English, it is reasonable to be presumed that he is a subject of England, unless he proves the contrary. But then you have heard by several of the witnesses, that when he was at first taken, he acknowledged himself to be an Irishman; and he did not only acknowledge it to them that assisted in apprehending him, but being carried to Dover, when the marshal entered him in his book as a prisoner, he entered him not as a Frenchman, but he declared at that time he was an Irishman. It may be, he did not consider the consequence of it; for the next day he was carried before the mayor of Dover, and then having considered better of it, that it was not for his interest to acknowledge himself an Irishman, he said he was born a subject to the French king, and at Martenico. There were Scotchmen and Irishmen taken at the same time, and they were entered as of the nation they belonged to, and so were divers entered Frenchmen. So that unless he hath given sufficient evidence to the contrary, this is sufficient to induce you to believe him an Irishman born.

But he has endeavoured to take off this evidence that hath been given. First, he says, it was when he was in drink, that he did confess himself to be an Irishman; but when he was sober, he said he was a Frenchman. And besides that, he calls a witness, whose name is Robert French, to give an account of him. And French says, that about fourteen years ago he was at St. Christopher's, on French ground, and he did then see this Thomas Vaughan; he did take him then to be about the age of fifteen. He says he stayed there about four and twenty hours, and that he was in the company of this Vaughan and his father about five or six hours. He says, his father told him at that time, that this young man who was then about fifteen years of age, was born at Martenico. He says farther, that his father did recommend this son to him to be a sea-faring man, being the employment he intended him for; and he is sure this is the man. This Robert French was asked, whether he ever saw this Vaughan from the time he first saw him at St. Christophers until this time: he says he never saw him since that time, till about ten months ago. He gives you this account how he came to meet with him: he says he came to town; and being a charitable man, he used to visit the prisons; and he came to Newgate to one Noland; and there he saw captain Vaughan; and though he had not seen him for fourteen years before, yet he knew him again, and is positive that he is the same person.

Another swears he knew the prisoner about five years, and he was reputed a Frenchman.

There has been another witness produced, which is that Dascine, who came up as a Frenchman, and talked French, pretending he could not speak English; but on examination it was discovered that he had an employment in England, and was a bailiff's follower; and it appears he can speak English very well; and notwithstanding his pretence, has given his evidence in English. And he tells you, That he, about the year 1669, did go to St. Christophers, and afterwards to Martenico; and there he went to one Williams, who had a friend whose name was Vaughan, at whose house there was a christening to be of his son, to whom Williams was to be godfather; and this witness was carried thither, and the child was christened Thomas. He tells you he went over again to St. Christophers, and to Martenico, in the year 1677, and that then he enquired for this child, and did see him. Then he says, after that he went over again to St. Christophers, and to Martenico, about thirteen years ago, and then saw him again; and, I think, never saw him since until very lately; and this prisoner, he undertakes to tell you, is the very person.

But then one Harvey tells you he saw him in France, in the year 1693, and there he was taken to be a Frenchman, and he lived with a woman that sold silk, that said he was her nephew, her sister's son; and that he was born at Martenico. This is the evidence he gives you to induce you to believe he is a Frenchman.

Now, in the first place, before I open the evidence in answer to it, I desire you to observe the weight and import of this evidence that hath been produced by the prisoner. First, for this French, that says he saw captain Vaughan fourteen years ago, when he was about fifteen years of age; he had no former acquaintance with him; stayed in his company but six hours; and came away within our-and twenty hours after his arrival; and never saw him again in fourteen years: it is a strange thing that he should know him again so well as to be positive that he is the same person; for in fourteen years there is a great alteration in a man: for a man that has known me at the age of fifteen, and not seen him in fourteen years after, though before he was very well acquainted with him, cannot so easily know him again. But however he is positive, and he saith, that he is the same person that was at Martenico.

Then as for Dascine, you may consider him, that he should take notice of a little child that he saw christened several years before; and that he should now remember him when he had not seen him in 13 years; sure he had a great liking to this child, that when he went to Martenico, many years after, he should be so inquisitive after him: I must leave these things to you to consider of: that he might have an aunt in France, that is very possible too.

But now consider how this evidence hath been endeavoured to be answered: two witnesses have been produced to contradict that which they have sworn. The first is David Creagh, who tells you he has known the prisoner for two years; and says he was always reputed to be an Irishman, and born in Galloway: he has often discoursed with him about his country, and he told him that he was an Irishman, and born at Galloway. Then you hear what a letter is produced, writ to Creagh, when he was to come upon his trial; he mentions what his defence was, and that it was impossible that any could do him any harm but he and two more. Creagh swears it is his hand; that he hath seen him write, and he believes it is his hand.

Then there is a gentleman, Mr. Rivet, that came here by chance, who is a Galloway man; he saith he knew the prisoner's father, who was reputed to come thither about the time of the rebellion in Ireland, in 1641, and lived at Galloway; and that this prisoner, Mr. Vaughan, was his son, and he knew him of a child; was well acquainted with him; lived hard by him; remembers him an apprentice in Galloway, and tells you to whom; and says he is sure this is the very man; and that he saw the prisoner in 1691, about the time of the reduction of Galloway; and he is confident that the prisoner is the son of John Vaughan, at Galloway; and he gives you a particular account of him and his family, viz. of the reputation and manner of living of his father; and what other brothers he had: so that there is no objection against his credit; and it is hard to believe, since he is so positive and circumstantial, that he can be mistaken.

But the prisoner and his counsel have endeavoured to answer all this evidence; and first they have called Creagh's brother to prove that he is an ill man; for that he came into this town where his brother lives, who subsisted him and took him into his house; and one day, when he and his wife went abroad, he made bold with some of his money; but they thought the maid had it, and he charged her with it; but to his satisfaction, it did afterwards appear that David had it.

Then there is another, Christopher Heyden, Christopher Creagh's servant, who says, he heard D. Creagh say he was forced to be an evidence against Vaughan to save himself; and that he used to threaten his brother, that if he would not give him more money, he would swear against him. Bryan saith much to the same purpose. These are produced to take off the credit of D. Creagh's testimony.

But then, gentlemen, as to the place of the prisoner's birth; two other witnesses are produced to give you satisfaction that this captain Vaughan was not the son of that Mr. Vaughan of Galloway, whose evidence I will open to you, and then will see how coherent they are in their testimony. The first is Creighton, a shoemaker; he says he knew Thomas Vaughan, the son of John Vaughan of Galloway, about ten years since; he was a Galloway man bred, and lived the next door to John Vaughan that had a son Thomas. He says he has been here about ten years in England. He says he thinks that Thomas Vaughan, the son of John Vaughan, was about the age of 15 years; but that this prisoner is not he; for that Thomas Vaughan was disfigured with the small-pox; he remembered him well; he had reason for it, for he once basted him soundly; and that he went away from Galloway when he was about 15 years of age, and was reported to be dead; and if it were so, this prisoner cannot be the person.

The other witness is as positive as Creighton; for he saith, he knew this John Vaughan of Galloway, and his son Thomas; and that Thomas Vaughan, son of John Vaughan, died about 10 years since of the small-pox.* So that they have found two Thomas Vaughans; one tells you of one that was 15 years old, and was disfigured with the small-pox; and the other tells you of Thomas Vaughan, who died of the small-pox when he was 10 years of age.

You are therefore to consider the evidence on both sides. The question principally is, Whether the prisoner be a subject of the king of England. If you are satisfied that he is not an English subject, but a Frenchman, then he is not guilty of this high-treason; but if you are satisfied, by the series of the whole evidence, that he is an Irishman, and that he had a commission from the French king, and that he cruized upon our English coasts, in company with the king's enemies, with a design to take, burn, or destroy any of the king's or his subjects ships, you are to find him guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted; otherwise you are to acquit him.

Cl. of Ar. Swear an officer to keep the jury. [Which was done.]

[After a short stay, the Jury returned into Court, and gave in their verdict.]

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, answer to your names. E. Leeds.

Mr. Leeds. Here.

Crier. Vous Avez, and so of the rest.

Cl. of Ar. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Vaughan, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements had he at the time of the treason committed?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Cl. of Ar. Then hearken to your verdict as the court hath recorded it: You say that Thomas Vaughan is guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted; but that he had no goods or chattels, lands or tenements at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge; and so you say all.—Jury. Yes.

Vaughan. My lord, let me beg one favour, that I may be used like a gentleman; that I may be sent to a chamber, and not to a dungeon; and that my friends may come to me.

L. C. J. Capt. Vaughan, they say you once made an escape, and therefore the keeper must keep with humanity, but with all security.

Vaughan. I desire I may be kept like a Christian.*

L. C. J. The keeper must do his duty.

Cl. of Ar. Thomas Vaughan, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Thou standest convicted of high-treason against our sovereign lord the king; What hast thou to say for thyself why judgment shall not pass against thee to die according to the law?

Vaughan. I am altogether a stranger to the law, my lord: I refer myself to my counsel.

L. C. J. Well, then, you refer yourself to your counsel. You have had a fair trial, and have no reason to complain of it: If your counsel have any thing to say in arrest of judgment, they shall be heard.

Mr. Phipps. My lord, the indictment has two sorts of treason laid in it the one for adhering to the king's enemies, the other levying of war; and with submission, I take it, that the first is not well laid; for it says that the prisoner did adhere to the king's enemies, but says not against the king. Now every body knows that the French king is in war, not only with England, but Holland and Spain, and the emperor: But if a man join with the French against any of them, he adheres to the king's enemies; and yet it cannot be said to be against the king; therefore they ought to have laid it, that he did adhere to the king's enemies 'contra Dominum Regem;' it must be aiding and comforting them against the king that makes the treason.

L. C. J. It does say so.

Mr. Phipps. No, my lord: it only says that captain Vaughan did adhere to the king's enemies, and does not say it was against the king; and if that be treason, is what we desire to know.

L. C. J. If he adhere to the king's enemies, it must be against the king, though he assist them only against the king's allies;* for there-

* East's P.C. c. 2, s. 21. Fort. 320. But as to this Blackstone says: "By the statute 2 Hen. 5, c. 6, any subject committing acts of hostility upon any nation in league with the king was declared to be guilty of high treason, and, though that act was repealed by the sta-by the king's enemies may be more encouraged and enabled to do mischief or damage to the king. Suppose you assist the French king against the king of Spain, that is now in alliance and league with the king of England, and the French in actual enmity; that is to adhere to the king's enemies against the king.

Mr. Phipps. Would that be treason, my lord?

L. C. J. Yes, certainly; though that is not a point in this case, and so not necessary to be determined now; for the act of parliament of 25 of E. 3. defines treason in adhering to the king's enemies, and expresses the overt-act in giving them aid or comfort; it is sufficient to alledge the treason in the words of the statute, adhering to the king's enemies. An overt-act alleged, shews it to be against the king; and in pursuance of that adherence, he did so and so: He was a captain and soldier in the ship; did join with the king's enemies, &c. with a design to destroy the king's and his subjects ships: surely that is most manifestly an adherence to the king's enemies against the king.

Mr. Phipps. The overt-act, if it were alledged sufficiently, would not help it; for if there can be an adhering to the king's enemies, that is not treason; they ought to alledge such adhering as is treason; and if the treason itself is not well alledged, the overt act will not help it.

L. C. J. There is an overt act to shew it to be against the king. It is said all along, he being in this vessel Clencarty, "cum diversis subditis."

Mr. Phipps. But then that overt-act is not well alledged; for it is said only he went a-cruising; whereas they ought to have alledged that he did commit some acts of hostility, and attempted to take some of the king's ships; for cruising alone cannot be an overt-act; for he might be cruising to secure the French merchant-ships from being taken, or for many other purposes, which will not be an overt-act of treason.

L. C. J. I beg your pardon. Suppose the French king, with forces, should come to Dunkirk with a design to invade England; if any one should send him victuals, or give him intelligence, or by any other way contribute to their assistance, it would be high-treason in adhering to the king's enemies.

Mr. Phipps. If the French king had designed an invasion upon England, and captain Vaughan had assisted in his vessel in forwarding the invasion, it would have been trea-nure 20 Hen. 6. c. 11, so far as relates to the making this offence high treason, yet still it remains a very great offence against the law of nations, and punishable by our laws either capitally or otherwise according to the circumstances of the case." 1 Blackst. Comm. 232, 233.

† East's P. C. c. 2, s. 21.

son; but here is nothing mentioned but cruising.

L. C. J. Cruising about the coasts of England, with a design to destroy the king's ships.

Mr. Phipps. That design ought to be made appear by some act of hostility; for in the case of Burton and Bradshaw, and others, which my lord Coke cites, the agreeing to rise and pull down inclosures, and meeting and providing arms for that purpose, is agreed not to be levying of war; and they were indicted for conspiring to levy war, upon the statute of queen Elizabeth. And in this case, here being only a conspiring, and nothing attempted, it can be no more treason than it was in that case.

L. C. J. When men form themselves into a body, and march rank and file with weapons offensive and defensive,* this is levying of war with open force, if the design be public. Do you think when a ship is armed with guns, &c. doth appear on the coast, watching an opportunity to burn the king's ships in the harbour; and their design be known, and one goes to them, and aids and assists them, that this is not an adhering to the king's enemies? Here are two indictments, one for levying war, and the other for adhering to the king's enemies; but the adhering to the king's enemies is principally insisted on; and there must be an actual war proved upon the person indicted in the one, yet need not be proved in the other case.

Mr. Phipps. The same certainly is necessary in one as well as the other; for barely adhering to the king's enemies is not treason; but there must be an actual aiding and comforting them; and a mere intention to assist the king's enemies, is not an adherence within the statute of 25 Ed. 3.

L. C. J. If there be not high-treason in the act alledged; that is, if it do not make out an adherence to the king's enemies, then your objection would hold good.

Mr. Phipps. The going to cruise, my lord, does not make out an adherence to the king's enemies; for his cruising might be for other purposes as well as to take the king's ships; and your lordship will intend the best in favour of life.

Mr. Whitaker. To burn the king's ships.

L. C. J. Treby. The indictment is laid for adhering to, and comforting and aiding the king's enemies. You would take that to be capable to be construed adhering to the king's enemies in other respects; but I take it to be a reasonable construction of the indictment, to be adhering to the king's enemies in their enmity. What is the duty of every subject? It is to fight with, subdue, and weaken the king's enemies; and contrary to this, if he confederate with, and strengthen the king's enemies, he expressly contradicts this duty of allegiance, and is guilty of this treason of adhering to them. But then you say here is no aiding unless there were something done, some act of hostility. Now here is going about with an intention to do such acts; and is not that comforting and aiding? Certainly it is. Is not the French king comforted and aided, when he has got so many English subjects to go a-cruising upon our ships? Suppose they man his whole fleet, or a considerable part of it; is not that aiding? If they go and enter themselves into a regiment, list themselves and march, though they do not come to a battle, this is helping and encouraging; such things give the enemy heart and courage to go on with the war; or else it may be, the French king would come to good terms of peace. It is certainly aiding and comforting of them to go and accept a commission, and enter into their ships of war, and list themselves, and go out in order to destroy their fellow subjects, and ruin the king's ships; these are actings of an hostile nature. And if this be not adhering, &c. it may as well be said, that if the same persons had made an attack upon our ships, and miscarried in it, that had not been so neither; because that in an unprosperous attempt there is nothing done that gives aid or comfort to the enemy. And after this kind of reasoning they will not be guilty, till they have success; and if they have success enough, it will be too late to question them.

* East's P. C. c. 2, s. 12, 59.

Mr. Phipps. Intending to levy war is not treason, unless a war be actually levied.

L. C. J. Treby. Is it not actually levying of war, if they actually provide arms, and levy men, and in a warlike manner set out and cruise, and come with a design to destroy our ships?

Mr. Phipps. It would not be an actual levying of war, unless they commit some act of hostility.

L. C. J. Yes, indeed, the going on board, and being in a posture to attack the king's ships. As to the fault you find with the indictment, there is a fault, but not in point of law; they might have laid it more generally, so as to have given more evidence.

Baron Powis. However it is well enough. But for you to say because they did not actually fight it is not levying a war; it is not plain what they did intend. That they came with that intention, that they came in that posture, that they came armed, and had guns and blunderbusses, and surrounded the ship twice; they came with an armed force; that is a strong evidence of the design.

L. C. J. You would make no act to be aiding and assisting but fighting.

Mr. Phipps. Then next I am in your lordship's judgment, whether the statute of 28 of Hen. 8, by which captain Vaughan is tried, is in force, and be not repealed by the 1st and 2d of Philip and Mary, which saith, that all trials, in cases of treason, shall be at the common law. Now, by the common law, before the statute 28 Hen. 8, treason done upon the sea was tried before the admiral, or his lieutenant; and my lord Coke, in the 12 Rep. in the case of the admiralty, saith, the jurisdiction of the admiralty is by the common law. By the statute 33 Hen. 8, treason confessed before three of the privy-council might be tried in a foreign county, but that statute is repealed by the statute 1 and 2 of Philip and Mary; for by the statute 33 Hen. 8, c. 4, treason committed in Wales, might be tried in what county the king would assign; but since the statute of Philip and Mary, it must be in the proper county; so that we are in your lordship's judgment, whether the statute of 28 Hen. 8 be in force; and whether, since the statute of 1 and 2 Philip and Mary, treasons done upon the sea, ought not to be tried before the admirals or anciently at the common law?*

L. C. J. This is treason by the common law, and the trial is by the method of the common law.

Mr. Phipps. It is true that my lord Coke, and other authorities say, that the statute 35 Hen. 8, for trying treasons committed beyond sea, is not repealed by the statute of 1 and 2 Philip and Mary; but they do not say that this statute is not repealed by the statute of Philip and Mary; and the books being silent in this, is the reason why I propose this question for your lordships' judgment.

L. C. J. It is no more a question than the trials of foreign treason, and then the determination of the trials upon the 35th determines the question upon this.

Dr. Oldish. We must have two witnesses by the rules of the civil law; an extrajudicial saying of a party may be retracted by them at any time, that is the civil law, and so there can be but one witness.

L. C. J. That is not the law of England.

Dr. Oldish. I do humbly conceive that the civil law is not taken away in this case; for though the statute prescribes the form of proceedings according to the rules of the common law, yet as to the crimes and proofs, the civil law is still in force; and then the party may retract his confession in judgment, much more any extrajudicial saying.

Mr. Whitaker. You are arraigning the verdict.

L. C. J. That you should have taken notice of before the verdict was given. But we think there is no danger in hearing this objection, because it is so easily answered. How many witnesses were to the confession?

Sir Ch. Hedges. We are not in a court that proceeds according to the strict rules of the civil law; but if we were, that law is not so absurd as to allow that a party may retract his confession at any time, so as to make it have no effect.

Dr. Oldish. There must be two witnesses at any time.

Sir Ch. Hedges. So there are here to the confession; but you mistake, if you think that every particular is to be proved strictly as the civil law requires; for the end of the statute which directs the proceedings of this court, was to facilitate the method of making proofs, that being found difficult by the course of the civil law; and therefore was that statute made, as plainly appears by the preamble thereof.

* East's P. C. c. 2, s. 40.

Dr. Oldish. There is a new statute that revives that statute again, and that requires two witnesses; whereby it is reduced to the rules of the civil law again:

L. C. J. Two witnesses there must be; but they consider it is not necessary to have two to every individual overt-act: for suppose there be two overt-acts laid in the indictments, for one species of treason, compassing and imagining the death of the king; if there be one witness that he bought a dagger, and said he would kill the king, and he is seen, it may be, going to the king's bed-chamber with the dagger, another witness says, he said he would kill the king with a pistol, and bought a pistol, and he stood waiting to kill the king as he came by; that is an overt-act of the same treason. If one witness prove one, and another witness prove the other, that is sufficient proof with us.

Dr. Oldish. It is another question, whether he be a subject?

L. C. J. That is not an overt-act; if there be one witness to that, it is enough, there needs not two witnesses to prove him a subject;* but upon the trial there were above two witnesses to prove it, that was Crittenden the marshal of Dover, Creagh, and Rivet. I must tell you as the doctrine of the civil law, it is not universally received in all countries; it is received in several countries as they find it convenient, and not as obligatory in itself.

Dr. Oldish. Yes, in all places, as to proof; for it is the law of God and nations, 'ex ore duorum, vel trium,' &c. and one witness is no witness.

Sir Ch. Hedges. Two witnesses may be necessary to convict a man of any capital crime, but then it doth not follow that there must be two witnesses to prove every particular fact and circumstance. In this point, touching the place of nativity of Thomas Vaughan, was there not sufficient in his own confession, together with the other proofs on the king's behalf, to throw the burden of proof upon the prisoner? You yourselves seem to have been of that opinion, you undertook to prove it, and it is you that have failed in that particular.

L. C. J. Our trials by juries are of such consideration in our law, that we allow their determination to be best, and most advantageous to the subject; and therefore less evidence is required than by the civil law. So said Fortescue in his commendation of the laws of England.

Dr. Oldish. Because the jury are witnesses in reality, according to the laws of England, being presumed to be 'ex vicinis;' but when it is on the high and open seas, they are not then presumed to be 'ex vicinis,' and so must be instructed according to the rules of the civil law by witnesses.

James Fort. This is not a trial by the civil law; for that statute was made to avoid the niceties of your law.

Just. Eyre. He is tried with like evidence as in other cases of high treason.

Dr. Oldish. No, the late act requires two witnesses.

Cl. of Ar. Make proclamation of silence.

Cryer. All manner of persons are commanded to keep silence, while judgment is giving, upon pain of imprisonment.

And then Judgment was given, according as the law directs in cases of High Treason.

The COMMISSION of Captain THOMAS VAUGHAN, which he had by Order of the French King.

"Lewis Alexander of Bourbon, earl of Toulous, duke of Amville, commander of the king's orders, governor and lieutenant-general for his majesty in the Province of Britany, peer and admiral of France: to all those who shall see these present letters, greeting. The king having declared war against his Catholic majesty, the favours of the of the crowns of England and Scotland, and the estates of the United Provinces, for the reasons contained in the declarations published by his majesty throughout the extent of his kingdom, countries, lands, and lordships under his obedience: and his majesty having commanded us to take care that the said declaration be observed, in what doth depend upon the power and authority which his majesty hath been pleased to commit to our said charge of admiral; we have, according to the express orders of his said majesty, given leave, power and permission to Thomas Vaughan, living at Bulloigne, to arm and set forth in warlike manner a bark, called the Loyal Clencarty, of the burthen of ten tons, or thereabouts, which is at present in the port of Bulloigne, with such number of men, cannons, bullets, powder, shot, and other ammunitions of war, and provisions which are necessary to set her out to sea, in a condition to sail and cruize upon the pirates, and others without commission, as also upon the subjects of his Catholic majesty, the estates of the United Provinces, the favours of the of the crowns of England and Scotland, and other enemies of this estate, in what places soever he can meet them, whether it be upon the coasts of their country, in their ports, or rivers; also upon their shores, or places where the said captain Thomas Vaughan shall think fit to land to annoy the said enemies; and there to make use of all the means and arts permitted and used by the laws of war, to take them and bring them prisoners, with their ships, arms, and other things in their possession.

"Provided the said Vaughan shall keep, and cause those of his crew to keep the maritime orders, and that shall be carry, during his voyage, the flag and ensign of the King's Arms, and of ours, and cause the present commission to be registered in the registry of the nearest admiralty where he shall be equipped, and leave there a roll signed and certified by him, containing the names and surnames, the births and residence of his crew; and make his return to the said place, or some other port of France, and make his report before the officers of the Admiralty, and no others, of what shall have happened during his voyage, and give us advice thereof, and send his said report to the secretary-general of the marine, with the papers justifying the same, that we may give such orders thereupon as may be necessary.

"And we pray and require all kings, princes, potentates, sovereigns, estates, republics, friends and allies of this crown, and all others to whom it shall appertain, to give to the said Vaughan all favour, aid, assistance and succour in their ports, with his said vessel, company and prizes, which he shall take during his voyage, without doing, or suffering to be done to him any trouble or hindrance; offering to do the like when we shall be by them thereunto required.

"And we do command and require all marine officers, and others to whom it shall appertain, to let him safely and freely pass with his said vessel, arms and company, and the prizes which he shall take, without doing, or suffering to be done to him any trouble or hindrance;

but on the contrary, to give him all succour and assistance that shall be necessary. These presents to be of no force after one year, from the day of the date hereof.

"In witness whereof we have signed these presents, and caused them to be sealed with the seal of our arms, and counter-signed by the secretary-general of the marine, at Versailles, the 10th day of the month of July, 1696.

"By my lord de Valencour." (L. S.)

"The present Commission was registered in the admiralty of Bulloigne, after having been seen by us James Abbot de la Cocherine, the king's counsellor, deputed to the intendency of Bulloigne, exercising the charge of lieutenant-general of the admiralty, in the presence of the king's proctor, at the request of the said captain Vaughan, being present, whom we have permitted to sail and cruise upon the enemies of the estate. 394. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir JOHN FENWICK, bart. upon a Bill of Attainder for High Treason: 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696.*

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

November 6th, 1696.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL acquainted the House of Commons, that his majesty had given leave to lay before the House, several papers in the nature of informations of sir John

* "There was indeed reason to apprehend tumults; for now, after the queen's death, the Jacobites began to think, that the government had lost the half of its strength, and that things could not be kept quiet at home, when the king should be beyond sea. Some pretended, they were for putting the princess in her sister's place; but that was only a pretence, to which she gave no sort of encouragement: king James lay at bottom. They fancied, an invasion in the king's absence would be an easy attempt, which would meet with little resistance: so they sent some over to France, in particular one Charnock, a fellow of Magdalen college, who in king James's time had turned Papist, and was a hot and active agent among them: they undertook to bring a body of 2,000 horse, to meet such an army as should be sent over; but Charnock came back with a cold account, that nothing could be done at that time; upon which it was thought necessary

Fenwick, in which he and several other persons of quality were named; and desired that they might be brought up to the table and read; and that he might have an opportunity to justify himself, or if he did not that he might fall under the censure of the House. And Mr. Secretary Trumbull being present, did say, to send over a man of quality, who should press the matter with some more authority: so the earl of Ailesbury was prevailed on to go: he was admitted to a secret conversation with the French king: and this gave rise to a design, which was very near being executed the following winter.

"But if sir John Fenwick did not slander king James, they at this time proposed a shorter and more infallible way; by assassinating the king; for he said, that some came over from France about this time, who assured their party, and himself in particular, that a commission was coming over, signed by king James, which they affirmed they had seen, warranting them to attack the king's person. This, it is true, was not yet arrived; but some affirmed, they had seen it, and that it was trusted to one, who was on his way hither; therefore, since the king was so near going over to Holland, that he would probably be that he had his majesty's leave to lay those papers before the House; and if the House pleased, he would bring them up to the table.

And accordingly (the House shewing a general inclination for it) they were brought up to the table and read (being the account he gave of the last plot under his own hand, and his examination taken by Mr. Vernon, afterwards upon his trial produced); and after the same was read, the House ordered, that sir John Fenwick should be brought immediately before them; and that no person should in the mean time speak with him, or give or receive any paper from him. And the House further ordered that the lord Cutts, sir Henry Hobart, and Mr. Norris, three of their members, should see their order executed, and in the mean time adjourned to the afternoon.

About five o'clock in the afternoon, sir John Fenwick was brought with a strong guard (which the lord Cutts had taken care for) to the House; and being brought to the bar, Mr. Speaker spake to him thus:

Mr. Speaker. Sir John Fenwick, the House understands that you have shewed some inclinations to make a discovery of the designs and practices of the enemies of the government; you have now an opportunity to do it; and the House require it from you, that you make a full and ample discovery of all you know of that matter.

Sir John Fenwick. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the House is not ignorant of my circumstances. I am indicted of high-treason, and have been arraigned: what I have done to serve the king and nation his majesty knows; it hath been communicated to him by his privy council. I do not know but what I say may hurt myself; and therefore I desire that I may have some security for myself, and I am willing to tell the full of all I know.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, if you please to withdraw, gone before the commission could be in England; it was debated among the Jacobites, whether they ought not to take the first opportunity to execute this commission, even though they had it not in their hands: It was resolved to do it; and a day was set for it; but as Fenwick said, he broke the design; and sent them word, that he would discover it, if they would not promise to give over the thoughts of it: and upon this reason, he believed, he was not let into the secret the following winter. This his lady told me from him, as an article of merit to obtain his pardon: but he had trusted their word very easily, it seems, since he gave the king no warning to be on his guard; and the two witnesses, whom he said he could produce to touch this, were then under prosecution, and outlawed: so that the proof was not at hand, and the warning had not been given, as it ought to have been. But of all this the government knew nothing, and suspected nothing at this time." Burnet.

for the present, the House will send you their pleasure.

[Sir John Fenwick withdrew, and was called in again.]

Mr. Speaker (Mr. Paul Foley). Sir John Fenwick, since you withdrew, the House have considered of what you said at the bar. They do not think what you said is an answer to what they require; they do expect a full and candid confession from you of what you know; and they think that the best way for you to obtain the favour of the House is to deal ingenuously with them.

Sir John Fenwick. Sir, I am in the hands of the law, and I would not do any thing that his majesty might be angry with; for I do not know it is with his majesty's consent: I have acquainted him fully with all I know of the matter; this is all the account I can give you at this time. It is a dangerous point that I am under; I know not but I may come to my trial in a few days, and what I may say, may rise up against me in a court of judicature: I humbly propose it to the house, if they do not think it a hard case for me to make any confession here, when his majesty hath all I know, I shall be very ready to do what this honourable House pleases to command me; but I desire this House will consider my circumstances. I would not offend the king, nor offend this House.

Therupon, Mr. Speaker again spoke to him to withdraw: and being withdrawn, the House debated, whether they should acquaint him with their having those Papers of Information. But they did not think fit to do it for this reason, because they thought these Papers were a contrivance, and made by others for him; and that the best way to get the truth out of him, would be for him to tell his own story. Besides, if the House should let him know they had those Papers, he would only refer to those Papers, as he had lately done, when he was examined by the king and council.

It was also debated, whether there should be any threatening words used towards him; but they thought that not proper; for his confession ought to be free and natural. It was also debated, whether they should take notice of his majesty's consent; but that was not thought fit, being thought derogatory to the privileges of the House. So the House ordered him to be called in again; and Mr. Speaker delivered the sense of the House to him in these words:

[Sir John Fenwick at the Bar.]

Mr. Speaker. Sir John Fenwick, the House has considered of what you have said, to excuse your making a discovery of your knowledge of the designs and practices of the enemies of the government; and they think what you stand upon is only an excuse; they think you have no reason to apprehend the king should be angry with you for making any discovery to this House, this being the proper place to enquire of all things that do relate to the king and government, especially his majesty's safety; and you ought to discover to them what you know. As to what you stand upon, that you should not be prejudiced by what you discover here, I am commanded to tell you, they do take notice by what you have said here, that you have already, notwithstanding what you say, discovered it to the king and council: and they command me to tell you, that you have no reason at all to apprehend, that you shall suffer any thing if you make a full and free discovery here; no man that ever did so, and dealt candidly with this House, ever did: it is in your power to deserve the favour of the House; it is required by the House, that you make a discovery; and this is the last time that you are like to be asked to do it.

Sir J. Fenwick. Mr. Speaker, I know not what answer to make to this House; I would not willingly offend it; what I have informed the king of is a great deal; and a man would have some little time to recollect himself; and I have been kept a very close prisoner, and had no convenience of pen, ink, and paper; it is hard to remember just of a sudden; and I would willingly be secure his majesty will not be angry with me. I was in hopes that his majesty would have informed the House himself; he hath all that I know; my circumstances are hard, I am in danger every day to be tried, and I desire to be secured, that what I say shall not rise up in judgment against me; it is hard to make me accuse myself under these circumstances, and very hard to put me on it now.

Mr. Speaker. As to what you say relating to the fear of his majesty's displeasure, and the other excuse, you have had your answer already. As to what you say relating to time, if you will now declare what you know and remember, the House will take it into consideration, whether they will give you farther time to make up the rest.

Sir J. Fenwick. Sir, his majesty hath all exactly; it is impossible for me to inform you of it without accusing myself: I do not really know what to ask but a little time, if they would please to give it me.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, you know already what the House requires of you.

Sir J. Fenwick. I do: but it is no excuse that I have made: what I have told is truth, to the best of my knowledge: I am not very good at speaking; and if I might have a little time, I shall do what they please to command me.

Mr. Speaker. If that be all you have to say, if you please to withdraw, you shall know the pleasure of the House.

(Sir John Fenwick withdraws. Is called in again.)

Mr. Speaker. Sir John Fenwick, this House have considered what you stood upon when you were here last, that your memory was bad, and that you desired time; but the House think it a matter of great moment to the king and the whole nation, that those that are their enemies should be discovered as soon as possible; and this being a matter within your knowledge, the House do not think fit to give you time; but if they find, by your discovery, that you deal candidly and ingeniously with them, and have told them as much as you knew upon your memory, they will consider of your request of giving you time for the rest.

Sir J. Fenwick. When first I spake to the privy-counsellor, I proposed it to him, whether I might have a pardon without being an evidence against any man; and in that case I would serve the king so as to tell him all that I knew. It was upon honour that I did it to him, and he took the words in writing from me, and sent them to the king in Flanders. The king's answer was, That he made no objection as to my being an evidence, nor his giving me a pardon; but that I could expect no pardon, till he knew what I could say: upon that I was encouraged to do what I did for his majesty's service; and have found in all my business since, whatever I do or say, the answer is, it is not satisfactory; and I am where I was. When this was done, there was a message sent to me from the lords justices, That this was not satisfactory, and I must tell all I know: now, when a man hath told all he knows, and this must still be the answer, it is very hard. The king's answer was, That I should more fully make good what I had said. Sir, I did afterwards explain what I had informed that honourable person, and still it was not satisfactory. I hope I shall not find this from this honourable House: I am upon my life, and I hope this House will consider of it: I know this House is good security if I had it; but till I have it, I am under these circumstances, and I may at last be told all is not satisfactory: I desire the House will please to consider of it.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, you know the pleasure of the House; you know what they require of you.

Sir J. Fenwick. I am very unwilling to offend the House; but these are very hard circumstances, to be told, when I have done all I can, it is not satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, you know what the House does expect; you must either give them satisfaction in it, or withdraw. (Accordingly he withdrew.) And a motion was made for leave to bring in a Bill to attain sir John Fenwick of high-treason; and after a debate thereupon, the House divided. Yeas, 179. Nays, 61. So it passed in the affirmative.

November 9. The Bill was presented to the House; and after a long debate, the question was put for the second reading of it, whereupon the House divided. Yeas, 196. Nays, 104.* So it passed in the affirmative, and Friday morning was appointed for it. The same day the House ordered, That sir John Fenwick should have a copy of, the Order for reading the Bill the second time, and a copy of the Bill; and that he should be allowed pen, ink, and paper. And further ordered, That Mr. Attorney General and Mr. Solicitor General should prepare and produce the evidence against him on Friday morning.

And Mr. Speaker this day acquainted the House, that he had received a letter from Mr. Fuller, which he thought fit to acquaint the House with; but upon a question for reading of it, it passed by a very great majority in the negative; so that there was no division upon that matter, but the letter was writ in the words following:

"Sir;

"I presume that, no person whatever, in the interest of the present government, hath been more actually engaged with sir John Fenwick than myself, it being my fortune several times to bring letters to him from the late king and queen at St. Germain's, and to carry his answers: I have also been with him at private consultations of the late king's adherents, as my Informations assert; so that if I may be serviceable to the detecting his treasons, I shall be very ready to serve the government, and to demonstrate my integrity. I am, Sir, &c.

"W. FULLER."

November 10. Sir John Fenwick sent the Speaker a Letter in these words:

"Sir;

Newgate, Nov. 10.

"I would have addressed myself in the humblest manner I could to the honourable House of Commons, from whom I received a copy of a Bill against me with their order; but my keeper will not carry any paper from me but to yourself, to whom I durst not presume to send a petition to deliver for me. Therefore I beg the favour you will please to acquaint the House, that it is my humble petition to them, That they would give leave for my counsel, sir Francis Periberton, sir Thomas Powis, and sir Bartholomew Shower, to come to me, with my solicitor, Christopher Dighton, to advise with alone. The keeper will not so much as let me send the copy of the bill and order to my solicitor, so it is of no use to me: I humbly beg they will please to give order, that I may have all assistance that is necessary for me, and that you will pardon this trouble from,

"Sir, your's, &c.

"JOHN FENWICK."

Upon this Letter they did readily order that he should be allowed two counsel to make his defence, and that they might be alone with him; and after some debate, did give leave that he might have the solicitor he desired, though it was said, his solicitor was a very great Jacobite; and it was insinuated, that he was suspected to be concerned in the escape of Woodman; but it was also said, that he had been made use of as his solicitor to prepare for his Trial, and before that, in other matters; and so that it might not be thought that there was any hardship upon him, in that respect, the House thought fit to allow Mr. Dighton to be his solicitor.

November 12. A Petition was presented from sir John Fenwick, as follows:

To the Hon. the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled: The humble Petition of Sir John Fenwick, bart.

"Sheweth,

"That there being a Bill of Attainder brought into this House for the attainting of your petitioner of High-Treason, and your petitioner is advised, that there are many weighty reasons to be offered against the said bill: Your petitioner therefore most humbly prays, that your honours will be pleased to hear him by his counsel against the passing of the said bill at the bar of this honourable House; and to appoint such time for the same, as to your honours shall seem meet. And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c. "J. FENWICK."

Which prayer of his Petition was granted.

Nov. 13. Sir John Fenwick was brought to the House, by order, from the prison of Newgate; and there being a very great company of strangers, both in the Lobby and Speaker's Chamber; and the House being full of members, to prevent the inconvenience that such a number of people crowding in might occasion, the Lobby was ordered to be cleared of all persons that were not concerned, and also the Speaker's Chamber, and that the back-door of the same should be locked, and the key laid upon the table: but it having been said, that the Lords did admit the members of this House to hear their debates, there was private intimation given the serjeant to let them remain in the Speaker's Chamber, when others were removed.

Then sir John Fenwick was ordered to be brought to the bar: but it being a proceeding of that nature, that none of the ancientest members could give a precedent, it was necessary to settle some preliminaries; and the first question that was moved, was, Whether the Mace ought to lie upon the table when sir J. F. was in the House, or whether the serjeant ought not to stand by him with it at the bar?

Mr. Smith. Sir John Fenwick being a prisoner, the mace ought to be at the bar, and then no member can speak.

Mr. Boyle. This hearing, of any thing I can think of, is most like the hearing of an election; and then the mace is upon the table, and every one has liberty to speak and ask questions.

Chancellor of the Exchequer. (Mr. Charles Montague.) The Mace ought not to be upon the table, because he is a prisoner: the sheriffs of London can't have him in custody here; and so they deliver him into custody of the serjeant.

Mr. J. Howe. That argument would be good, if he could not be in custody of the serjeant unless he had the mace in his hand.

Mr. Brotherton. The mace ought to be upon the table, because the bill is to be read.

Mr. Chr. Musgrave. The mace ought to be upon the table. Never any bill was read but the mace was upon the table.

Col. Grenville. If the mace be upon the table it would be a great hardship to the members that they cannot speak, and a great hardship upon the prisoner that he cannot ask any questions. My lord Torrington was brought prisoner from the Tower, and upon account of his quality the house did not let him go to the bar: but while he was in the house, the mace was upon the table, and he gave an account of the whole campaign; and every body was at liberty to ask what questions they pleased.

Attorney General (Sir Thomas Trevor.) The matter is very new; and I think it is necessary you resolve upon the method before you call in the counsel, that you may acquaint the counsel with it; I think it not proper that the mace should be upon the table, because he is a prisoner; though it may not be necessary that the serjeant should have it upon his shoulders all the time, but he may ease himself. I believe you will ask sir J. F. what he has to say, but no questions to make him accuse himself; and I humbly propose it to you, that after the counsel is called in, they may open the nature of the evidence against sir J. F.; and then, whether you will permit them to go on, or they shall withdraw, and the house will consider what questions shall be asked.

Col. Mordaunt. I hope the questions will be taken down upon a paper by the Speaker, and then read to us, that we may see if they be right, and so asked by the Speaker.

Sir W. Williams. If the mace is not upon the table, our mouths are muzzled: we are in the nature of judges; and shall we pass a vote that the judges shall not ask any questions?

Sir Tho. Dyke. I cannot be informed without asking of questions: I know not whether you are a House without it, without having the mace upon the table. And will you sit in your highest capacity without being a House? I do not know how it was when the lord Torrington was here; but when the duke of Leeds was here, the mace was upon the table.

Mr. Boyle. I wish you had appointed a committee to have settled the preliminaries, and that the bill had not been brought in at all; what they labour, as a matter to avoid delay, may occasion more. For though, when you carry the mace to the table, no member should have the liberty to speak, yet any member hath liberty to desire that the counsel may withdraw, and they must withdraw, and the mace must be brought upon the table.

Cham. of Bache. That gentleman is certainly in the right; but I think the mace must not be upon the table till when the prisoner is here; and I think the questions must be asked by the chair. The longest examinations that I remember was of the admiralty, and then the questions were asked by the chair. For the sentence of my lord Torrington, it is true, he had not the mace with him, but he came at his own request, he came to give you an account of his proceedings; and in that case not a question was asked by any member; and any member hath liberty to propose any question, but it must be asked by the chair.

Afterwards the question was put, and it passed, That sir John Fenwick should stand with the mace at the bar.

Then a question arose about reading of the Bill: some gentlemen said, it could not be read when the counsel was present, for the mace would be off the table; (and they seemed to be under a difficulty by having passed the last question;) others said, it was not necessary to read it whilst sir J. F. was present, he having had a copy of it; but at last it was thought reasonable, it being in the nature of a charge upon him, that it should be read to him when present with his counsel; and it was said, it was done so in the case of indictments, though copies were delivered to them: but it should be read only as a matter of form, as a charge to which he was to answer; but it could not be reckoned a second reading, according to the rules of the House, the mace being off the table; and therefore it should be read again when the counsel and he was withdrawn. And it was said, that the Journals did take notice, that in some cases, as in the case of an adjourned debate, some bills had been read four times; and so it was agreed, and that difficulty was solved.

And the serjeant took the mace, and brought sir John Fenwick to the bar; and counsel was admitted for him, and for the bill, viz. Mr. Serjeant Goid, king's serjeant, and Mr. Recorder Lovel, likewise king's serjeant. And sir Thomas Powis, and sir Bartholomew Shower, for sir John Fenwick.

And Mr. Speaker opened the matter thus:

Mr. Speaker. Sir John Fenwick, the house have received information that you have been in a horrid conspiracy against the life of his majesty, and for bringing in a French force to invade this kingdom, that you have been indicted thereof; and they have considered the nature of the crime with which you stand charged, and how destructive it would have been (if it had succeeded) to the very being of this kingdom; and therefore, that you may not go unpunished, if you are guilty, have ordered a bill to be brought into this house to attain you for high-treason, which hath been once read, and will be now read to you at the bar; and then you will hear the evidence against you, and have liberty to make your defence: and though you cannot claim any right time to, this house (to show how ready they are to favour you, in giving you any reasonable help to make your defence) do allow you counsel to assist you therein; and having granted you this their favour, they do expect that you will make a good use of it. I am likewise to acquaint those that are your counsel, that this house do reckon their own prudence will so guide them, as not to give any just offence to this house; and that they will not be allowed to question the power of Parliament to pass bills of attainder when they judge it requisite; of which this House is more proper to judge than any private person, and therefore they will not allow you to debate that point. Let the Bill be read.

[Clark of the House of Commons reads.]

Whereas sir John Fenwick, bart. was, upon the oath of George Porter, esq. and Cordel Goodman, gent. at the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer held for the city of London, on the 28th day of May, 1696, indicted of High Treason, in compassing and imagining the death and destruction of his majesty, and adhering to his enemies, by consoling and assisting with several persons (whereof some have been already attainted, and others not yet brought to their trial for the said treason) in several meetings, to send Robert Charnock, since attainted and executed for High Treason, in conspiring to assassinate his majesty's

* It is the statute 6 Will. 3, c. 4. The next act in the statute book is, "An Act to attain such of the persons concerned in the late horrid Conspiracy to assassinate his majesty's royal person, who are fled from justice, unless they render themselves to justice, and for continuing several others of the said conspirators in custody." By which it was enacted, That if sir George Barclay, kn. — Johnson, alias Harrison, — Durant, alias Durance, Michael Hare, major George Holmes, Philip Hanford, alias Browne, Richard Richardson, John Maxwell, — Bryerly, — Howden, — Hangate, shall not on or before the 25th day of March A. D. 1697, render themselves to the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, or one of the Secretaries of State in order to their trials for treason then such of them as shall not so render him or themselves, as aforesaid, shall stand and be convicted and attainted, and are hereby convicted and attainted of high treason, and shall suffer the pains of death, and incur all forfeitures, penalties and disabilities, as traitors convicted and attainted of high treason. And it was further enacted, That Counters, John Bernardi, Robert Cassels, Robert Meldrum, James Chambers, and Robert Blackbourne, who had been committed, and were in custody in Newgate for the said conspiracy and treason: and such other persons who shall hereafter render themselves, or shall be apprehended; and against whom there shall be evidence upon oath of their being concerned in the said barbarous and bloody conspiracy of assassinating the person of his sacred majesty, shall be detained and kept in custody without bail or mainprize, until the 1st day of January, which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred ninety seven, unless they shall be sooner bailed by order of the court, signed by six of his majesty's most honourable privy council. See the next Case. The Statutions are the terms of Bills of Attainder, vol. 11, p. 1640.

secret person (whom God long preserve) to the late king James in France, to invite and encourage the French king to invade this kingdom with an armed force, by promising to join with and assist him with men and arms upon such invasion. And whereas the said sir John Fenwick did obtain his majesty's favour to have his trial delayed from time to time, upon his repeated promises of making an ingenuous and full confession of his knowledge of any design or conspiracy against his majesty's person or government, and of the persons therein concerned. And whereas he has so far abused his majesty's great clemency and indulgence therein, that, instead of making such confession he hath contrived and formed false and scandalous papers as his informations, reflecting on the fidelity of several noble peers, divers members of the House of Commons, and others, only by hearsay; and contriving therein to undermine the government, and create jealousies between the king and his subjects, and to stifle the real conspiracy. And whereas Cordel Goodman, one of the witnesses against the said sir John Fenwick, to prove the said treason, lately and since the several times appointed for the trial of the said sir John Fenwick, at one of which times the said sir John Fenwick had been accordingly tried, had it not been for the expectation of the said discoveries so often promised, is withdrawn; so that the said Cordel Goodman cannot be had to give evidence upon any trial. Be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said sir John Fenwick is hereby convicted and attainted of High Treason, and shall suffer the pains of death, and incur all forfeitures as a person attainted of High Treason.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, the house expects from you, and Mr. Serjeant Lovel, that you open the evidence you have to prove the suggestions of the Bill.

Serj. Gould. Mr. Speaker, we are here, in obedience to your commands, to give an account of the charge, and likewise of the evidence of the fact, that is against this Gentleman, sir John Fenwick. The charge against sir J. F. is for high treason, and high treason of the highest degree; it is no less than a design of deposing the king, and subverting the government, and subjecting it to a French, arbitrary, and slavish power. If further charges, that in prosecution of this conspiracy, he hath met, together with several others, who have consulted, consented, and agreed together to bring in a French army upon us; and in order to that, as a particular overt act, it is charged, that they contrived to send one to the late king James to bring in a French power upon us: it is charged likewise, that he contrived to levy war upon us, and for that purpose did pro-vile pistols, and other warlike arms. Thus I take to be the substance of the charge, as laid in the indictment.—Now, may it please you, Mr. Speaker, as for the evidence of the fact charged and alledged in this indictment It is no secret certainly to any at this time of day (after so many trials, so many convictions, so many attainders), that for some years last past there hath been a wicked conspiracy to bring in a French power upon us to subvert this good government, and to depose the king; but God Almighty, by special providence, hath always prevented and disappointed them. We know, ever since the business of La Hogue (in which, even by a miracle, God disappointed them) they have been still restless, and have been industrious to set up again this design; and for this have plotted to bring in a French power, and have not had any regard to the king's mercy shewed to them, and that in passing several acts of parliament, but have still persisted in the same designs.—As to the charge upon this gentleman at the bar, we shall shew you that in time in the year 1694, for several months there was a conspiracy carried on, but did not take effect; afterwards, in time, I think the beginning of June, or latter end of May, there were several consults, or meetings, at the King's Head tavern at the upper end of Leadenhall street, where this gentleman that now stands charged at the bar was present; there were several gentlemen, and among the rest (as it hath and will appear upon evidence) there was sir J. F. my lord Montgomerie, and several others, whereof captain Porter and Goodman were there likewise present. It was then proposed, that one Charnock (since executed, and agreed upon by all to be present) should go over into France to the late king James, to communicate to him their resolution and sincerity in being serviceable to him in levying war here to depose the king, and subvert the government, who was to intercede with the French king, so that there might be forces sent from France. But after this, Charnock (present still this gentleman) comes and proposes this thing again, and tied whether they were sincere and real in their former resolutions. To which they all replied, and did agree and assent, that it should be done, and they were very zealous in the matter, and the forces were at that time proposed. And what was that? Why, truly, no less than 8,000 foot, and 4,000 dragoons of French, with an assurance of 2,000 horses from this country. Charnock did go into France, and did communicate this matter; and after he had communicated this matter he came back, and brought answer, that king James had endeavoured to answer their expectations, but at that time the French king could not spare his forces; but however, returned his thanks to them.

This passed on till towards Christmas last; then comes over sir George Badley upon this expedition, and there was a commission prepared for that purpose: and as to one part, he brought along with him a detachment of some of king James's guards, who was to assassinate the king. The next part was for raising a rebellion; now that fell to sir John Fenwick's part. As to the assassinating part, you have had several examples made already. Thus we have evidence to prove; and if we prove this matter as we have opened it, then I think there is no person whatsoever, but will agree that this is high treason in the highest degree. Now, Sir, here stands our matter. Here was an indictment found according to the law you made last sessions of parliament, by two witnesses to one species of treason against sir J. F.; we have one of these witnesses here viz 2094. But sir J. F. hath protracted his trial by frequent assurances of making a discovery, which hath terminated in what you have already mentioned in your bill, by means of which, sir J. F. hath not been tried; whereas he had been tried in course, without these applications, and found guilty; but now he hath had all this time, that Goodman is withdrawn in plain, and we think (but that we must leave to the judgment of this honourable House) may be reasonably supposed, by contrivance, to take off the prosecution of sir John Fenwick. For why? The inference is from a fact that we shall prove to this honourable house there hath been the like attempt upon captain Porter, but captain Porter hath been more steadfast; he has been so resolved, that he stood his ground, and, to speak the truth, notwithstanding he hath been highly attempted for we shall prove to you, that one Clancy comes to captain Porter, and tempts him to withdraw into France with assurance of a pardon, and he hath 300*l*. paid him in hand, and 300*l*. more he was to be paid when he should come into France, to be remitted by bills of exchange besides, he was to have 300*l*. a year; 100*l*. from my lord Aylesbury, 100*l*. from my lord Montgomerie, and the other 100*l*. a year from sir John Fenwick, and thus to be an annuity during his life and thus far we suspect sir John Fenwick may be concerned, for his lady came (he did not come personally, but his lady did) and gave her honour and assurance, that it should be all performed, and much more if he would withdraw himself. Captain Porter presently made a discovery of this, and takes the 300*l*. which was paid down; upon this it hath been so far proceeded, that Clancy hath been indicted for it, and convicted, and hath received judgment, and I suppose there hath been execution: we have the record of all these proceedings.

We have this circumstance farther in this case, (which it is my duty to open to this House) to shew what labour there hath been to stifle the truth of the fact, upon taking of sir John Fenwick there was one Webber taken with him, and he shid a letter into one Bow's hand, and this was to be sent to my lady Fenwick. and what is the import of this letter? the import of it is (they could not prevail) with Porter as I opened just now, therefore, you must influence the jury, get two or three stout jurymen to starve the rest, for we have nothing, upon: these things we shall endeavour to prove, according to our duty, and according to the order of this House, and then leave Sir J. F. to make his defence.

Mr. Recorder Sir, in what I say, I shall endeavour, as I ought to do, to pursue the tenor of this bill: and first I will take notice, that it is the pleasure and direction of this House, that we should attend this House this day, to produce the evidence against Sir John Fenwick.

The crime for which he stands indicted is high-treason. I presume the learned gentlemen on the other side will not deny, but that the compassing and conspiring the death and destruction of the king is high-treason; and that to endeavour it, or show it by an overt-act, to raise a foreign power to invade the realm, or to hold correspondence, or adhere to the king's enemies, is likewise high-treason; and therefore I shall not trouble the House to say any thing to it one way or another, because I believe they will not deny it.

In the next place, the bill does take notice that Sir J. F. hath been indicted at the Old-Bailey, in May 1696. Sir, by the law of this House of Parliament made last sessions, no man ought to be indicted of high-treason without two witnesses; pursuant to that law, Sir J. F. hath been indicted upon the oaths of two witnesses, Captain Porter (whom we have here) and Goodman (whom we then had, and he did swear), and upon the evidence of those two witnesses the jury found the bill.

We have this further matter: for before the time the bill was presented to the Grand-jury, there was an examination taken both of Porter and Goodman in writing, and I think it was before a worthy member of this House, to whom I appeal in this case, and in those informations (if I mistake not,) the same informations they gave against Sir John Fenwick as they gave against Mr. Cook; and upon the trial of Cook they were sworn, and did justify and verify the informations they gave before. and then, if you please, we shall call witnesses to prove, that upon the trial of Cook, Porter and Goodman gave that evidence that did equally affect Sir John Fenwick (for he was then withdrawn, and could not be taken), and the evidence was, That Cook, Sir John Fenwick, with my Lord Ashley, my Lord Montgomery, Mr. William Parkyn, Sir John Fidd, Charnock, Goodman and Porter, were all together at a consult especially appointed for the carrying on these treasonous purposes; they gave the count a great deal of trouble, whether Goodman was there at that time, and they did call some servants of the house that did prosecute, but the count was thoroughly satisfied; and it hath appeared since plainly since, that they did thus the justice of the court, for that Goodman was undoubtedly there. Sir, Cook upon the trial was convicted, and had judgment of death. And, Sir, he is executed; but it does not become necessary, why he is not executed; his Majesty, his Honour, hath given reason for it. But this I may say, being present at the trial, nothing was made more plain; and Sir J. F. appeared to be equally concerned.

To shew Sir John Fenwick is guilty, I crave leave to add this, he did withdraw himself, and fled, and was enquired after with diligence; and at last he was found. We shall make good all we have begun with, by evidence (we hope) to the satisfaction of this House.

Serj. Gould If you please, Mr. Baker, that is solicitor for the king in this case, does attend at the door with all his papers, we desire that he may be let in.

Mr. Speaker Serjeant, call in Mr. Baker [Which was done.]

Mr. Speaker. What do you call Mr. Baker for?

Serj. Gould To give an account of this indictment, for we have a true copy from the record.

Mr. Thomas Pons Mr. Speaker, since I am here assigned counsel for the prisoner, by the allowance of this honourable house, upon his application, without my privy; I crave leave humbly to acquaint you, in behalf of my client. I take it for granted, that he is, I am sure we that are counsel for him are, a little surprised in what the king's counsel are going about; for in truth, we were not aware, nor do we find that any notice was given to the gentleman at the bar, that there would be any proceeding against him by examining of witnesses, or giving of evidence; he had (it seems) the vote of the house sent to him, and likewise a copy of the bill; but I could not understand that the house had given notice that he should be prepared by witnesses, if he had any, or be at liberty to produce them. Nor was there the least notice to him, that there would be a proceeding against him by way of giving evidence. He did, as I said, humbly apply himself, by petition, that he might be heard by counsel against the passing of the bill; and I shall very carefully observe those questions you gave us, which I hope we should not have stood in need of, but have behaved ourselves as becomes us, and not have drawn in question the power of parliaments. I never had a thought to do such a thing; but this I humbly lay before you for your consideration, whether, without any sort of notice, that I perceive, he had from this house, to make his defence to any evidence, and consequently there could be no need of witnesses on his behalf: whether you will proceed, unless he had had forewarning to provide himself otherwise than by the printed votes which (I suppose) he had no opportunity of seeing; and whether, within the month you are pleased to acquaint us with, we may be heard as to the reasonableness of this proceeding, that by and bye we must crave leave to speak unto.

Mr. Speaker Sir John Fenwick did petition, it is true, that he might be heard by counsel at the bar against passing the bill; but he has since petitioned for counsel and a solicitor; and the answer from the house was, that he should be allowed counsel to make his defence.

Sir Thomas Powis. Yes, Sir, I have seen the order of the house; and truly there did not any thing occur from it to me; that it should be expected that he should produce witnesses; for he saying that he might be heard against passing of the bill, and the order of the house being that he might have counsel for making his defence, I did not apprehend that it impowered us so to be prepared as to bring witnesses, especially there being no notice given to him to bring witnesses, nor no way for him to compel them to come here.

Sir Bart. Shower. Mr. Speaker, we do acknowledge that we are so far ready as to offer some considerations against the reasonableness of the bill, not against such bill in general, but against sir John Fenwick in particular, and upon those suggestions in the bill; but in respect of his making his defence against matter of fact, and to answer the charge of the bar, we are not ready. The first time we had notice that sir John Fenwick should attend, or be brought to the bar, was last night at nine or ten o'clock at night; [Note, This order was made the day before at the rising of the House.] It is true, this order said the king's counsel should produce evidence for the bill upon this day; but it was not ordered that there should be evidence produced for sir John Fenwick, or at that time that he should be personally present: we are ready, with submission, to offer what we have to say against the passing of this bill, upon the suggestions made in the bill, as sir John Fenwick's case is there represented; but to answer them in respect of truth or falsehood, that we are not prepared to do: whether you will hear them to that, before you have heard us, in the other particular, that we submit to you.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, you had notice on Wednesday last, that sir John Fenwick should have liberty to make his defence by counsel; and if you had doubted whether he should be admitted to do it by witnesses, you might have applied to have known the pleasure of the House: but if that be what you stand upon, if you will withdraw, you shall know the pleasure of the House.

Serj. Gould. I must confess we depended on it, and expected no other thing than the bar evidence. This was our order, and I apprehended that the petition meant the same thing: for, as I remember, it was an order likewise that the king's counsel should produce the bar evidence: what reason was there for that evidence, unless sir John was to apply himself to answer it?

Mr. Recorder. I beg your leave to observe with what reason the counsel on the other side make this objection: when it is the import of this bill, that sir John Fenwick is guilty of high treason: and your order says, they are to be heard against the bill, that is to say, they are to be heard against the high treason charged upon him by this bill. Therefore the House directed us to produce the evidence against of John Fenwick, to verify the suggestions of this bill: and so I cannot apprehend what can be more proper at this time, but to prove the fact against sir John Fenwick; and it is their business to defend it as well as they can.

Sir Thomas Powis. What was said by the learned gentleman on the other side, I hope will be some reason why we might be of opinion, that we should not have occasion to produce witnesses: and the truth is, this bill does no where so much as say, sir John Fenwick is guilty of high treason; and therefore Mr. Recorder was under some mistake, when he said the bill charged that he was guilty. The bill does not any where make such an allegation: there is nothing but a recital that he was indicted for such a treason: and then it recites, that whereas he had protracted his trial by such means, and Goodman had withdrawn himself, (but it does not say with his privacy,) and then follows the enacting part: Be it enacted, &c. So that there is no such thing as any allegation that he is guilty, whereby we could imagine that that was the fact or question between us. We now offer these things humbly to you, and shall readily submit to what you think fit to do in it.

Mr. Recorder. Sir Thomas Powis says, that sir John Fenwick is not charged with his doing any act, or being guilty of high treason; but the bill takes notice that he stands indicted for it: then it will be enough for us to prove that he stands indicted, unless the House think fit to let us go into the evidence of his being guilty.

Sir B. Shower. We do not oppose the producing evidence to prove the suggestions of the bill, and the recitals of the bill specified: but if they attempt to prove him actually guilty, by living witnesses, as they have opened it here, that we humbly beg leave to oppose. But if they think fit to prove the suggestions of the bill, that there was an indictment, that there were witnesses sworn, and one is withdrawn, and the premises of making confession, and his perjurating in that matter, we are ready to make our defence to that.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you must withdraw before you have the directions of the House.

Accordingly sir John Fenwick, and the Counsel of both sides, withdraw. And being withdrawn,

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you have heard what is stood upon by the Counsel for sir John Fenwick: they say if you call only evidence to prove the suggestions of the Bill, they are ready to answer them; but if you call any evidence to prove sir John Fenwick guilty of a Conspiracy, by living witnesses, they pretend they are not ready, and say, They did not know they should be allowed liberty to produce any Witnesses.

Sir T. Littleton. The Counsel could not think that the Bill should set forth that sir J. F. was indicted, but that the House would know by what means; and that Goodman was guilty away, and we should not enquire by what means. What are the objections by the counsel against the Bill? Say they, we are ready to give reasons against the bill; they do not say down-right against your jurisdiction: but, say they, we are ready to show it is not reasonable in the same, as stand circumstances, to pass this Bill. Sir John's Petition was to be heard down-right against the Bill. If that was your intention to hear him to that and to that only, I suppose you would not have worded your Answer as you did: you ordered him Counsel to make his Defence; and at the same time ordered the king's counsel to produce the Evidence. How could they understand it, but to make Defence to the Evidence? It may be they have a mind to have another fee: Whether you will think fit, in the circumstances you stand, to give them further time, I do not know; but the circumstances of the kingdom, and the king's life, must be considered as well as sir J. F. What is the meaning that they are not prepared? I suppose it is to have further time; but I think your order is so plainly worded, that they could not ignorantly mistake it.

Lord Norryes. I rise up to the matter of fact: that gentleman tells you your order is plainly worded: it is so, if they had timely notice of it: but the counsel at the bar tell you, they had no notice of this order till ten o'clock last night.

Mr. Speaker. That noble lord does mistake; for that which they say they had no notice of till last night, was, that sir J. F. should be brought hither; but the notice that he should be heard by his counsel for his Defence was sent him the day before.

Lord Norryes. This very order, for his majesty's counsel to produce the Evidence, was made but upon Thursday.

Mr. Speaker. Then I mistake. But the order that was made upon his Petition, I sent away immediately: but the order they mean, I suppose, is that for the bringing him hither.

Mr. Cooper. Say the counsel for sir J. F. We come prepared to make Defence to every thing charged in the preamble of the Bill, but what is not charged, we do not come prepared to make defence to. Now, they conceive the fact of High-Treason is not charged upon him by the Bill; and if true, it is of great weight; but as it is, it is none: for first, it is plain the preamble recites, that he was indicted for high-treason by the grand jury; that is a charge of high-treason within the bill; for it says, he was charged by the oath of his country upon the oath of six witnesses; and there is the very great act recited in the preamble of the bill. Now, allowing this its due weight, can any man think, that sits here as a private judge, that the high-treason thus recited, as found by the grand jury, was no part of his charge? The very nature of the bill speaks; for could any man think, that you would ground a Bill of Attainder upon a suggestion, that he being indicted of high-treason, had spirited away one of his witnesses, or for giving false information? So that this is trifling with the house, with submission.

Sir R. Temple. Can any body say any thing of the intention of the house, when it is reduced into a Bill? Is it not the bill that he is to make his defence to? and the gentleman that spoke, says that nobody could think otherwise. Why, sir, nobody is to think otherwise than the Bill states it. Now the thing before you is, Whether upon the suggestions of this Bill it is fit for you to pass it? The case of Morlier was, That he made his escape, being under an Indictment of High-Treason; and it came before the house, Whether, upon the statute of 25 E. 3rd, it was High-Treason? But they did not debate the fact. Now you have brought a Bill here, and all the ground is, that he was indicted for high-treason, had thus and thus prevaricated, and delayed his Trial upon promises of confession; and in conclusion, one of the witnesses is withdrawn: Sir, no man is to make his Defence but to what is in the bill; nor can you examine to any thing but what is suggested in the bill. If you had put the issue upon the guilt of sir J. F., he must have a fair trial in some place, and that he cannot have here upon oath; for upon all Bills of Attainders they have had a fair trial above.

Mr. Smith. I always thought when a Bill of Attainder was to pass through this house, that every man was concerned to hear what Evidence he could, to make it appear whether the person was guilty of the facts that were alleged against him to condemn him for; and I take it, the principal thing to be considered is, whether he be guilty of such a crime as deserves such a punishment; so that, I take it, the question now is, Whether sir J. F. hath had that notice to produce his evidence, as is convenient? For I think we should lose time to let counsel ramble upon the reasonableness of our proceedings; the question is, Whether he is guilty of the fact? Sir, I can never think the counsel could understand your order, when it says, to make his Defence, but it must be to the fact upon which he is to be condemned. You have already determined that point, as to his prevaricating, but that is not the matter that shall make me find him guilty: but the Evidence that will weigh with me is the evidence of high-treason; and how far they can answer it.

Mr. Hooper. The question is, Whether or no there be a sufficient guilt laid to this man's charge? For in all courts of judicature this is a certain rule. You must proceed secundum legem et probata; and you shall not be allowed to prove a thing unless it be alleged. Now the question is, Whether this thing be alleged in the whole Bill, that sir J. F. is guilty of high-treason? And if not, you will go about to prove what is not alleged. It is true it hath been alleged that a Bill hath been found; but several have been indicted who have been acquitted. It is possible the prisoner may be guilty; but I think we must observe that method here, that is observed every where else, and that is, not to go about to prove any thing that is not alledged.

Mr. Clerk. The learned gentleman hath made an objection that perhaps would hold very well in Westminster-Hall: but I suppose he may remember this Bill must have a second reading before you, as a house; and then perhaps the allegations may be different from what they are now. But the principal matter before you is, Whether this gentleman be guilty of high-treason, or no? And if they did not prepare to that part, I think they were negligent to their client; for it appears to be that part that is most sensibly like to affect him.

Mr. Howe. The more I hear the matter debated, the more it seems strange to me. I have heard the Bill read, and took notice of the heads of it: I always understood the preamble of the Bill to be the inducement to the end of it: I was mightily surprised to hear the king's counsel attempt to make good——I think they did not speak materially to our point of the allegations in the Bill, so that the allegations do signify nothing; or else, if they intended these allegations should signify any thing, we must have these allegations proved before we pass our judgment upon the Bill; whereas the counsel, instead of endeavouring to prove that he was indicted for high-treason, (though hinted at) would prove him guilty of high-treason; instead of proving that he had prevaricated, they say not one word about it; instead of proving that he has forged papers, in order to alienate the minds of the king's subjects, they say nothing to it, though in the Bill it is alledged as high-treason——We must not go here upon private fancies and opinions; no man that heard my lord Delamere's trial but believed him to be guilty of the fact; yet he was acquitted, because there was no evidence sufficient against him. I think you must stick to one of these points; if you stick to this, to prove him guilty of high-treason, you must alter the Bill; and then that must be proved out of the mouths of two witnesses. If you please to stick to the bill, then I hope the king's counsel will go on to prove the allegations of it, or let us know why they do not: I shall no more give my vote to hang him, because he is indicted of high-treason, than I shall because he hath been in Newgate.

Mr. Stane. I think a great deal of your time in debating this matter may be saved; though I will allow the Bill might have been drawn better, and that a bar-indictment is not a sufficient ground of itself for a final decision of this matter: but when at the time of finding the indictment there were two witnesses, and one of them is withdrawn, and as is supposed, by his means; if the Bill seems imperfect for any thing before you now, you will not stay all the proceedings upon it; but if you see it imperfect, and it may be amended, you will amend it as the committee. I think the favour you have given is abused, and that it is perfect trifling from the bar. In one breath they say, they could not get ready, for they had no notice till last night; and in the next place they say, they will go on to every thing but his being guilty; and I believe they never will be prepared for that.

Mr. Attorney General. I am very unwilling to speak any thing in this matter; because, sir, by the place I have the honour to serve his majesty in, as one of his counsel, if it was in the course below, I must prosecute on behalf of the king; but I am very sensible while I am in this house, I am in another capacity; I am to vote here as a judge, and not as a party. That which I do now trouble you about, is in relation to the matter that hath been objected; That the Bill does not expressly affirm, that sir J. F. was guilty of high-treason, but only that he was indicted for it. Truly I thought, and do still, with humble submission to the house, that that matter of affirming him to be guilty of high-treason was not to be inserted in the bill; for that will be the consequence of your judgment and opinion, upon hearing of the evidence. That worthy member that spoke last, said, the Bill might be better drawn; I am sorry we had not his assistance in it: But with submission to his understanding, I think that had been too much presumption, till you are satisfied whether he was guilty or no. We could only go so far as to set forth the faults that he knew; as, that he was indicted, that we can verify, and cannot take this to be like the case of an indictment; for there you must affirm such and such things that cannot be altered afterwards. But a bill in parliament hath many steps; you read it several times, and commit it; so that you alter the suggestions of the bill, as the case appears to you to be verified; and if you be of opinion that he is not guilty, you will not condemn him because he is indicted: however, that is not immaterial, but proper to be set forth for a ground of your proceedings, that there was a probability of his being guilty from that accusation. Therefore, sir, I confess, I cannot think that those gentlemen that are counsel for sir J. F. could think, that you did intend to proceed otherwise than to hear counsel as to the fact: they could not think that upon proof of his being indicted, that that would be ground enough for you to proceed to pass the Bill: for how could any body think, but you would come to examine the fact? I cannot see how they should come to mistake, unless it was wilfully.

Mr. Price. The matter now debated, is, What method shall be followed, or what evidence shall be given upon this Bill? or whether evidence shall be given of any other matter than is suggested in the Bill? I must confess, making a false step at first setting out, hath put us out of the way hitherto; for in the case of my lord Strafford, witnesses were examined, and adjudication that he was guilty before any order for a Bill of Attainder. But since you are in this way, consider whether the counsel against the Bill have gone according to their order: the order was, that counsel should in answer to press the suggestions of the Bill - and the counsel for Sir J. F. do not oppose that; but the counsel for the Bill oppose more things than are comprehended in the suggestion of the Bill: For the suggestion is only a general, and hath no positive averment. And although the Bill and an indictment is not the same, yet they must be the same in this, to put a charge upon the person. If the preamble is not to any purpose, what need they have made any, but have said only, Let him be attainted? To what purpose does Sir J. F. come to the bar? If it is to any purpose, it is to answer the charge of the Bill. That learned person says, to suggest that he is guilty till the matter is proved, then there must be an amendment in that point, and that will make it a new Bill, and then he must have another day to answer the new charge: but they might as well have said he was guilty of high treason as to say in the enacting part, that he should be attainted. Therefore, if the gentlemen for the Bill will proceed and prove the preamble of the Bill, let them, otherwise let there be another day for Sir John Fenwick to attend, and let them do all together.

Mr. Charles Mordaunt. I think, as to that learned person, nothing is to be said to his charge, for I think they have drawn the Bill pursuant to the directions; and I am sure if they had drawn it otherwise, before they had known the sense of the house, I think they had been guilty of a crime. That which seems to me before you, is what was opened by the King's counsel, and that was to prove the treason. Now, Sir, I would be glad to know of any person, whether any thing is to be admitted to be proved at your bar but what is in your bill. For let us have a little regard to the proceeding in Westminster-hall, can any person, upon an indictment of high treason, offer evidence of any treason but what is expressed in the Indictment? And I think this is the same in effect, for here you draw a bill of attainder against Sir J. F. and to judge you send him a copy of it, and, with great favour to him, you allow him counsel to defend himself to that, as to the suggestions that are in the Bill, otherwise, to what end did you send him the copy of the Bill? Now, if you will admit of any thing to be proved but what is in your Bill, I know not of what dangerous consequence it may be, for it is impossible to be prepared for it.

Mr. Solicitor General. If the counsel against the Bill could be any way mistaken, or think the Bill defective, I am for giving them longer time to make their best defence; but should neither one nor the other of them say; but your order was to draw a bill for attainting Sir J. F. of high treason; and I think if the Bill had gone no farther, but enacted that he should be attainted of high treason, we had already pursued your order; for the preamble is a necessary part of the Bill. A bill and an indictment are of quite different natures; the one is a form for an indictment, but no precedent for an act of parliament. As to the Preamble, the debate, when it was ordered, went no farther than that he was accused of high treason, and was like to have been brought to his trial; and to delay it, he pretended to make an ingenious confession, and instead of that, there was produced a paper which you have censured, as you thought fit, and upon that you voted a Bill to be brought in to attain him of high-treason: what then could be expected more for the inducement, but the debate upon which it was ordered?—If this house had thought fit to examine witnesses before, as now, no doubt but the Bill would have suggested that he was guilty of high-treason, but it is time enough for you to suggest that, after you have heard what witnesses there are. If the counsel did not know this, notwithstanding all that I have said, I am for giving them time, but, with submission, it was impossible for them to mistake it. If the Bill had went no farther than, 'Be it enacted, that he should be attainted of high-treason,' then they had some colour to say there were different species of high treason, and they could not tell to what particular fact they must apply themselves. But when the Indictment is returned, which charges him with particular facts, and tells him by what witnesses the Bill was found, it was impossible not to know that this was the high treason you did intend to enact that he should be attainted for, but when they say they are not ready, truly there may be some reason for it: for I believe they never will be ready: sometimes men will be wilfully mistaken, and sometimes it is their misfortune to be so. They say they are mistaken, which of these are true, I know not, but we have seen already the time when he hath trifled with the courts of justice, he hath delayed his trial till one witness is withdrawn, if you give him longer time, he may have the good fortune to have the other gone too. I see no reason for you to forbear bringing of the evidence.

Mr. John Montagu. I am not surprized to hear Sir J. F. desire time for giving him time: giving him time, not for his counsel to tell you his witnesses are not ready; it is a common excuse. I hardly ever knew a person brought upon his trial, but that was five years; and yet I have seldom known it allowed as a good excuse. That it is objected you must go ex officio allegat et probat, and nothing being in this bill like what the counsel for the bill did open, it is not fit to hear them call witnesses to what is not alleged in the bill. I grant that; and yet I think they ought to be allowed to call witnesses to prove every thing they have opened to you. It is agreed they ought not to have brought in a bill, to say in point blank terms, his guilt of high-treason; but they say, you should have charged with what treason he is accused of, and that they should have been admitted to prove it. With submission, the bill does that thing; for the bill does enact, that he is indicted of high-treason in compassing, &c. This is the treason that is charged upon him by this very bill. now sure you will permit them to prove what is alleged in the bill. What did the counsel for the bill open? That at several meetings they met to consider of the matter that this bill takes notice of. Did not he tell you when Charnock came first there for that purpose, and when Charnock met them again for their assurance? Now this being so plainly set forth in the bill here, which recites, that this matter was proved by two witnesses, upon the credit of whose testimony this matter was found, and that one of them is gone away; and, say they now, we are ready to prove the matter then sworn: Is not that proper to satisfy gentlemen's consciences that will not convict this man without evidence?

Sir Fr. Winnington. I humbly conceive the question is not now, Whether sir J. F. is guilty, or no? But, whether the objections the counsel for him have made, be so strong as you will grant what they move to you? They tell you, if counsel will proceed upon nothing but what is suggested in the bill, according to your order, we are ready to make our defence. It was said the king's counsel was ordered to give their evidence; that can have no interpretation but as to the matters in the bill.—Says the king's counsel, We will prove him guilty: Says the counsel on the other side, I hope the house will give us time to encounter them in that, for you have no such thing in the bill; the sending them the copy of the bill was as much as to say, You need not prove any thing but what is therein asserted. It was said by the learned gent. there, that there might have been an act of parliament which might have said only, 'Be it enacted, that such a man be attainted,' without giving any reason. I cannot deny but it might be so without any reason, but I don't believe it will be so. And another learned person was for mending of the bill. Says he, When you have the matter of fact proved before you, it may lead you to the amending of the bill, and inserting what you please, and enacting of it; but does not answer what the counsel said on the other side: Would you have us answer what we did not know that you would stand upon? The question is not, Whether he be guilty or no? But, Whether the objections that are made be good to give them time?

Col. Granville. Sir, the counsel, by what I observed from them, have started two difficulties, and really, to me, both seem very material; the first is, Whether the king's counsel shall be at liberty to prove any thing that is not suggested in the bill? The other is, Whether sir J. F. had due notice to make his defence?—The first is a matter of very great moment: You are proceeding upon a bill where not only the life of sir J. F. but the life of every man in England is in some measure concerned: When a precedent is made in this case, nobody knows who may be affected or hurt by it; and therefore I desire you will settle that matter, and have the judgment of the house, whether they will admit the counsel to prove any thing that is not suggested in the bill? If you will, I do not see how any man that stands at the bar of your house, can be prepared to make his defence. For there shall be one crime alleged in the bill, and when he comes to the bar, the counsel that are to prosecute, shall go quite off from that which is laid in the bill, and produce you evidence to a new crime; and he stares and looks round him, and you had as good allow him no counsel, or copy of the bill. This you thought so necessary for every man that was to come upon his trial for his life for treason, that you altered that trial, and declared no man should have any treason proved against him that is not alleged against him in the Indictment.—We have had great complaints of Westminster hall; and if the parliament should proceed in this manner, may have the same again. If they are too rash in their proceedings, they will be countenanced mightily in them, if you should proceed against a man, and condemn him for one thing, when he is accused of another. I desire to know, how we can proceed in a bill upon which sir J. F. is to be proved guilty, and he hath no opportunity to answer it? I take it, as this bill is drawn, sir J. F.'s guilt is no way concerned in it: For whereas the worthy gentlemen tell you the treason is specified, there is no treason specified, otherwise than he is indicted for it.

Mr. George Rodney Bridges, Sir, I think the proper question before you is, Whether you will allow sir J. Fenwick time to produce such witnesses as he shall desire for his justification? It is a little strange to me, that the gentlemen that are of sir J. F.'s counsel should insist upon those things, to desire farther time for his preparation, when (I think) it is very plain, they were told what they were to prepare for by the bill; which was, they were to justify sir J. F. against those things he stands indicted for; and the matter of the indictment is the thing to be proved before you, and the witnesses to make it good are likewise mentioned; one of them is gone, but his testimony remains upon oath, not only to the grand jury, but in another place, that I am told of: I do not think you will think it reasonable, after the king's counsel have made out their evidence, to give him time to make their observations upon the charge; so you will consider before you hear the king's counsel, whether you will allow him farther time, or no.

Sir Jos. Williamson. The gentleman that spoke last states the case to be, Whether you will think it reasonable to allow sir J. F. farther time to produce his witnesses? You may, sir, make that the question; but that will depend upon another, which is, Whether you think that sir J. F. had not notice enough to prepare to defend himself against the charge contained in the preamble of the bill? And I add this further, Whether the manner and way of expressing that particular charge in the bill, is not so worded, so charged, as here expressly to become a charge that he is to answer for, and not only as a matter of fact historically related, now to come in proof here: For if it proves to be well charged in the preamble, it is a particular fact of treason he is to answer for in this house; and then he hath had time enough, so that now you are to judge of your own way of expressing yourselves. I believe every gentleman knows it was the sense and meaning of the house, that these are the particular reasons mentioned in the indictment with which he should be charged at the bar, and have time and liberty to defend himself; and not only to the allegations, that he had been indicted, &c. Now, sir, if you shall allow these gentlemen to except against your way of expressing yourselves, that I submit to you: But it is clear to me, that this was a very good and proper way of expressing yourselves, to charge him, with the facts, and to give him liberty to disprove it. If he and his counsel understood it otherwise, the question is, Whether their differing with you in the way of expressing it, shall be allowed to them, without taking a reasonable exception to it? You are tied here to the strict rules of justice; but as to the forms of proceeding below, I do not think you are. Our meaning was, most certain (though he was indicted, that it was nothing to us), that they should bring their proof to our bar to prove him guilty; and if you should give him two or three days time, you must mend your bill to their way of expression; and to their sense.

Mr. Brotherton. I take the question to be now, Whether the king's counsel should give evidence of any other matter than what is alleged in the bill? As to that, I must observe to you, that this bill does not set forth any particular charge against him; it does not say, that he such a day did such a fact, whereby he can make his defence; it is only the recital of an indictment; and it does not say the particular time and place where the fact was done. Now as to what that gentleman says, if it had been said generally, that he should be attainted, it had been sufficient. 22 H. 8, the statute for attainting one for putting poison into a pot, &c. there is the day and year when the fact was committed; and so he might make his defence. Then the king's counsel offer to prove, that this foodman was conveyed away by sir J. F. and there is no such charge in the bill; for the bill only says, that he is withdrawn; and I am of opinion they ought to give evidence of nothing but what is in the bill.

Mr. Whitaker. As to the exceptions made by the counsel to the insufficiency of the bill, by which they pretend sir J. F. was led into an error, so that he had no due notice. I must needs say, if they were in Westminster Hall they would be in the right: but this house is not bound to those forms: for I believe the exacting clause would do the business of sir J. F. well enough, if all the rest were laid aside; and I will consider it with an much tenderness and conscience for the prisoner at the bar, as any that brings arguments from Westminster Hall. I would consider, whether such a defence as they have made, that from the bill (as to what is said in it) he had not notice enough to prepare to make his answer. They say, a recital is no direct affirmation in civil matters: it is an affirmation; for to say, Whereas such a one is bound, is good in a declaration upon a bond. Now I would know, whether this be not enough to say, That he is indicted, without any allegation that he is guilty? Had the bill no recital at all, it had been an objection; but it may be it had been such an objection, that they ought to have done something of their parts, as to have desired the opinion of the house to what they should have answered: for suppose there had been no recital at all (and you may make what recital you think fit) what should sir J. F. have done? There are some instances at common law: A man is indicted for being a common barrator, and there are no instances given in the indictment; why then he comes and prays the court, that they may declare what instances they will give, and that they may give no other words in evidence: therefore I question not but that should have come on his part; he is to be heard as to the enacting part of the bill; and under favour, you could do no otherwise. Now if they do offer to give evidence of any treason that is not specified in the recital of the bill, and the counsel make an objection to it, I shall agree with them.

Sir Ed. Seymour. My lords,* and you Mr. Speaker, what hath been said to you by that worthy person that spake last, no doubt, is true; that if there had been no more than the enacting clause, it would have done sir J. F.'s business with a witness, or rather without a witness: But that is not the question we are disputing here; but the question is, Whether you will give sir J. F. longer time to make his defence to that part he insists on, that is not contained in the bill? You are well satisfied that you cannot go through with the suggestions to night, [past 3 o'clock,] and the debates, and what relates to it; and I find no person against putting it off, but because it would be a delay; and if it be no delay, that reason is out of doors. — They tell you, the counsel could not but take notice of the matters suggested in the indictment: I cannot think that is reasonably argued; because they do know the practice and method is such, that they can take notice of nothing but what is specified and contained in the bill. And therefore, there being no guilt charged upon sir J. F. in the bill, is it reasonable they should come and accuse themselves here, or make a defence to what is not charged? No; but, say they, it is implied: This is an introduced path, and you ought to walk as securely in it as you can. It is extraordinary that you bring sir J. F. here in answer for treason, when it is allowed in the suggestion of the bill, you have but one witness to that treason; and when you take these extraordinary steps, you should comply with them as much as you can in the forms. But if treason be not treason, unless it be proved by two witnesses, and you will give him liberty to make his defence, I think it a loss of time; for you cannot go through the bill to night, to see whether sir J. F. be guilty of what is contained in the indictment. And I will give you one reason why he should not be prepared to make his defence in so short a time; for he could not produce his evidence if he had any; and if you give him longer time, I suppose you will think fit that sir J. F. should give an account of what witnesses he shall make use of for his defence; and you will give an order for those witnesses.*

Mr. Harcourt. If sir J. F.'s business must be done, I hope we shall do it like rational men, and what we enact, be able to give a reasonable account of it in the preamble of the bill. As to the question proposed, your debates have run several ways: The first is, Whether sir J. F. shall be allowed further time? And in this case, whoever I differ with, it is of that nature that I must desire the liberty of speaking my mind. I must confess, I see no room for enlarging the time; and I shall humbly submit my opinion to other gentlemen, whether he should have further time to prepare his witnesses? And for that, pray consider the nature of the matter before you.—Sir, there is nothing certain that is alledged in the Bill; and should you allow him further time to answer that which is not alledged, I cannot imagine what effect you would have of it. It is said indeed, he stands indicted; but it is no where suggested, that he is guilty of that indictment. This general charge seems a great hardship: There is no one thing that so many have been unjustly taken off by, as the uncertainty of alledging general facts in indictments of high-treason; nor has anything been complained of in such trials for a greater grievance. What have you done in the bill for regulating of trials in cases of high-treason? In that bill you have reformed that abuse, and taken care, that whatever treason a man might be guilty of, yet he shall never, upon his indictment, answer to any fact, unless the particular overt-act be expressly laid and affirmed in his indictment.—That which seems most reasonable in this case to be done, is, not to enlarge the time; but when you think fitting to proceed, proceed upon what is before you. Here are some matters expressly alledged; let them go over the recital, see whether they can prove that; but I cannot imagine to what purpose you should give the prisoner further time to answer nothing; for that which is not charged is so.

Mr. Finch. Sir, this is a question, in my opinion, of very great consequence: You are very well told from below, that this is an untrodden path; and I am the more confirmed it is so from this debate. We are told, that sir J. F. or his counsel, could not be ignorant of what they were to prepare themselves for. For this was our meaning, says one gentleman, though I find the path is so untrod, we are very unfortunate in expressing of it, for we have not said it at all in this bill; we have said, Sir J. F. was indicted, &c. sir J. F. hath had a copy of this bill sent him, counsel allowed him, and upon a second reading he comes to make his defence. We are told, the proceeding upon this bill is not to be resembled to the proceeding in Westminster-hall; and this is sufficient in a bill, though in an indictment it would not, without alledging that sir J. F. is guilty. But one would think, that if sir J. F. is guilty, every allegation in the bill, that is, the indictment to the bill, which is for attainting him, should be a good and just ground for the attainder; and then, this gentleman, that hath had a copy of the bill to prepare for his defence, and shew you reasons why the bill should not pass, though our proceedings are not to be resembled to the ordinary proceedings, yet we are to expect from him such a defence as the ordinary proceedings in Westminster-hall would require: But I think this is hardly to be expected; one might have thought, and reasonably enough, that it might have come into his imagination, that if there had been ground to attain him, by the ordinary proceedings and methods of justice, the parliament would not have taken an extraordinary course to come at it: For I can never think it a good reason to proceed this way, that is, for the saving of time; and if there be extraordinary ground they must guess at that out of the bill: Now that is grounded upon those suggestions that I have cited; and then I should have imagined, that whereas he had been indicted upon the oaths of two witnesses, as the law requires, and one of them was withdrawn; that you had rather intended to have charged him with some contrivance to elude justice, whereby you had reason to exert your extraordinary authority to protect against him by way of the legislative; and I do not find we have any precedent to warrant this proceeding, though in our debates we have endeavoured to find one: yet I cannot but observe the consequence of this hereafter: For whether we can find a precedent to warrant this proceeding in former ages, or not, we are making a precedent for our posterity. And consider the consequence of this precedent you are making; I think all the bills in parliament are grounded by the most serious ways of deliberation, before you come to judgment: And bills of attainder ought much more, sure, to require the seriousness of your debates; but I cannot but observe the steps now made; I am afraid that was a wrong step at first; I was not here the first day; but I recollect some things from the bill itself, the tenderness of those things upon which this enacting clause does stand. There was no evidence given to induce the house to bring in this bill of attainder; when this bill is brought in the house, and the preamble that suggests that which is the ground of the enacting part considered in the house; and the house did not think it reasonable to proceed to the reading of it a second time: I remember we were told, Won't you read it a second time, when you may have an opportunity of having those suggestions proved to you? This was the ground why this bill was read a second time. For consider, otherwise a gentleman may, in any other case as well as this, desire leave to bring in a bill for attainting such a one; and tell you, you shall have a good reason given to you for it afterwards; and though the reasons suggested in the bill are not sufficient, you may have reasons out of the bill that are sufficient. What a precedent will this be! Why, sir, length of time gives a sanction to those precedents which the age that makes them think not of; and they become good examples to posterity, that were even very heinous precedents to the present times. Now if this shall stand, as now in the bill, I would ask, What man in England is secure, when a parliament shall arise that hath a mind to attaint him? Why then, sir, if you do amend the bill, consider the method of your proceedings; you do yourselves, in effect, declare, that for bringing in of the bill, for twice reading of the bill, you had no ground at all; for otherwise you had good grounds recited in the bill, and that must be a sufficient ground to attaint him; and if you declare it no sufficient ground to attaint him, you declare you have brought in a bill, and read it twice, without any ground. Whether you will allow liberty to offer at your bar any suggestions otherwise than in the bill, that I must submit to you; and for giving time, since that is a question of a very extraordinary nature, but have humbly offered my thoughts, whether any thing shall be offered otherwise than is suggested in the preamble of the bill? I hope you will not, for the precedent sake you are now making; which if you do, I am afraid bills of attainder may become now as frequent as Bills of Attainder were in Rd. 2's time; which I hope never shall be.

* According to some accounts, sir Edward closed his speech thus: "I am of the same opinion with the Roman, who, in the case of Calpurnia, declared he had rather ten guilty persons should escape, than one innocent should suffer." To which lieutenant general Morant is said to have replied as follows: "The worthy member who spoke last seems to have forgot, that the Roman who made that declaration was suspected of being a conspirator himself."

Lord Norreys. Mr. Speaker, I will not pretend to tell you, that you are bound by other rules than rules of justice; but what is justice in Westminster-Hall is so here, and every where. And last year you thought it justice that no man should be brought to a trial, but he should know what were the particular facts that were alleged against him.

Lord Curzon. I think it, in some measure, a misfortune, that a matter of this nature, as in your present debate hath held you so long, and conceals it being to be wished, that every gentleman that speaks upon this occasion, would apply himself more closely to reality, and less to forms; I mean, to forms, considered merely as forms; for it ought to be true reason, that is convincing to you; and you ought not to tie yourselves to any forms upon this occasion, but such as are grounded upon reason; and really I have not heard any thing that fell from any gentleman, that shews his doubt of the nature and aggravating circumstances of the crime of the prisoner? but it hath consisted with the great candour and justice of this house, to shew this favour to the prisoner before you. The counsel say, they are unprepared; if they mean they should prepare themselves for more grounds of difference and chicanery, I would not give them farther time; I cannot perceive there is any reality of argument in it; and there is in reasoning, as in religion, sometimes a form without a power.

Sir Tho. Dyke. Sir, you have now two or three questions before you; I desire you will confine our debates to one point: I think, whatever opinion gentlemen may be of concerning the proof, I think the point under your consideration, if you will make a right judgment, is the preamble of your bill, which I take to be the foundation of it, and the cause for which you attaint this gentleman: now the preamble does not recite, and say, he is guilty, but only indicted; nor set forth any time; nay, it does not say, he was arraigned. So that these things are very uncertain, and yet you must attaint him for the things recited in your bill. And you know these acts of attainder are extraordinary methods in cases of treason; and if you put it upon this point, that the act attaints him for one thing, and the counsel shall prove another, it makes it more uncertain than it is, and no man can be safe; and therefore I hope you will confine the counsel to proofs of the matter contained in the bill.

Mr. J. Howe. Sir, I think; if you please to go on upon the matter suggested in the bill, they are allegations which must be proved before the bill is committed; and that will not hinder sir J. F. from being examined to the treason likewise. Therefore all that is alleged in this bill, I suppose, being thought necessary to be proved, I desire he may be called in, and the counsel may go on to prove what is alleged in the bill, and afterwards sir J. F. may answer them.

Lord Coningsby. If the question was, whether you should grant this gentleman time or no to make his Defence, I should not have troubled you. But the question now seems to be, Whether the Bill does depend upon the bare suggestions of the bill; or upon the guilt of sir J. F. And therefore if gentlemen do insist upon it, that he should have longer time to defend himself, as to his being innocent or guilty, I shall not oppose it; but if you think fit to put it off, as if the fate of the bill did depend upon the suggestions of it, I should agree to that matter; therefore I desire a short time may be given him to answer the matter of his guilt.

Mr. Harley: I find all gentlemen that speak of this subject, to say this matter is of a very extraordinary nature, and you have entered into it by very extraordinary methods: but I must only observe, that this being the first bill of this kind that hath been brought into the House, before any proof, gentlemen must be excused if they are cautious what steps they do take; and when the wisdom of the House has thought fit to take quite different methods, as to the preliminaries, it is not to be wondered if they meet with difficulties in their proceedings. Some gentlemen press for more time to be given to sir John Fenwick to be prepared; and others urge, that you should declare, whether the counsel should be heard to any thing but what is suggested in the bill. And I think you must give a determination to the last question, though the whole House agreed to give him longer time: for if you give him longer time, it will after come to the same debate, whether they shall be heard to any thing but what is suggested in the bill? If you should think fit to add any thing, then it will be reasonable that he also should be heard to that; for in the case of the death of a man, let him deserve never so much, yet he does not deserve to die unjustly by your hands.—It seems a very plain proposition, that when a man is accused, he should not answer to what he is not charged with; and to charge it with innuendoes and implications is so uncertain, that as I always have seen it denied in this house, so I hope I shall not see so great an assembly give any countenance to it. They did tell you, they were prepared to speak to the reasonableness of the bill; but this matter not being suggested in the bill, they are not prepared to speak to it.

Sir Tho. Littleton: I see now where your debates have led you: I thought the regular subject of our debates had been the point upon which the counsel withdrew; and that was for time. For what? Why to prepare themselves to answer any evidence that might be given against them; because they perceived you did expect the counsel for the bill should produce their evidence. But they made an objection: say they, we did not understand your order was, that we should come prepared to oppose any testimony vis à vis to be given against us, but only prepared to speak to the reasonableness of the bill. Now, gentlemen, after five or six hours debates, have been willing to accommodate the matter (that nobody might think that any one pressed a matter unreasonable), that they might have time: but some gentlemen will not be satisfied with granting what the counsel desired, but they desire more. And what is that? Why, that is to know the opinion of the house, whether you will admit any one thing to be proved that is not suggested in the bill? And I do take this to be within the suggestions of the bill, as fully as can be expressed. For what does the bill say? The bill does say he was indicted of high treason, and that one of the witnesses is gone: and gentlemen come to the conclusion, and slip over the immediate part of the bill; for the bill does say, that he did incite and consult, &c. And the objection of the counsel was not against the evidence; but they said, they were not prepared at that time to answer it, and there they leave it; and thereupon the House go on upon the debates. What can we expect that they intended? They might think, either we shall gain our point, and the house will give us time; or otherwise, if they go on and hear this evidence, then we say we wanted time. And that will be only evidence ex parte, and not carry so much weight with it, though we have nothing to say to it; or they might think it may have this effect, that the house will not go on, and hear any evidence at all: in either of these cases, we have the fairest advantage that we can have, on the second reading of the bill, in defence of our client; all they desired was, that they might have time; and I hope that which satisfied them that are most concerned, may satisfy any gentleman of the house.

Mr. J. Howe. The question is not, what they asked, but what is reasonable for us to grant? I was in the beginning against any delay, and I think there is no occasion of delay: all I desire is, sir, that the king's counsel may be desired to prove the suggestions of the bill ex toto.

Mr. Solicitor General. Most that have spoke of this matter have said, that the matter is very generally laid in this bill, and the counsel could not very well know to what to apply themselves: that it speaks of high treason in general, and of aiding the king's enemies, which is very general: it recites that indeed; but the indictment is legal, according to the late act of parliament. It is not only said, that he designed the death of the king, but for that purpose he and others met together, and agreed to send Charnock to France, to go to king James, to induce the French king with an armed power to invade England. Now how can any thing be more particularly charged? And the indictment is so charged in your bill. I think therefore the counsel could not be ignorant to what they ought to apply themselves; but by what I perceive, gentlemen are very well contented to give him further time. I remember, when the bill was first brought in, there was a long debate for a second reading; and some gentlemen thought it hard to be tried by so great an assembly, and said, they had rather be tried by a fewer number: but I shall observe, that you have sent the copy of the bill to sir J. F. beforehand, and you sent him notice that he should provide himself. But I remember a much better man than sir J. F. who had the misfortune to be under an accusation of high treason, had his indictment one hour, and was tried the next: and though he pleaded to have his trial put off till the afternoon, he could not prevail with the court of justice to do it: sir John Fenwick hath had a copy of his bill for two or three days, but he never had any copy all he had pleaded.

Mr. Waller. I stand up only for my information, that which I would know is, whether the counsel did not ask you the question, whether they should be bound to answer any thing that is not in the bill? If they asked that, then the gentleman that spoke here is answered; and the gentlemen of the house do not insist upon what sir J. F.'s counsel did not insist on. And I do think the king's serjeant, who opened the proceedings, after he had opened what had been before the grand jury, seemed to make it a charge, as if sir J. F. had been condescending to the withdrawing of Goodman.

Now that seemed as if they designed to make that a part of the evidence.

Sir Rd. Temple. The counsel did not insist upon it, only to answer the suggestions of the Bill: every body knows, they objected to the others going on with the evidence they opened, because it was not in the bill; and the king's counsel could not so much as alledge, that it was in the bill: and they would have gone on to have proved the indictment. There is another thing; it is told you, as if the preamble had suggested something of this kind, that there was a meeting. Now the gentleman that spake last but one, has cleared it, that it only recites, he was indicted for these things; and this brings nothing in issue, whether he be guilty or no. Now I think the present question, and only question before you, is upon the suggestions of the bill; for you can bring nothing in issue here, but what is in the bill; and nobody can insist, by the rules of reason or justice, that any man should be heard to any matter of fact but what is in the bill. And therefore I think there is nothing before you, but that you should give direction to hear them to what is suggested in the bill.

Mr. Methuen. Sir, I speak to the method of your debates: your debates arise upon an objection that was made by sir J. F.'s counsel, against the counsel for the bill going on with their evidence to prove sir J. F. guilty of high treason. I must beg leave to differ, as to what the counsel did say, from some of the gentlemen that spake last: the force of their objection was, that they should not now go on, for they were not prepared to answer them; and the reason they gave was, that they had not formal notice; and the other afterwards spake to the shortness of the time: your debates for a long time went pursuant to this, whether you should allow them further time or not? But the length of your debates hath raised a new matter: though I think that doubt, though it was not made by the counsel, may be very properly made by any worthy member that hath that doubt, whether, as the bill is brought in, the king's counsel might at any time speak to that point, though sir J. F. be acquainted with it. And I must always agree, that doubt ought to be resolved, before you come to resolve, whether further time shall be allowed him or not; and therefore I propose it, that this question may be put, whether the house will hear, at the bar of the house, the evidence there is to prove sir J. F. guilty of the high treason whereof he was indicted?

Col. Wharton. You have three or four questions upon your paper; and now, after so long a debate as we have had, I hope, gentlemen will not think fit to start new ones; and I hope you will take care that gentlemen shall not rise up three or four times to speak to this matter. You have another rule of the house, that when a question is moved, and seconded, though another question is moved afterwards, yet that must be the first question that is to be put; and I hope you will keep us to these rules.—I wonder at some objections: it is told you, that this is such a proceeding that never any thing of this kind was before; and that you are here going to read a bill of attainder, before you have had any manner of evidence upon which you should ground the bringing in of this bill. Gentlemen must remember, or should have informed themselves; for it is very certain that you had very good grounds to vote this bill to be brought in: I see the gentleman that brought in his own accusation; you had his own discovery read, and Mr. Attorney did inform you what was against him, and how he stood indicted. And another gentleman by me, told you, he was with him, and there was a treaty for his pardon; this was evidence for reasonable men to go upon. And to tell you that these precedents will endanger your liberty! Under favour, this is the ground of all your liberty. It is by this power of proceeding, when you have not that evidence that Westminster-Hall requires, by which you will keep great men in awe.—Now, give me leave to speak to the question that I think you ought to put: it is told you by the counsel for the prisoner, that they are not apprised what the sense of the house was, and upon that account they desired further time: I confess, when you allowed counsel, I was of opinion it was a favour; and now since they have made this objection, though I do not believe you are obliged to allow them further time, yet I had rather err on that than the other side; and therefore I think the fairest thing is to allow them some further time.

Mr. Secretary Trenchard. Mr. Speaker, I have attended all this day to your debates, which are now in my opinion of a very extraordinary nature; for a great deal of your time hath been spent upon motion of the counsel for the prisoner at the bar, whether you should allow them further time or no; and now, by what I recollect from the sense of several gentlemen, the house seems willing to allow them further time; even that is opposed at this time of day.—Sir, the king's counsel have opened the matter of fact, upon which they did intend to produce their evidence; and when they had opened the several heads, the whole objection that I heard made by the other side, was, They did not think the king's counsel could have proceeded to examine witnesses upon those facts; and that they were not prepared to bring witnesses on the side of the prisoner, and therefore prayed for further time: truly, whether that be reasonable or no, or whether upon one favour the house think fit to grant another; I cannot tell what might appear, if it had come to a question: since the life of a man is concerned, we ought to be tender of it, and I shall be as tender as another: therefore I am of opinion, that a reasonable time should be allowed. To do what? Why, upon the evidence the king's counsel should produce, they shall bring their witnesses on the other side to answer them. Whether the king's counsel will produce evidence that is foreign to the bill, that will be in judgment of the house; but it was a good motion made below, which I close withal, that a short time may be allowed them to make their defence, and bring their witnesses.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you have had a long debate: I do not remember any formal question that was proposed at first, till such time as I read to you what I thought was the question upon the debate; when I read you the question for further time, there were several members stood up, and said, that was not the question; and took exceptions to it, and proposed that the counsel should be confined to produce evidence only to the matters suggested in the bill; so that now I have two questions upon my paper, which I will read to you, and put which you will. One question is, "That they be confined to make their proof to what is suggested in the bill." The second question is, "That sir J. F. be allowed further time." &c.

Sir C. Musgrave. A gentleman said, the second question upon your paper was but lately started; but I remember, a little after the counsel was withdrawn, it was moved, Whether you would give them further time? And I presently after, in the debate, did take the freedom to ask, Whether it was intended they should answer to any thing but what was contained in the Bill? And, I remember, there was a gentleman of the long robe said, That there was nothing offered by the king's counsel, but what was within the suggestions of the bill. Another gentleman said, When they may have longer time, they did not seem so fond of it; it is indifferent to me, provided he be prepared to answer. But I cannot but observe, that the conclusion of that honourable person was, that at last you must come to determine the question. You are likewise told by an honourable person nearer the bar, why do you dispute this now you have ordered the king's counsel to produce the evidence; and so you have confounded yourselves? But for myself, I must confess, I did never think the evidence was to be heard otherwise than as to the suggestions of the bill. And if that point be to be determined, why will not you determine it now, rather than to have another debate upon it?

Mr. Boscawen. That which is presented by some gentlemen, is begging of the question. What have we here brought sir J. F. for? Was it but to satisfy ourselves, whether sir J. F. was guilty of high-treason? Now that is supposed by some gentlemen, not to be within the bill; if it be not within the bill, I desire you would throw out the bill. But the thing is, we must not examine to those things that will make sir J. F. guilty. Sir, this is a very nice thing, and very curiously woven. The great thing, say some gentlemen, we must take care of, is the blood of a man: does any one say he is innocent? No: but we must have some way or another that he must not be brought to his trial. I desire, as Englishmen, you will not only take care of the life of one man; but of the life of the king; of the lives of our wives and children, and all our families. What will they say without doors? You are afraid to meddle with sir J. F.; and therefore you will slide it away upon another point; that his being guilty of high-treason is not within the bill. I am not for taking the advantage of time; I desire, as it was moved before, that you will give him time, and try whether he be guilty of this treason or no; or otherwise do nothing in it at all.

[Then the Order was made for Candles to be brought in.]

Sir T. Littleton. Now you have candles brought in, it will be fit for you to return to the question: for my part, I am willing to put both: but I think the last question that you have upon the paper, properly speaking, is to be put first; and that is, That the house will proceed to examine witnesses to the treason in the bill for which he stands indicted.

Mr. J. Howe. I think the question ought to be, that his counsel be directed to bring witnesses to the allegations in this bill.

Sir T. Littleton. I propose it to you thus; that the house will proceed to examine witnesses at the bar, to the treasons mentioned in the bill for which he was indicted.

Mr. J. Howe. I think that gentleman might very well have moved the question without that limitation; for that is as much as to say, that witnesses shall be examined to none of the treasons in the bill, except those for which he hath been indicted; and that is a limitation, I hope, shall not be put to the endowies of this house. I hope you will put it, that they shall bring evidence to the matters alleged in the bill generally: there are several other allegations in the bill which I would have him answer to, as the alienating the affections of the king's subjects from him, which I take to be high treason.—Members. No, no.

Mr. J. Howe. Why? If it be not high treason, it hath nothing to do in that place. I believe it is a very high crime, and would induce me very much for the punishing of sir John Fenwick.

Mr. Norris. Sir, I do not know how the questions may be carried since candles are come in; but I think it is for the better. I think there are two things have been spoken to; one is this bill: I find those gentlemen that were against the bill on Friday, are more against it now. I am for the bill then, and am now for a second reading of it: I think the bill is very plain, and know not what they would have mentioned in it more, unless they would have had the King's head turned, and what wise they drink there. I think there is all the reason in the world to hear the witnesses to prove him guilty of high-treason. As to the point of time, I should be very willing to allow it them, if that question was put; and, I think, you have been very favourable to him already in allowing him counsel.

Mr. Smith. I would only observe, when the bill was to be brought in, the objection was, that you had not witnesses. And now the question is, whether you can hear witnesses upon whom no particularity assigned in the bill? I believe no man can say, but that in the indictment there are particular facts that ought to be examined: I do owe, for my part, if sir John Fenwick was a greater man than he is, it were better he should escape, than you should spend so much time about him. Sir, the indictment is mentioned in the bill; no man thinks that Goodman's going away is reason enough for bringing in such a bill against sir John Fenwick.

Mr. Speaker. Shall I read you the question? "That sir John Fenwick be allowed further time to produce witnesses in his defence, against the charge of high treason, and that he name his witnesses."

Which question was put, and passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Speaker. The other question is, "That the counsel, who are to produce their evidence against sir John Fenwick, be allowed to prove sir John Fenwick guilty of high-treason."

Sir T. Littleton. I do think one of the reasons why this bill was brought, was, because possibly, by the absence of this witness, he could not, strictly speaking, be proved guilty; though all mankind is satisfied in his guilt. And therefore I question whether it will amount to a legal proof: and if you had such a proof, as would convict him by the common proceedings of law, I should not have been for a bill of this nature; for it is against the honour and dignity of this House to do the work that an inferior court can do. But probably, by the absence of this witness, sir J. F. at a trial in the Old Bailey, might escape; though at the same time it is highly probable, the witness that is wanting to convict him, is by his means gone out of the way. Therefore I speak to the warding of the question: you say, "shall be allowed to prove." I would willingly prevent what may be objected when we come upon this debate. If you do use the word "prove," they may say, this is not proved; for such Goodman is not here. If you please to say, that we will examine witnesses to the treason, and we will be judges how far it appears to us whether he be guilty, or not guilty.

Mr. Speaker. Will you let me propose it to you thus then? "That the counsel, by producing their evidence against sir John Fenwick, be allowed to examine witnesses touching the treason mentioned in the bill, for which sir John Fenwick is indicted."

Mr. Montagu. I do not observe, that in reading of it you say any thing as to the other allegations of the bill: I think you should word it, that the counsel be allowed to produce evidence to the allegations in the bill; and the treasons whereof he stands indicted.

Mr. Spelker. Well then, the question is this, "That the counsel that manage the evidence against sir John Fenwick, be allowed to produce witnesses touching the allegations in the bill, and the treasons whereof he stands indicted."

Which question being put, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Speaker. Will you please to appoint a time for it?

Mr. J. Howe. That I would move you as this; You were so extremely late before you went upon this information, that you had not time to go through any part of it; therefore I would move you, that you would appoint early in the morning for sir John Fenwick to be here.

And thereupon it was ordered, "That sir John Fenwick should be remanded to Newgate, and brought to the House on Monday at ten o'clock."

Mr. James Montague. Sir J. F. now insisted he had not notice; I humbly move, that he may be brought in, and acquainted with what you have ordered.

And accordingly sir John Fenwick was brought to the bar.

Mr. Speaker. The House have considered of what sir John Fenwick hath said at the bar, by his counsel, and they are of opinion, that witnesses ought to be examined there, to prove the allegations of the bill, and to prove him guilty of high-treason whereof he stands indicted; but in favour to you, because your counsel said you were not prepared, the House is willing to give you time till Monday next to make your defence; and they require you to give in a list of your witnesses; and if you send to me, you may have a warrant for their appearing at that time; and they require you to be here, so that they may proceed upon the bill exactly at ten o'clock.

And sir John Fenwick being withdrawn, the House resolved, "That the bill for Attainder against sir John Fenwick of High-Treason, be read a second time on Monday."

November 18. Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, I would receive your directions in the thing; you have ordered a member to produce a list, and the counsel, in opening the evidence, have referred to it. That member desires to know the proper time for him to do it; whether, while the counsel are managing the evidence at the bar, or whether he must stay till they are withdrawn?

Mr. Sleaze. As to this matter, I do not question but it is to be offered as an evidence; and by the same reason that you give him the favoured to examine the witnesses that are produced against him; for the same reason the letter ought to be read in his presence, that he may explain it, or deny it: and give me leave to tell my thoughts of another matter: if that worthy member is to offer evidence of what he took from sir J. F.'s mouth, (though a member commonly gives his evidence in his place, after the counsel is withdrawn) I think it is not only fit to produce the letter in his presence, but that sir J. F. should hear what he says, and deny it if he can.

Mr. Speaker. Is that your pleasure, that the letter be produced before sir J. F., and that the evidence to be given by Mr. Vernon shall be in the presence of sir J. Fenwick?

The question being accordingly put, it passed in the affirmative. Then the Serjeant was ordered to take his maor, and go into Westminster-hall, and summon the members. And being returned, the order of the day for proceeding on the business of sir John Fenwick was read. [It being a quarter before 11 o'clock.] Then sir John Fenwick, and the counsel and solicitors on both sides, were brought in.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Thomas Powys, when you were here last, you insisted upon it, that the counsel against sir John Fenwick should be kept to the proofs relating to the allegations in the bill only; or else that you might have farther time, because the witnesses were not ready. The House have considered that matter, and in favour to sir John Fenwick, that he might have no surprize, have given him to this day; but they do allow the counsel to give evidence not only as to the allegations in the bill, but to prove sir John Fenwick guilty of high-treason; and therefore, Mr. Serj. Gould, you are at liberty to go on with your evidence.

Serj. Gould. May it please you, Mr. Speaker, we are here to give in our charge, and the evidence that we have against sir John Fenwick. I find by your order, that we are now allowed to produce evidence touching the allegations of this bill, and likewise of the treasons for which he stands indicted; therefore I shall beg leave to open first, how he stands charged by the indictment.

The indictment first charges him with compassing and designing to depose the king, and put him to death. The second charge is, for inciting the French king to send an army of soldiers to invade this kingdom, and to make a miserable slaughter amongst the subjects of this kingdom. The third thing is, for adhering to the king's enemies. The fourth part is, that to effect this, he, together with several others, that it is to say, Charnock, sir J. Friend, and others, did conspire, propose, treat, and agree to invite the French king to send a number of soldiers to invade this kingdom, and to procure great numbers of armed men against the king to rise and be formed; and with these armies, upon their landing and invading this kingdom, to join, for to make and carry on a rebellion and war in this kingdom. And further it charges, that he did consult, consent, and agree, to send Charnock as a messenger from sir John Friend, and others, into France to the late king James, to propose to him, to procure the French king to send soldiers and armed men to invade this kingdom. Then likewise to effect this, the indictment charges him with providing horses, pistols, and other warlike arms. This is the charge of the indictment; and these matters are in the bill: for the bill does charge him with compassing and imagining the death and destruction of the king, with adhering to his enemies, by consulting and agreeing with several persons at several times, to send Charnock to the late king James in France, to invite and encourage the French king to invade this kingdom with armed forces, and promises to join them, and assist them with men and arms.

Then the bill does take notice of other matters, that sir John Fenwick hath protracted his trial, by giving assurances to the king to make a plain discovery; by reason of which he did not come to his trial; and now one of the witnesses against him is withdrawn. May it please you, Sir, this is the charge as it stands before this honourable House; and the evidence we shall charge him with, will be of this nature; we shall give you an account, that the latter end of May, or beginning of June, sir John Friend and Charnock, and several other persons, met at the King's Head, and upon that meeting they consulted how to invade this kingdom; and they concluded in this, that they would send Charnock into France; and he was to propose it to king James, that he should procure 8,000 foot, and 2,000 horse and dragoons; and upon their landing they were to join them with 2,000 horse. After this they had another meeting; for Charnock, to be sure of the matter, would have another meeting; and then he proposed it to them, Whether they continued in the same resolution? And they all then declared, particularly sir John Fenwick, That they did approve of it, and stuck by it; and that Charnock should go for that purpose to France. Charnock, in pursuance and execution of this treason, does go to France, and brings back a message, that the matter had been communicated to the French king; but at that time he was not ready for them, and could not spare his soldiers, and his troops. Then it rested for some time, till towards Christmas, when sir George Burley came into England, and he brought with him a detachment of about sixteen; and their province was to assassinate the king. But there was another part, and that was the invasion; and in that part was sir John Fenwick concerned, which we shall produce our evidence to prove upon him; but it does fall out, that we have but one witness to this matter that we can produce pro voce; though when this indictment was found (for it was found upon the act last sessions, which required two witnesses to each species of treason) we had two; but one is since withdrawn, and that is touched in the bill, as in truth the fact is. Now, if sir John Fenwick had come on in the ordinary course of proceedings to be tried, sir John Fenwick might have been tried upon this indictment, for then Goodman had been there; but he procrastinates his trial, he makes application to the king, and gives him assurances from time to time of an ingenious discovery; but instead of that, when Goodman now is withdrawn, these assurances have terminated in this counter-terrible confession that hath been laid before the House, and is charged in the bill.

But, Sir, to supply this, we shall produce the examination of Mr. Goodman; we shall prove to you not only the evidence that hath been given upon this indictment, upon which he hath been arraigned, but also the evidence which hath been given upon the trial of Cook, who was convicted upon that evidence. We shall go by these further steps in the case, and humbly offer it to the consideration of this House, how far sir John Fenwick will be affected with it; and that is this; here hath been Goodman, and captain Porter who still stands his ground; but they have tortured him with 300 guineas in hand, and 300 more was to be remitted to him upon his first landing in France, with assurance likewise of king James's pardon, and likewise 800*l.* a year; 100*l.* a year whereof was to be settled by sir John Fenwick. This proposition sprang from one Clancy: it could not be expected that sir John Fenwick should appear in his proper person, but he did by his lady, who was with captain Porter, and gave him assurance of all that was proposed by Clancy, that that should be performed, and a great deal more.

We shall further give this account, That when sir John Fenwick was taken, there was a letter handed to a third person; and it appears by that, that he thought himself at that time not safe, unless they could corrupt the jury: for, says he, we must now get two or three stomach persons that will starve the rest. These steps we shall proceed upon, and begin with the indictment, and call our witnesses to it.

M^r. Lovel. Mr. Speaker, I shall not repeat what hath been said; because I know what hath been materially said cannot pass the observation of this House. The method we desire leave to proceed in, is the method you have prescribed us; and that is, first to prove the allegations of the bill. And that we shall make appear to you by undoubted proofs, that sir John Fenwick does stand indicted for these treasons at the sessions at the Old Bailey, the 28th of May, upon the oaths of Porter and Goodman; that we shall prove by records, and that is not capable of any contest or denial. We shall also prove, by matter of record, that several who were concerned with sir John Fenwick in this conspiracy have been tried and established; and then we shall call a living witness to prove sir John Fenwick guilty of treason in the highest manner. Mr. Tolson, deposing in the indictment of sir John Fenwick. [Which was then read at the table.]

Serj. Lovel. The bill does charge, That he stands indicted upon the oaths of these two, captain Porter and Mr. Goodman; besides, I must beg leave to observe, that by the act of parliament made last sessions, it is enacted, That no person shall be indicted unless upon the oaths of two witnesses: had not these witnesses been sworn before the grand jury at that time, this bill could not have been found according to that law, nor would sir John Fenwick have pleaded; but he hath been arraigned, and pleaded; so that we submit it to this House, that it does appear upon record, that this indictment was found upon the oaths of two witnesses. Besides that, two witnesses are subscribed to the bill. Now that other persons have been indicted, and convicted upon the same evidence, we shall prove, and that likewise by records.

Serj. Gould. I thought when we came to give you an account of the absence of Goodman, then to have given you an account of this, and other matters.

Mr. Speaker. You will agree upon your method, gentlemen: who do you call in the first place?

Serj. Gould. Captain Porter, Sir. (Who being present). I desire, Mr. Speaker, that he will give an account of what he knows concerning this matter as also of what is charged in the indictment.

Mr. Speaker. Captain Porter, the House requires you to give them an account of your knowledge of any conspiracy, by sir John Fenwick, against the king and this government; and likewise of your proceedings upon the indictment against him for high-treason.

Capt. Porter. About the middle of May was twelve months, there was two consultations, one at the King's-Head in Lendenhall-street, and the other in Pall-mall; these two consultations were for the considering of the best means to bring the late king James into England again: for it was said, that king William being gone beyond sea, he had left but few forces, and therefore they thought they could not have a fitter opportunity than that juncture; upon which they pitched upon Charnock to go into France, and make some proposals to the late king James, to borrow 10,000 men of the French king, whereof there should be 2,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons; and it was proposed, when they came over to meet them with 2,000 horse.

Mr. Speaker. Where was this?

Porter. Our first meeting was at the King's-head in Lendenhall-street; after that, Mr. Charnock desired another meeting, and there we met at Monstrey's in St. James's, and there all stood to what we had before resolved, That he should go over to king James, and make this proposal; and that if he could get so many men of the French king, we would meet him with as many horse.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, you say the first meeting was at the King's-head in Lendenhall-street: who was then present?

Porter. There was my lord Aylesbury, my lord Montgomery, sir John Fenwick, sir John Freind, sir William Parkyns, Charnock, Mr. Cook, and myself; we dined there, and after dinner Mr. Goodman came in to us.

Mr. Speaker. Did sir John Fenwick hear this discourse?—Porter. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Speaker. Did sir John Fenwick consent to it?

Porter. He did absolutely consent to it. Sir John Freind did propose it; says he: Do not let us propose more than we can bring.

Mr. Speaker. Then you say you had a second meeting?

Porter. When we agreed upon this business in Leadenhall-street, capt. Charnock desired another meeting, to know if we continued in our resolution; and the next meeting was at Mrs. Mountjoy's; I think then my lord Montgomery was not there, nor Mr. Goodman; but there was my lord Aylesbury, sir John Fenwick, sir John Freind, sir William Parkyns, Mr. Charnock, and myself.

Mr. Speaker. How long after?

Porter. About eight or ten days, to the best of my remembrance.

Mr. Speaker. What was said at that meeting?

Porter. The second meeting was to agree to the same thing: we desired Charnock to go as soon as possible to acquaint king James, that the sooner he came that year, the better.

Mr. Speaker. Did sir John Fenwick consent and agree, at the second meeting, to his going into France to procure the forces?

Porter. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker. Will you give the house an account of any thing else you know, relating to this matter?—Porter. That is all.

Serj. Gould. Was you examined by the grand-jury, when the Bill was presented against sir John Fenwick?—Porter. Yes, sir.

Serj. Gould. What evidence did you give to them?—Porter. The very same I give now.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serj. Gould; what have you to say further to him?

Serj. Lovel. We would ask, whether Mr. Cook was at the first meeting?

Porter. Yes, sir, he was at both meetings.

Serj. Lovel. Was Mr. Goodman at the presenting of the bill of indictment at the Old-Bailey?

Porter. I saw him go in to the jury, and he told me it was for the same thing.

Serj. Lovel. We have some of the jury here, and we will call them to that.

Serj. Gould. Now, if it please you, sir, we will ask him the matter concerning Chanoy's tampering with him.

Mr. Speaker. Will you give the house an account of this matter?

Mr. The Poet. By your favour, I hope you will give us leave to interpret in this matter: for I am sure in the case of life, and in cases where there is a law prepared to be made subsequent to the fact, to condemn any man to death, you will not only have good evidence, but that which is legal evidence. And I take it, that in cases of this nature, or a subsequent fact, the evidence ought to be much stronger, and much fairer than when a man is to be tried by a law in being. If they should offer that which was said in the great case of my lord of Strafford, (which attainder there hath been an act of parliament to reverse) by a gentleman that did then appear against my lord of Strafford, That where the house proceed in a legislative way, there needs no evidence at all: but every man may follow the dictates of his own thoughts and conscience: (It is in Roshworth's Collections, fol. 377.) Yet, I hope, you will be of another opinion, and expect stronger evidence, than if a man was to be tried by a law in being. Now that which is offered now, cannot be allowed in any court of justice: they were going about to shew, that my lady Fenwick, the wife of the gentleman at the bar, that she had used some means to take off Goodman's evidence, and they would make use of that against her husband. Now, what any man's wife says cannot be made use of against him, as nothing that she says or does can be made use of for him; and by the same rule of justice, it cannot be made use of against him: for otherwise the rule would be unequal. That she might be a witness against him, but not a witness for him; that seems so unjust, that it will not be admitted in any court whatsoever.

Sir Barth. Shower. By your votes the prisoner is allowed counsel, and the king's serjeant is to produce the evidence against the prisoner: that phrase of evidence makes us believe, or at least to hope, that you will give us leave to object to that which is not so; and in this I appeal to the knowledge of the gentlemen on the other side, who hath had a great deal of experience of this kind; and I am sure, in all his observations in the Old-Bailey, he cannot say this was ever admitted in case of treason, say not in felony, the actions or sayings of other persons; and I must confess I wonder to hear him move it now.

When attempted on behalf of a close prisoner, that was not visited by any body, it was not admitted that the actions of a third person at large, should be admitted against him: There the actions of a wife cannot be evidence for, nor against her husband. It was never but in one case, and that for sodomy, allowed, and that was after two or three witnesses besides had been produced; and by the opinions ever since, it hath been allowed not to be law: and that for the economy, the danger might follow in cases of matrimony and families. Now they both do concern the acts of other persons, and not sir John Fenwick. Besides I have one objection more, and that is, There is no such thing alleged in the bill; and, with submission, you have declared, that they should produce evidence as to the allegations in the bill, and the crimes in the indictment; but I cannot find any order that they should produce evidence concerning the carrying away of any witness: and it is not alleged, that Goodman is withdrawn by sir John Fenwick's private that the matter's being tampered with, there is no other proof suggested in the bill; so that this matter being in the bill, nor being evidence at all, it cannot be surprised very much by it, if it should be admitted.

Ser. Speaker. You hear the exception, What say you to it?

Ser. Gould. I think what these gentlemen say, will receive a plain answer. They have made an objection without answering the subject matter; it is an allegation in the bill, That Goodman hath withdrawn himself. Now the use we make of this is, to let us in to give an account of what Goodman hath sworn, and to entitle us to read his examination: For, say we, he hath been tampering to stifle this conspiracy, to take off the king's evidence. For nobody doubts of the execrable and wicked conspiracy; and it is as plain, here hath been two witnesses to prove it; and as plain, that this indictment is found according to the late act of parliament, upon the evidence of Porter and Goodman. Now, to shew this conspiracy is carrying on, we offer to prove the tampering that hath been to take off the king's evidence, and to lay that before the consideration of this house; so the use we make of it, is only preparatory to let us in to tell you what Goodman hath sworn, and in good time we shall produce to you an indictment, where, upon his very oath and upon the same evidence as we offer here, another of the traitors hath been convicted; and therefore we humbly offer it whether, as this case is, we shall not be admitted to prove this tampering?

Ser. Lovel. Before we withdraw, I beg two words as to what is objected on the other side, for the learned gentleman appeals to me: and I must appeal to the knowledge of some members, that are learned in the law, and to all, that even in criminal cases, courts are not bound up to positive evidence, but that the evidence of circumstances, and some persons to corroborate them, is admitted? And if it should be so, that nothing but positive evidence should convict, we should have very few convicts at the Old-Bailey; as to clipping and coining, where one is convicted by positive evidence and direct proof, forty are convicted and attainted by circumstances, as materials found about them, and getting off counterfeiting-money. Sir, I must submit to you, whether, as the nature of this case is, this house will not think fit to hear all evidence that may concern this matter, whether certain or circumstantial; and the wisdom of this house will distinguish afterwards, what they think material, and what is not. We mistake this to be part of the same conspiracy we do charge the prisoner at the bar with, that he might not come to condign punishment; and therefore we pray, that let the proceedings in other places be what they will, that you will hear the whole matter in this case, whether the evidence be positive or circumstantial.

Ser. Parn. I think they mistake us when they give us an opportunity, and that don't not that there is positive evidence and circumstantial; but we suppose this to be no evidence at all. Mr. Recorder tells us true, That circumstantial evidence is frequently made use of; but we say, that whatever my lady Fenwick hath said or done, is not to be admitted as evidence against the prisoner at the bar; because what she hath said by way of endeavour to draw off Goodman, is no evidence at all to be offered against her husband, and is not so much as circumstantial evidence.

Sir Barth. Shower. We do agree, if the bill had been brought in against my lady Fenwick or against Clancy, that had been proper evidence; and they did, and may deserve punishment for it themselves: but this is no evidence against Sir John Fenwick, that is here.

Ser. Lovel. We think it is properly before the House, even by the order of the House itself. For in the first place, we are to speak to the matters contained in the bill. One matter is, That Sir J. F. had been tried before now but for reasons mentioned in the bill; and that he delayed his trial till such time as Goodman was withdrawn; therefore what he before us by the direction of the House, is, that till such time as Goodman was withdrawn, Sir J. F. did pretend to go on to make a discovery, and afterwards put it off with what is charged in the bill: But say they, What is done by my lady Fenwick, is no evidence against him. When all the circumstances are laid before the House, what dealings there was with Captain Porter, and what was said at that time, and the consequence presently after Goodman's going away, I hope it is as much evidence as the case will bear.

Sir R. Temple. Sir, I desire they may withdraw.

Accordingly they withdrew.

Sir R. Temple. I think it much concerns the honour of the house, when a prisoner is at the bar, that he should be allowed the right of an Englishman; what you do here, may be a precedent in after ages: You are told what is offered as evidence here is admitted in no court, and the answer that is made to it, is of no force at all: they tell you there is no allegation in your bill, that Sir John Fenwick had any hand in his withdrawing, nor nothing in the indictment of it, and for that reason the evidence seems improper; and if it was, this would be no evidence at all; for the oaths of other persons is no evidence against the prisoner, to make him guilty of any thing.

Lord Cuffs. I think it is agreed already, That the counsel for the prisoner should not meddle with the authority and jurisdiction of this House: For if we are to be tied up to all the forms and manner observed in inferior courts, then to what end is the prisoner brought here? I think evidence ought to be admitted, that may clear every man's conscience, that this bill against Sir John Fenwick ought to pass.

Mr. J. Hume. A gentleman said, We are tied to the forms of inferior courts; but though we are not tied to the forms of inferior courts, we are tied to that which was the ground of them, and that is, right reason and true verities: they have alleged that he was induced; nobody doubts it. That Goodman is withdrawn, nobody doubts it. But what is that to sir John Fenwick? It might be with a design for good or evil to sir John Fenwick. My lord Jeffries said, at my lord Delamere's trial, (as I am informed) that one witness, with good circumstances, was enough to convict a man of high-treason. And I am told, it was told him then, that if they ever met him in the House of Lords, he should answer it with his head. I desire you would ask captain Porter, when he comes in, whether this was discoursed before dinner, at dinner, or after dinner? And whether he knows that Goodman heard this or no?

Chas. of the Excheq. There seems a particular biasness to know the truth of this matter, I mean in the counsel the other day: the gentleman says, That Goodman might be withdrawn to the prejudice of sir J. F. as well as for his good; I desire you will not let the government be so stigmatised. You have given leave to the counsel to examine to any thing that may be added to the Bill; for upon a commitment, I can move you to put any thing that shall be thought reasonable.

Sir Tho. Dyke. It may be a reasonable thing to enquire why Goodman is withdrawn? But the question is, Whether this be a proper time? The House is not tied to the common forms, but they are tied to the common rules of equity: and the question is, Whether the House will permit any person to suffer by the acts of another?

Sol. Gen. (Sir John Hawles.) It is discretionary, whether you will determine that this is evidence now, or after you have heard it. I cannot tell at whose trial it has, but I won't enter upon the legality of the thing; it is one thing when a man is to be tried by a jury, and another thing when he is to be tried before judges. A jury may be so swayed and possessed by it, that it may not be fit for them to hear it: but look into the court of Chancery; and there depositions, if one side say they are evidence, and the other side say they are not, are every day admitted; and the rule is, that it is sooner dispatched by hearing of it, than not. You do not sit here as a jury, but as judges, and will consider how far the actions of a wife shall concern her husband; you will do the prisoner right, and yourselves right, if you will hear them.

Sir W. Windington. The question is, Whether the King's counsel—

Mr. Speaker. Let me set you right; they are not here as King's counsel.

Sir W. Wind. Very well; but in this House you are the judges and jury too. The evidence that is offered, is to induce you to believe that he is guilty; and the gentleman that speaks last will not allow it to be a legal evidence. Then the question is, Whether you, being judges of the fact as well as of the law, should be afraid to be induced to believe a fact, by that which is not legal evidence? Suppose my lady Fenwick had had the design, and had told her husband what she intended to do, and he should have said, he scorned it: this is possible, if you go to supposing; and that he might apprehend it would do him a mischief. Now it can be to no purpose to hear this evidence, unless it be to satisfy the House, in order to attack the prisoner. No, but say they, Let us hear, and we will judge afterwards? Why so? It cannot affect the prisoner: and if any person hereafter have a mind to have my lady Fenwick punished, they may examine it.

Mr. Sloane. The gentleman that spoke last hath made one supposal; let me make another. He supposes, that it may appear by the evidence, upon the examination of witnesses, that what my lady Fenwick or Clancy did, was contrary to the direction of sir John Fenwick: if the evidence happen to be so, it is nothing. But we may suppose again, Suppose it happens, that it appears by the evidence, that it was for the benefit of sir John Fenwick to the greatest degree, to get away one of the witnesses; 'et cui bono,' is the strongest presumption to me I do allow, in Westminster-Hall, that a woman should not be a witness for or against her husband; but if she be directed by her husband, 'Qui facit per alium, facit per se;' you do not sledge all the evidence in the indictment, that runs in general; if the evidence differs as to time and place, ye may find him guilty of the indictment.

Lord Norwiche. Because I would not willingly go upon suppositions, I desire the clerk may read the question that you have passed the last day, to examining evidence. [Which was accordingly read.] Now I desire to know, whether this be treason within the indictment, or any of the allegations of the bill: otherwise, I think you have tied yourselves up by that rule.

Mr. Pelham. I did expect the gentleman that spoke lately would have cleared the matter. He gave you a distinction between the proceedings of Westminster-Hall and the Court of Chancery. I am ignorant of both. I desire to know, Whether we are to go here by the proceedings of Westminster-Hall, or the Court of Chancery. If we are not tied by those rules, we may let ourselves into any evidence that will induce us to believe him guilty or not guilty: if we are tied to those rules that are observed in all courts of justice, where trials of treason are had, this can be of no validity: so I desire to know, whether we are to go according to the proceedings of those courts, or whether we may proceed as the Court of Chancery?

Sir Tho. Littleton. The honourable member that spoke last, desires to know, Whether we are bound by the rules in Westminster-Hall, in their proceeding, or not? I believe it would have been to very little purpose to have thought of this bill, if those courts could have convicted him. I believe, if the counsel had tied you to that, proceedings of Westminster-Hall, and therefore that you could not have proceeded on this bill, you would have taken notice of them, and recommended them for saying so. I know not what to say to the proceedings of Chancery in this case; but I suppose upon this trial, you will inform yourselves by the best methods you can; and every man, according to his judgment, be for or against the bill. If upon what I have said, I am of opinion he is notoriously guilty, I shall freely pass the bill. If I do so much as doubt that he is guilty, according to the old rule, 'Quod dubitas ne facias,' I shall not be for it; and in order to this, I am for hearing every body that comes before us. It is said, that possibly Goodman is withdrawn to sir John Fenwick's prejudice. I would be glad to hear that; if so I shall have the worse opinion of the bill. They say, it is not alleged in the bill, concerning captain Porter's being tampered with; but it is alleged, that Goodman is withdrawn; and that it is not alleged that sir John Fenwick was privy to it; but it may weigh to gentlemen's judgments, how he comes to be withdrawn. They that tamper with one witness may be thought like to tamper with another. They tell you, that the evidence of a man's wife will not weigh against her husband. It may be so in point of law; but if you think yourselves bound up to the strict rules of law, dispose of your bill presently.

Sir W. Cragton, You have been pleased to give leave to the king's counsel to prove matters against sir J. F. You have heard captain Porter upon the fact. If they had opened the justice, that sir J. F. was instrumental to convey Goodman away, I should have been willing to have heard it: but they opened it, that my lady Fenwick was instrumental in conveying away Goodman; and this ought in no sort to be admitted. An hon. gentleman of the long robe made a difference in the proceedings between the court of Chancery, and the courts of Westminster-Hall; but I would fain know, if a fact was stated, whether my Lord Keeper could determine the matter before a commission went to prove it. It is true, we are not tied to the forms of law, but we are tied to the forms of justice. I know no case where a wife is admitted to be a witness for or against her husband. In Brown's case, indeed, who took a woman away, and forced her to marry him; the question was, Whether she should be admitted? And in that case she was admitted as a witness, because the necessity of the thing required it; and there was no other way to prove, whether he had her consent or not. Another case there was of my lord Castlehaven, where from the nature of the thing it was admitted; for it was impossible there should be any other proof of it. But if my lady Fenwick be guilty of this matter, it must not be by way of imputation against sir J. F. They say you; they insist upon it as an imputation; that it comes to be a matter of consequence; and therefore, since the matter hath been fully stated to the House, as to what they would prove, I think we may now give our judgment upon it.

Mr. Boscawen, You are here in your legislative power, and are no more tied to the rules of law in examining of witnesses, than you are in giving of judgment; for you can give those punishments that never are given in Westminster-Hall. I am of opinion, that my lady Fenwick cannot be examined for or against her husband; but if he send her to solicit for him, it shall have some weight with me. Those that do not believe it from what he says, may give their judgment accordingly: I desire to know of this gentleman, if I do not believe it, whether I can give judgment against him? I believe a man's conscience ought to go with his judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I will read the Question: That captain Porter be examined to the attempt of taking off his testimony as to the late conspiracy.

[Which Question being put, it passed in the affirmative.]

Mr. Harley I suppose you will let the counsel of both sides have first done with their questions, and then there will be some questions proposed to you.

Mr. J. Howe. They tell you how that sir J. F. was indicted, and that Goodman is withdrawn; but there is one thing the counsel of both sides slip over, and that is, sir J. F. hath given in false informations; it looks as if they were agreed on both sides in that matter. I desire the king's counsel may be asked, whether they have any evidence of that matter?

Col. Crawford. Since I am mentioned in that paper—

Adm. Russell. I believe, though that gentleman was afraid that matter would have been passed over, yet that the gentlemen of this House that are therein named will take care, for their own vindication, that that matter should not be slipped over; I suppose the proper time for that is, when the evidence is over; I assure you, if nobody else will, I will.

[Then sir John Fenwick, and the counsel of both sides, and captain Porter were brought in.]

Mr. Speaker. Sir Tho. Powys, the House hath considered of your exception to the testimony of captain Porter, as to the point he was to be examined to, and they are agreed, that it is fit that all the evidence should be laid before them, and they can judge afterwards, whether it be material or fit to be allowed, or not. Therefore, captain Porter, pray do you give the House an account at large of what attempts have been made upon you, at any time to draw you off from your testimony, with respect to the late conspiracy.

Porter. I had a meeting with one Clancy, first in Mitre-Court, at _____, and afterwards at the King's-Head tavern, and the play-house; at those meetings he proposed to give me 300 guineas to bear my charges to France, and to send me a bill for 300 more; and likewise that I should be allowed 500l. a year.

Mr. Speaker. How long had you been acquainted before?—Porter. Several years.

Mr. Speaker. Did he tell you who he came from?

Porter. He said, he had been with — Fenwick, who desired him to make this proposal to me.

Mr. Speaker. How often had you meetings with him?

Porter. About seven or eight times.

Mr. Speaker. What satisfaction did he give you, that sir John Fenwick would perform the agreement?

Porter. He told me, my lady Fenwick and my lady Montgomery should meet and confirm every thing that night. The day before I was to go, I met with my lady Fenwick, who told me, my lady Montgomery could not come, because one of her children was fallen sick.

Mr. Speaker. What satisfaction did she give you, that sir John Fenwick would perform what Clancy had proposed?

Porter. She said, what Clancy had proposed should certainly be made good.

Serj. Gould. Did you receive any thing in part, in pursuance of this agreement?

Porter. I received 300 guineas of Clancy, and he promised to me a Bill of 300 more, which was deposited by — Fenwick in his hands, to be sent after me into France.

Serj. Gould. Pray, what letter was that he brought you?

Porter. He brought me a letter, and said it was writ by sir J. F. to king James on my behalf.

Mr. Speaker. Did he deliver that to you?

Porter. No; he delivered it to the gentleman that was to go with me, one capt. Donelagh.

Mr. Speaker. Why did you not take that letter into your own hands?

Porter. I had it, and read it, before it was sealed up.

Serj. Gould. Do you remember the contents of it?

Porter. As much as I remember was, He desired his majesty, by reason that my going away was to save my lord Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery, &c. to pardon what I have done.

Serj. Lovel. Who subscribed it?

Porter. It was not sir John Fenwick's name; but they told me, king James would know who it came from.

Serj. Lovel. How did you proceed after the meeting with my lady Fenwick?

Porter. The next night after that he had paid me my munny, and showed me the bill, and I was to go away the next day after; they said, the boat was provided.

Serj. Lovel. Can you tell whether the boat was provided?

Porter. They were taken up presently after.

Serj. Gould. We will now produce a record to confirm the evidence that he hath given you: this person hath been convicted for this tampering.

(Accordingly the Record for Clancy's Conviction was produced.)

Mr. Tho. Pears. I desire to know, Whether they offer this as evidence against sir John Fenwick?

Mr. Speaker. They offer to prove, that this very person hath been tampered with to take off his testimony; and they leave it then to the House to judge, who is most likely to be guilty of Goodman's withdrawing. They begin to shew you, there hath been an attempt to take off this person's testimony; you have heard the person himself to it already: so now they offer to read the conviction of Clancy to this matter.

(The Record of Clancy's Conviction was read.)

Serj. Lovel. We will prove this like solicitation hath been made by Mr. Dighton, who is solicitor for the prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Speaker. What is your witness's name?

Serj. Lovel. Thomas Roe: if you please, Sir, to ask him what endeavours hath been used by Mr. Dighton to make use of him, that Goodman might withdraw himself.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Roe, You are required to give this House an account of what hath passed between Mr. Dighton and you, in order to take off the testimony of Mr. Goodman.

Roe. About the middle of September last I had occasion to go to Mr. Dighton, to enquire, Whether the commissioners of the land-tax in Surrey sat; for I knew he was concerned in some affairs for that county: he told me, he did not positively know, but would speedily enquire. At the same time he took occasion to tell me, he knew it was in my power to do sir John Fenwick service. I asked him, What he meant by it? Says he, I know you know Goodman well, and it will be the better for you if you will tell me: I asked him, What he meant by that way of talking? He desired I would meet him some other time, and I should know further of his mind. Accordingly I did meet Mr. Dighton: says he, You know Goodman well, and if you can say any thing that can discredit Goodman's testimony, you shall have 100l. a year settled upon you for your life. Says I, Sir, I do know him well: says he, Did you never hear him talk of poisoning the duke of N. and robbing on the highway, and that he is condemned with dispena? Says I, I have heard him talk of these matters several times; but you cannot think I will be a witness, and expose myself, and disgrace people all I know for what. Says he, For that you shall be satisfied; you shall have 100l. a year settled upon you, provided you can discredit Goodman's testimony, that sir J. F. may come off, and it will be done by a friend of yours. We accordingly agreed to meet the next day at a coffee-house in the city, and appointed a friend to be there; but Mr. Dighton did not meet at the time; and then an information before a private justice; for if not so, we know not what authority he had to examine him: and then if so, Mr. Recorder knows, that in the Old-Bailey, if Goddman had said it had not been evidence; * in case he had been sick, or withdrawn without our privy, they could not have read it; nay, if he were withdrawn by our privy, it could not be read: it is true, the inciting him to withdraw had been punishable in another man, but could not have been read to have convicted the party; and since this examination could never have been read there, and if it must be unjust, and hath not been practised, I hope you will not do it now.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, what do you say to 't?

Serj. Gould. I observe this gentleman's objection, why this examination should not be read; and, under favour, we think we are regular, as this case is, to have his deposition read. It is true, as long as the witnesses can be produced, in all counts and practice of the law, you shall not read his examination, or what is taken before a justice of peace: but that is not our case; it is now fully proved before you, that he is withdrawn, and it is fully before you, that he hath given evidence for the king, and hath been examined, and this is an extraordinary case, and that is the reason we are in parliament: he hath sworn this matter, and before a proper officer; why then shall not his evidence be read and allowed when he is justly withdrawn, and we say, by the contrivance of the prisoner at the bar? And the thing speaks itself. Now, with submission, I take it to be every day's practice, that where an evidence is dead, his deposition shall be read. It appears to you, that there is to have been a trial, but the witness is withdrawn; and it appears plainly that he hath been tampering. The evidence is full in the case as to Porter; and we have produced a record of conviction that does confirm it: now this is such a practice, we come into parliament to have it remedied; for otherwise men shall commit treason, and by their contrivance and art the witnesses shall be drawn away, and the prisoner shall not be brought to condign punishment. Here is the record in which he gave evidence, and he is withdrawn; and therefore I hope in this case, we shall be admitted to read his deposition. I deny what the gentleman says to be the practice, and Mr. Recorder can give you a better account, who knows more of the practice of it, that if a witness is dead, they may read his depositions. We are here before you in parliament; and by the same reason that others have been tampered with, this witness may be presumed to be tampered with; and therefore we are in your judgment, whether in this case his depositions shall not be read.

Serj. Lowel. It is objected, on the other side, that this evidence ought not to be offered, and for what reason? Because, say they, a jury ought to go secundum allegata et probata, and what is not strictly evidence by law, you are not to take notice of; but in criminal cases (which is this case), where persons do stand upon their lives, accused for crimes, if it appears to the court that the prisoner hath, by fraudulent and indirect means, procured a person that hath given information against him to a proper magistrate, to withdraw himself, so that he cannot give evidence as regularly as they used to do; in that case his information hath been read; which, I suppose, with humble submission, is this case; but I suppose we are not here tied up to formal evidences; but it is our duty, since the house hath commanded, to lay the whole fact before you, and you are judges what is material, and what is not material.

Sir Tho. Powys. Please, sir, to spare me a little; for sure this is no small matter. I did expect that they, if they intended to have supported this evidence, would have mentioned some author, some case, or some precedent where this has been before: but he makes such a distinction, I am mightily surprized at; for Mr. Recorder cites no one instance, that ever he saw such a thing in his life; nor cites one book that hath such authority; but he gives you a distinction, whether it be of his side or ours, I must submit to you; for he seems to agree, that in cases of property, such evidence is not allowed; but in cases of life, in which we ought to be more tender, he says, it is to be allowed. Sure if it be not evidence where five shillings only may be at stake, I submit it to you, whether it ought to be admitted in the case of life? For my part, I know nothing of it, if it be a rule; but I always thought the evidence ought to be more clear and full in the case of life, than in the case of property; but Mr. Recorder turns it upon us, and says, Though it is not evidence in case where property is concerned, yet it is evidence in case of life: but I desire he will shew any one lawyer in England, that ever said it, but himself.

Sir B. Shower. I answer to what Mr. Serjeant Gould says: that this is an extraordinary case, I will not pretend to say any thing, you are the proper judges of that; we now oppose it in respect of the rules of justice. As to Mr. Recorder's distinction between civil and criminal causes; he hath admitted, that in civil causes it would not be allowed; and I hope you will be of opinion, that it ought not to be admitted in criminal. The jury must go secundum allegata et probata. I desire to know what other rules a jury hath in criminal cases? But they say, that a juryman hath not as much upon his oath in trying a prisoner for his life, as in trying an action of trespass. Is not the oath, 'You shall well and truly try, &c. according to the evidence you have heard?'

* "The evidence which a witness gave on a former trial between the same parties has after his death been read in a civil action: but this is not allowed in a criminal prosecution." Peake's Law of Evidence, chap. 2. s. 2. art. Depositions.

Now, I would know whether the form of the oath, which the wisdom of our ancestors hath thought fit to use for 1,000 years past, does not direct what shall be evidence? Evidence of prima facie must be evidence of living persons. I am speaking for the life of a man, and for maintaining the rules of law, which I hope shall continue for ever; and that is, that the examination of a person that is absent, shall not be read to supply his testimony. What you shall think fit to do here, we must submit to, but that it is allowed below, we must deny.

Mr. Recorder, Sir, I do, with humble submission, stand to what I said as to the definition of allegata et probata, in matter of property, we agree with them, but as to allegata et probata, in matters criminal, we must differ with them. I did say it before, and do say it again, with submission, that in many cases criminal, there need no positive evidence at all; and yet the jury, according to allegata et probata, in that case, may convict a criminal. And I do say, with submission, that where there is no positive proof at all, yet in that case, many criminals are, and still will be convicted. I did instance before in the case of clipping and coining, which are matters so secretly practised, as it is very rare there can be any positive witness to prove the fact: what is then the method? Why, we go by circumstances, by information of other persons, by tools, and other instruments that are found, and though nobody ever saw them do the thing, yet they are convicted. We do not offer this evidence to be as concluding evidence as if Goodman was here; but a corroborating evidence of what captain Porter hath said. If it did wholly depend upon this evidence, it may be it might have no great weight; but since there is other evidence in voce, and since you have been pleased to order us to lay before you all the evidence, we humbly offer it to you, and pray it may be read.

Mr. Manley. I humbly pray they may withdraw.

Mr. Speaker. If you please to withdraw; but first I am required to ask, if on both sides you insist upon this point?

And the Counsel for both sides declared, they insisted on it. [And then withdrew.]

Mr. Manley. I should not have presumed to have given you this trouble of their withdrawing, but that a thing is insisted on by the counsel for the bail, which I think is of the greatest consequence to all the freemen of England. It is true, the rules of Westminster-hall are not binding to the legislative power; but I would not have the legislative power to be governed by the private errors of any man. Moreover, but by those rules that are the rules of justice and common equity. God forbid that we should, upon suggestions, suppose ourselves out of all the rights of the law. I have heard any gentlemen of the long robe, before the learned judges at the bar, assert, that an examination before a justice of the peace could be read against a man for his life. It is known to all that have looked into the A B C of the law, that it was never practised. It is true, in equity, dispositions may be read, because they are taken by the consent of all parties; and it is as well a deposition of one side, as of the other, and the witnesses may be cross-examined: but that is nothing to this purpose.

Mr. Moore. I believe I may save you a great deal of trouble in this matter; for those gentlemen from the bar that made objections, spake without book, but I speak by book; [having my lord chief justice Hales's Pleas of the Crown in his hand.] No less a man than my L^d C^{hief} Justice Hales (and I think he was past his A B C of the law, I know not how far this gentleman is advanced), in his Pleas of the Crown, in that part where he shews what is evidence to the petit jury, he says, First, by the statute 1 and 2 Philip and Mary, c. 13, and 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, c. 12, the justice hath power to examine the offender and informer, and so he goes on in several particulars: and then, 5, he says, these examinations, if the party be dead or absent, may be given in evidence. I must allow, such an examination not of the same authority, as if the witness was present it would be, because he is not to be cross-examined, but still it must be of some weight, and it must be read: but in this case, it is of greater weight than in that which my Lord Chief Justice puts, for he says, it would be evidence, if the party was dead, or if he was withdrawn without the consent of the party against whom he is a witness, and that comes to the case in chancery, every day practised, that if any person gets my deeds and evidences into his hands, and he hath embazled the deeds, they shall be presumed to say what I alleged, because it is his fault he does not produce them. So this withdrawing by the instigation of Sir J. F. is a strong presumption that what he swears against Sir J. F. is true.

Sir Rd. Temple. No man can give evidence of any depositions, nor was it ever admitted to be evidence either upon the party's death or absence; and I would not have that doctrine pass, that we are not tied to the rules of law. My L^d C^{hief} Justice Vaughan, when he was of this house, told us, we were not bound to the forms of law, but we were tied to the rules of law; and if you are not, how will you judge of this crime? How will you judge it to be treason in the worst of times? In the trial of my lord Mordaunt, who was tried before the high court of justice, they would not allow of this piece of evidence, though they had the same side juries. We are tied by the rules of law, or we are tied by nothing.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The worthy member here tells us, we are tied by the rules of law, or we are tied by nothing. I hope, he does not intend to put the question us, that was by a noble lord, (You are, then, by rules or, no rules; if you are tied by no rules, what rules are justified by it. I think you may act by rules, and yet admit of this evidence. I told you before, I should not reckon myself so tied by the rules of law, but that I would hear all evidence that should be offered; and I do not think it is for our honour to stifle any thing that may bring out the truth. A worthy lawyer said, let them produce one evidence that is of the recorder's opinion; and a member hath produced the opinion of my L. C. Justice Hales; and I hope we shall not be debarred from the satisfaction of hearing what they might hear in the courts below. Here are two witnesses that have been examined against him, which the jury did believe that found the bill. If we cannot have these two witnesses, let us have as much as we can. We have heard what one said; we have an opportunity of hearing what the other said. No, says the gentlemen, we do not desire to be informed; but I believe it must come to that at last.

Sir Rd. Temple. The gentleman that spake last, insinuated, as if I had dropped something he could not understand. Give me leave to tell you, there was the courts of the presidents of Wales; when they urged rules of law, then they were a court of equity; and when they argued from points of equity, then they were tied up by the rules of law; and so gave judgment neither according to the one nor the other; and so it was taken away by act of parliament.

Mr. Boscawen. I have seen it myself, that a justice of peace has been examined himself as to depositions he hath taken; and I take it to be an ordinary examination.

Mr. Harcourt. Sir, I must say, if you were to pick all the absurdities out of the trials in the last reign, you could not pick out more than has been endeavoured by the king's counsel to be imposed upon you this day: this does in some measure convince me of what was said by another gentleman the other day, that it is much better to be tried by an assembly of 400 gentlemen, than at the Old Bailey. There was a quotation of a learned author; and the gentleman read you what was evidence, and what was not: and the conclusion was, That these depositions, if the party was dead or absent, is evidence. Why, sir, if these depositions be evidence if the party be absent, then what are we doing of all this day? If that be a certain rule, there is no manner of need of applying to this extraordinary way; but if you please to enter into the consideration of that point, I am neither afraid, nor unwilling to be informed. If gentlemen will take a de bene esse, for better for worse, with all my heart; but if you enter into that matter, I will freely tell you my opinion of it.

Mr. Edm. Heynder. It hath been made a question, how far you are bound to pursue the rules of law? I suppose it to be now this, I am going to say. That Bills of Attainder, and judgments of attainder, have been reversed for many reasons, but because the parliament have not proceeded according to the rules of law: I will not say, you are bound by the rules of inferior courts, but you must be bound by the rules of parliament, and by the proceedings and practice of parliaments, which is the law of parliament. And then I would know whether this house did admit of an affidavit for evidence? and the reason is this, because by that you make this, which is the superior court, lame, without the assistance of an inferior court.

Mr. G. R. Bridges. The matter before you is, whether sir J. Fenwick be guilty, in your judgments of this conspiracy? and if so I cannot imagine why you should not take all the information that is offered to you; and why not hear all the circumstances of it? If you do not read this affidavit, I do not say but it is a kindness to sir J. F. but what kindness will it be to the country and government?

Mr. James Montague. I hope you will not spend much more time about this, because the law is so plain. If there be any thing in the objection, it is this, That if it be evidence, the other courts below may proceed upon it: but that I take to be no objection neither; for though it be evidence, there are not two witnesses; and the courts below require two witnesses though there be other evidence, and one witness besides; so that you can't try him without two witnesses: it would be admitted in the case of felony, and there two witnesses are not required expressly by the law: and I can tell you, upon my reputation, I have seen it done several times.—The learned gent. tells you, my L. C. Justice Hales's opinion is so, and that is grounded upon an act of parliament; and I think that is of greater authority than any judge; and therefore I think that objection will vanish. He says, you have no authority to receive affidavits; but sure we must take notice of acts of parliament; and if that requires depositions to be taken, and to be evidence against criminals, we ought to take notice of it; so that what the law makes to be evidence will be good in this place.

Mr. Harvey. I look upon this matter under your debates to be of the greatest consequence to the lives of the subjects of England, that possibly can come before you: gentlemen have given you several reasons for reading these depositions; one, that it was my L. C. J. Hales's opinion; another, that there is an act of parliament for it: now, I think, it would be proper to join issue in these two points: If any act of parliament can be produced for this, then the debate will be at an end; but if there be no positive law fact against it, then I hope, you will not receive it: and if my L. C. J. Hales's book have not one word relating to this, then I hope that will be no argument. He begins the chapter of evidence, and says, That the evidence to the jury, in cases of treason, must be two witnesses; and then comes to the cases of felony. But whether any debate before us? and he tells you, that information might be taken of the person himself, but that was not by the com-may be run upon by ill governments, and attempts made upon their lives by false witnesses. But the bill of treason provides, that no person shall be prosecuted without two witnesses. Now it may happen, that they shall have no such witnesses as can convince a jury (I believe this man to be as much guilty, in my own thought, as I believe any thing in the world, and yet I will condemn no man upon my private fancies); but here are two witnesses brought before the grand jury, and nothing is so easy as to get a bill found by them (and that is all that is done by Goodman). Now say they, if this should come before a petit jury, one of these witnesses may not be credited; so they will carry him away, and urge this for a precedent, and so this man may be convicted.

Mr. Smith. I think we are come to the debate of the bill, instead of reading the paper. Was the question, Whether this paper should be allowed as a second witness? Then it would be a great question with me, whether it should be read; but the question, as to Col. Sidney, was not whether the paper should be read, but whether it should supply the place of a second witness? But your debate is extraordinary; your bill takes notice of Goodman being gone away, and now you won't take notice of what he hath left behind him; which I should the rather be satisfied in, because I saw a gentleman soliciting at the bar, that did endeavour to get him away. If Goodman had been brought a prisoner to the bar, I do not know, whether it might not have been reckoned as great a fault, as now his having too much liberty. It hath been cited as a great lawyer's opinion, that it might be given in evidence; but he does not say what weight shall be laid upon it.

Mr. Pelham. I am sorry that honourable gent. mistook me so much; I thought I had spoke very plain; I told you, I was not against reading of the paper, till the learned gent. told you, you were not tied up as the courts of Westminster-hall to two witnesses. As to what I said of Mr Sidney's case, it was not against the reading that paper; but I said he did rely upon it as against common justice, to be attained upon one witness: And that attainder you have thought fit to reverse; and the reason he gives for it was, because it was impossible for a man to make any defence against one single witness.

Mr. Gen. The matter you are now debating upon, is, Whether these papers should be now read? And gentlemen have let themselves into a debate foreign to the question. A great many are against it upon this argument, that they would not be of opinion to condemn him, unless there were two witnesses: That is not the question, for I think no man is ready to give his opinion on condemn or acquit him, unless there were two witnesses: One gentleman is against the reading of it, and yet believes sir J. is guilty. I remember to say, and I am sure all I have heard his defence, I think that the count against him is at the bar, and very much taken, when they said, that such a thing as an examination in writing was never read in any court of justice. I think that is a great mistake, and a good authority hath been cited for it; and every one knows the practice is otherwise; it is often allowed, that the examinations before a justice of peace are read. The question is now, Whether the examination shall be read? If there do not appear another witness to prove him guilty, you will debate that matter then, Whether you will condemn him without two witnesses? You might as well have debated before whether Porter should be examined, because no man will condemn him without two witnesses, and therefore do not examine one. Why, we know not what further witnesses may be produced, if sir J. P. was upon his trial; I think this information might have been admitted for proof, if Goodman was out of the way; but if it was admitted, unless there was another witness produced, I believe the court will tell the jury, here are not two witnesses, and therefore you must acquit him.

Sir Wm. Coryton. I must crave leave to differ from that worthy gentleman: I think this is the proper time to determine, whether this evidence is to be admitted afterwards? Indeed you may determine how far it is available. I thought both in law and justice, before I came into the House, that this ought not to be admitted for evidence. A gentleman grounded his argument, upon what? My L. C. J. Hales's opinion: but the fact is, that my L. C. J. Hales states, the difference in cases of treason, and in cases of felony. Now in felony, they make use of depositions; and the reason is, because it is more for the advantage of the prisoner than his disadvantage; for if the witness differ from his examination before the justice of peace, that turns to the advantage of the prisoner. In the nature of the thing it seems not to be reasonable, for it is easy to turn the tables. And suppose Goodman in the place of sir J. F., and sir J. F. in the place of Goodman; it would be hard, take the informations to be as they are, to admit them for evidence; which, in my opinion, are great reflections upon persons of great honour and worth.

Sir Ch. Maser. That which I perceive to be your debate, is that upon which the counsel withdrew; you hear it asserted, that there was no instance in a criminal case, where an affidavit was allowed for evidence; and I think the learned counsel at the bar did not much insist upon it; and yet I don't think they were ignorant of the case quoted out of my L. C. J. Hales; but they thought it was not applicable to this business before the House; but only related to felonies, and when depositions were taken in the presence of the party. It is said, we are not tied up to the rules of Westminster-hall; and that parliaments may denounce crimes after they are committed; but I never did hear, that the parliament did take upon them to determine that to be evidence which is not evidence in any court of the world. If you read this paper to inform yourselves, you admit that to be evidence which is no evidence, else it be admitted. You are told, you are not tied to the forms of inferior courts of law nor equity. If you are not bound by them, you are bound by your own constitutions. You are told, you are used to read affidavits in common causes; but if my memory serves me right, you have always had it opposed in this court; therefore I think, according to the rules of your own house, we shall not read affidavits. Will you make a new rule in this case? Pray consider the consequence of it hereafter. Suppose there came down affidavits upon another person, against a great man for high treason, whether that may not be thought sufficient for to govern your judgments? I hope those that hear me will have a care of the matter. Why, by the parity of reason, may not two affidavits do by the help of the legislative power. I would be glad, to know, whether in the case of an impeachment, they ever heard of affidavits being read? And this is much in that nature; and therefore, why should you admit of an affidavit now, when the party charged was not present when that affidavit was taken?

Sir Joseph Williamson I am sorry this point costs us so much time; the gentleman that spoke last hath brought us to the question, how far you will admit this affidavit, as they call it, to be read? I am of opinion, notwithstanding all that hath been suggested, that it not only may be read, but that it ought, to be read. None of the cases that have been instanced, comes up to the case in question; all the cases that are brought are from inferior courts, and the last that is brought is from the example and usage, in less considerable cases, and indeed of a different nature—This bill of attainder is indeed a thing so extraordinary, as hath been said, as it never ought to be used but upon extraordinary occasions; and upon that principle, all that is feared is all answered and avoided. It is to be thought never to come but upon the like occasion; and then God forbid but they should be governed by the like precedent; and if that was proper to speak now, which will be at the bottom of it, when we come to give judgment, and we have time to consider of it, I can't think we shall differ in many voices. Whether it be evidence, and how far it is so, is not now the question; but the question is only whether it be such an evidence as ought to be read? And all the inconveniences that have been alledged, depend only upon this, that it should not be admitted in the ordinary proceedings in the courts of justice. Now I say, there was a power lodged in the parliament of England to make a man guilty of treason, that was not at home; and that even in a reign when they came to determine what treasons were; they did not think it for the safety of the community of mankind, but that there should be a power lodged in the whole, to declare that to be a crime, that was no crime before it was conmitted, giving them more than is asked here; for here can be no question, but as to the forms of proceedings. The question is not upon his crime, that is no question; and I take it, that if upon any occasion, it is to be justified in this, and the law hath trusted the parliament with a greater power than now they are about to execute, and there are only objections to it raised from another place, which I think can never conclude in this.

Mr. Chanc. of the Exchequer. I am for reading of this paper, though I do not think it evidence equivalent with viva voce; nor do I think, that in like cases it ought to be admitted below; but I think, in your proceedings in parliament, it ought to be read, whether it be an affidavit or not; and I am more of that opinion, from what happened in a case to-day. We had a dispute, whether Porter was to be examined, because the testimony of a man's wife was not good below. But when that came to be examined, it was not the testimony of a man's wife, but his own letter appeared in evidence, and Clancy told Porter he came from Fenwick himself, and therefore the evidence, which at first, for that reason, was urged not to be heard, did amount to more when it came to the proof. I would have this paper read, not because it should supply the place of a witness; no, but because you see he hath been indicted by the evidence of Goodman and Porter, and the first is withdrawn; and by whose means you have heard. and I would know, whether Goodman's evidence did amount to accuse him of the same? I do say, in your power of judging, you are not constrained to the rules of Westminster-hall and I would say, that for your constitution, the courts of Westminster-hall are to be governed by the letter of the law but there is lodged in the legislative a power to judge those crimes that are sheltered behind the law and I believe, if the several attainders were examined, there was never any attainder that went upon a more just proceeding than this. I take the crime to be a plot with your enemies to bring in a foreign power; and as if that was not sufficient, he hath made a false and scandalous confession, to bring a distrust and jealousy among the king and his people; and he hath dilled and gained so much time, as he hath had opportunity to corrupt one of the witnesses; and therefore it would be hard, if no law should reach him. It is said, why did not you keep the witness? It would be hard, after a person hath made a confession for the good of the kingdom, that he should be always kept in prison. We are debating of the bill, while we are now only purely to see what law this paper, I should not have offered to have made use of this as a second witness; but the being an affidavit or not, is not material in this point; the common proceed open impeachments without affidavits. It is offered as evidence: that Goodman was a witness against him (you have had proof of); and that he hath been tampered with, to withdraw, by the friends of this gentleman. I do think we have gone more fairly and equally to work, than upon any of the records of attainder in your journals.

Mr. Brotherton. The question is, whether this paper shall be read? First, it hath not been proved before whom it was taken, nor nothing at all. It hath been objected, that there ought to be two witnesses by the late statute. But I must put you in mind, that it was so by the statute of Edw. 6. and so was the common-law before; and my lord Coke says, there must be two witnesses, and they brought face to face; and so goes to the divine law; and if it should not be so, I will put you in mind of an inconvenience: eleven witnesses were produced before the grand jury; and when they came to give evidence face to face, before the petit jury, the first witness did not know the criminal that he had sworn against. It was in the case of sir Rowland Stanley. They mention a paper against Algernon Sidney; but that paper was wrote by himself. It is said, this House is not bound by the rules of other courts; for that reason they ought to give rules for other courts. Nothing is more common than to say, judgment was so in the House of Lords, and that settles the law in other courts below.

Sir Godfrey Copley. Several gentlemen have spoke to the reading this paper; some have said, that it should be read as evidence: some others are for reading of this paper; but yet at the same time tell us, it is not to be looked upon as evidence, at least not equivalent to a witness. If the paper be to be read at all, I would know for what reason? If it be to have any sway upon our judgment, if it hath any effect upon my judgment, then in some measure it is equivalent to a witness, when it is in the nature of a witness; and if it should be read to supply the defect of a witness, then I would know, what the consequence of this might be? I do very well understand, that the court of parliament does take no precedent from Westminster-hall; nor am I afraid of any precedent they should give to Westminster-hall; but I am afraid of a precedent to future parliaments. Suppose the information of sir J. Fenwick, that hath been delivered in here, should be produced as evidence against any of these honourable persons that are charged in it, though I believe they are very innocent; and some knaves or rascals in future reigns should come in against them, and this paper should be brought to supply another witness, what a consequence would that be!

Sir Henry Robert. I must differ with the gentleman that spoke last; as to the gentleman that spoke before, I did not expect any thing to be quoted out of Lancashire against the reading of it. I will tell you why I think this paper should be read; you have it suggested in the bill, that Goodman was one of the witnesses against sir J. F. they are to take good the suggestion, and then will show, that Goodman was an evidence. You are told the danger of the precedent, and that may come in reigns, and in parliaments; as to that, I shall only say, in a good reign, and a good parliament, there is no danger; and in an ill reign, and in parliament, they will make precedents without your giving of them. Mr. St. John tells you in his arguments, it is true inferior courts, by the statute of Edw. 6, they are bound by two evidences vis a voce; but you are not prescribed by that here, but you are to judge in your own consciences as the thing appears. I may say as another did upon another occasion, let it be read; 'Valeat quantum valere potest.'

Sir Marmaduke Wynnell. I desire to take notice of one argument that hath been made use of by one or two honourable persons; which is, that they tell us, that Goodman hath been tampered with by sir J. Fenwick: I remember no such thing that hath been proved; but indeed it was said, that Mr. Dighton offered Mr. Roe 100*l.* a year to invalidate Mr. Goodman's testimony.

Lord Castleton. Let me ask you this question, Whether if you read this affidavit, you read it as evidence?

Mr. Solicitor General. I desire you would consider what you did, before you ordered capt. Porter to go on with his evidence, and did agree you would consider of it afterwards. Some are for reading this paper, and others are indifferent whether it be read or no; and those that are against reading of it, are against reading of it because it is no evidence; but that is no reason why you should not read it; for it is at most but doing a vain thing. I think you have been told already if it was insisted on below, it must be read; and the other side must demur. The court might say, it is not material, but it must be read before they can demur; so that the question, Whether it is evidence? must come afterwards; and if you go according to the rigour of law, with submission, it must be read.

Mr. Price. I did not design to trouble you in this matter; but the doctrine laid down by some men of our gown, surprises me: it is only an argument, that the court below ought to admit this paper to be read; but there is no precedent showed, nor convincing reason given, why the courts should admit it. The question is, Whether an information taken before a justice of peace, ought to be read here? If it be to introduce a new law, and make a new crime, then you make a new sort of evidence; but if this be a crime against an act of parliament, or law in being, then you must take the evidence the law doth afford you, in the nature of the crime. The charge here is a charge of treason against a known law; but the great argument is this is an extraordinary offence; that sir J. Fenwick, or his lady, had a hand in sending Goodman away: it is a mistake; and offering one thing that is not evidence, brings us to another; the evidence of Clancy's tampering with him: captain Porter does not say, that sir J. F. employed him; only that Clancy said so, which is not a hearing, and that is no evidence, unless Charles was at the bar, and would say so. In the next place, I'm said, That there was a summons by a solicitor: what is that? Is it necessary for a solicitor to say, Is there any objection to such a witness? Is it not sufficient for him to lessen his reputation if he can? Now you would have a copy of an information to be evidence. It is said it is tantamount. If so, then the courts of Westminster ought to intermeddle with it, and not this house. A noble lord mentioned to you the law of nature, the law of nations, and the law of God; but he forgot one law, which was most material, and that is martial law; which, if he had said, does justify the taking away a man's life upon extraordinary evidence, he had said right.

Mr. Speaker. The question is this, That the information of Cordel Goodman, taken upon oath, 24th of April, 1696, be read.

Which question being put, the house divided. Yeas, 218. Noes, 145. So it passed in the affirmative; and sir John Fenwick, and the counsel and solicitors on both sides, were called in again.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, since you withdrew, the house have considered of the matter upon which you did withdraw, and they have thought fit, that the information of Cordel Goodman, taken upon oath before Mr. Vernon, 24th of April, 1696, be read.—Clark, read it.

Clerk of the House of Commons reads.—
This is signed, Cordel Goodman, and sworn 24th of April, 1696, before James Vernon.

“About two years since, or better, I understood col. Parker was resident here, in order to engage several people for the service of king James; and capt. Porter told me, he had a mind to see me, which he accordingly did; where he told me, there would be an invasion, and king James would be restored; and that in order to it he had commission to levy men, and to grant out subordinate commissions for a regiment of horse, and did ask if I would accept of one, which I accordingly did. He likewise said, he would see me as often as he could; and then capt. Porter and I should receive directions from him, from time to time, upon several meetings; and having received my commission, I understood what captains were to be in the regiment; which were captain Porter, or William Parkyn, Mr. Charnock, or Hugh Smithson, Mr. Higgins, and myself; and one Mr. Witherington, to be lieutenant colonel.

“The commissions were to be taken when they were to be delivered, and to be filled up by the captain, Mr. F then came acquainted with Mr. Charnock and Mr. W. Parkyn; and then when Mr. Charnock and I were together, that there was a great body of horse coming to the army, but though I asked for they never named any person to me, but said, it was sufficient, I should receive orders, and a roll to march, to rendezvous upon occasion; and indeed I did not much press it, because I did gather there were a great many concerned; and at this time capt. Porter and I took a house in the Chase, with stables and barns, fit for holding horses, and as a fit place to meet upon orders given us to march, which were then daily expected.

“Some time after this col. Parker was taken, and being committed to the Tower, he made his escape; and after that I saw him, and then he told me, he would be sure to correspond with me and Porter; and I should receive his letters of Mr. Charnock or Mr. Johnson, and he accordingly did; and in his letters he still gave us hopes, and said, he would certainly send us notice to be in readiness time enough, to be serviceable to the design of the invasion.

“The last letters I received from Parker gave me advice, That he doubted not, but the cause would come to a hearing at this Easter term; and he should write no more, but bring the orders himself: Upon which I went to Charnock, and he told me he did expect him here in a short time: But always, or most commonly, in his letters, he told me, for a sign, That when the Toulon fleet should join the Brest fleet, I might certainly depend, that we should be invaded here.

“During these transactions, capt. Porter complained, that something he was sending to Lancashire had miscarried; he desired me to set by two boxes, which I looked not into, but supposed them to be arms, and I did set them by for him: I had not bought any arms, but had bespoken some of one Perry, a gunsmith, who said, I should have them at a week's warning.

“After Parker's having made his escape, and getting into France, Mr. Charnock came to me, some time before the king's going to Flanders, and said, he had something to propose to me; and desired me to go along with him, which I did; and he brought me to one Mr. Waugh, who said, he expected a commission from king James to seize king William; accordingly we went to the Chocolate House in St. James's street; and after some discourse about the commission he said he expected, we appointed another meeting at that place, and agreed from thence to my house in Brownlow street, where was present, Mr. Charnock, Mr. Porter, Mr. Waugh, major Matthews, and Mr. Brough. The subject of our discourse was, about the surprising and seizing the king, as he came from Richmond; and after several ways proposed to that purpose, I particularly asked, suppose that the king were in our power, what then? For we ought to have regard to some end or other in such an undertaking; for I was not willing to suffer any thing to his person. Mr. Waugh said, we might have a coach, and convey him away; and he said, he was assured of a fort to be delivered to him, and put into his hands, to the best of my remembrance it was Dantz, which might give us shelter till we might find opportbe given in evidence against a man for the least crime: soever. It cannot be given in evidence to be admitted, because it is but an accusation; and, by consequence, whatever any witness says, at that time can go no farther. When a person comes upon his trial, they cannot so much as resort to any thing that is sworn before the grand jury, nor make use of it.

Sir B. Shower. We humbly oppose this evidence; because the gentlemen can give no instance in their reading or observation, that the testimony that hath been given before a grand jury, hath been given in evidence to a petit jury: and it is part of the oath of a grand jurymen, that it should not be disclosed. We do not say, it will bind your House; but I hope it will be evidence to you, that it is not agreeable to the rules of law.

Members. Go on, go on.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Gracedue, will you give the House an account, who were the witnesses before you upon finding the bill?

Gracedue. The witnesses before us were captain Porter and Mr. Goodman.

Mr. Speaker. Can you remember so well, as to give an account to this House of what evidence Mr. Goodman gave?

Gracedue. Yes, I think I can. When he came before us, he told us, that he was at a meeting at the King's head in Leadenhall street, where there was sir J. Fenwick, my lord Montgomery, capt. Porter, Mr. Charnock and others; and the business was to send Mr. Charnock over to France, to procure men to invade this kingdom; and 8,000 foot, and 2,000 horse was proposed. He told us, the result of that consult was, that if France would supply 8,000 foot and 2,000 horse, it would be a sufficient power to come over; and that they would supply 2,000 horse among themselves. Upon which Charnock replied, gentlemen, you send me over upon uncertainties; you say, you will supply 2,000 horse; but unless you give me some assurance, I cannot, nor will I go. And the question was proposed to all of them, if they would make good their proportion; and they promised singly. Says I, did sir J. Fenwick promise? And he said, Yes. Says I, did my lord Montgomery? And he said, Yes. He was asked, who else? But, says he, it is not a question for you to ask us; and for that he referred himself to me: for, he said, he was not bound to answer further, having proved the indictment.

Serj. Lovel. We desire Mr. Joshua Meade may be asked to the like purpose. Were you one of the jury that found the bill against sir John Fenwick?—Meade. Yes.

Mr. Speaker. Pray, who were the witnesses before you upon finding of the Bill?

Meade. There was captain Porter, and Mr. Goodman, Sir.

Mr. Speaker. Can you remember what Mr. Goodman testified then?

Meade. Mr. Goodman did then testify, that sir John Fenwick, my lord Montgomery, &c. were at the King's Head tavern in Leadenhall street; and Charnock and the rest there did consult how to bring in their old master; as to Charnock, that they agreed to send him over to king James, to know whether the French king could furnish them with 8,000 foot and 2,000 horse, and that they would endeavour to meet him with 2,000 horse. Hereupon Charnock (Goodman said) put it to every man of them, to know if they were all of one mind? And they all said they were. This he did prove, and this is all I can remember.

Serj. Lovel. We have many more to the same purpose, if the House think fit to hear them.—Members. No, no.

Serj. Gould. We will go thus much further; that upon the trial of Mr. Cook, wherein there was evidence given by this gentleman, and in that this gentleman that is the prisoner at the bar was particularly named to be concerned, we will call them that were present there at the giving of the evidence: but first, we desire to read the record of Cook's conviction.

Thereupon a motion was made for the counsel to withdraw; and being withdrawn, a motion was made for candles, which passed in the affirmative without a division, in regard it being dark without candles, there could be no motion made for adjourning the debate, or remanding the prisoner.

Afterwards a motion being made for adjourning the House till to morrow morning, the house divided. Ayes, 141. Noes, 163. And so it passed in the negative; and sir J. Fenwick, and the counsel and solicitors, were brought in again to the bar.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, the last evidence you were about to offer was, that of the record of Mr. Cook.

Sir T. Powys. Mr. Speaker, we oppose that being offered as evidence; as I understand it, they are going to give in evidence against sir John Fenwick what was sworn against Mr. Cook; that is not admitted in the courts below; for according to that method, the trial of one in the company would be the trial of all the rest. This was never allowed in any other case, and I hope you will not allow it here.

Sir B. Shower. The indictment is, that they did consult together, but their crimes are several; if they had been mentioned in one indictment, and one had been tried at one time, and the other at another, it would not have been allowed that they should give in evidence against the one, what had been sworn against the other; for though their charge is by the same witness, and for a fact done at the same time, yet the defence of the parties may be different; and it cannot be expected that we, on the behalf of sir John Fenwick, are prepared to give an answer, in regard of any thing that was sworn against Mr. Cook.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, you hear the exception.

Serj. Gould. We hope in this case we shall go on with our evidence, as offered and proposed to this House. These gentlemen have made their objections, as if they were below in the inferior courts; but we are here now before you in a parliamentary way; and what is that which brings us here, but because there is a witness withdrawn by artifice, so that we cannot produce him? And therefore we come, and humbly apply ourselves to this honourable House. Now, Sir, you are judges of the method of coming at the truth, and supplying that defect: if we could produce him, there would be an end of the matter; but in this case we are in the judgment of this honourable house, whether we shall not give such evidence as he hath given upon his oath, though in other cases it is not admitted?

Serj. Lovel. When we produce the record of conviction, we only produced it to shew you there was such a trial; and by that means to let us in, to shew you what was sworn by Mr. Goodman at that trial.

Then upon the motion of Col. Granville and sir R. Temple, sir J. Fenwick, and the counsel and solicitors, withdrew.

Sir R. Temple. If I did not believe what is now offered, if what was never offered before, and of dangerous consequence to every one here, I would not have troubled you at this time of night. There has nothing been offered that this hath ever been done. They say, it hath not been done in inferior courts: pray, let us see if ever it hath been done in parliament, that what was given in evidence at another trial, should be given in evidence against another person here, when this person was not by, and had no opportunity to defend himself against it; I am sure it was never done yet.

Sir T. Mompesson. This gentleman complains this was never done. When the duke of Monmouth was impeached, the bill was read three times in one day, and that gentleman moved for the impeachment.

Sir R. Temple. Here were three witnesses that did declare they saw him in actual rebellion, at the head of an army; but I hope I am not to answer for all the proceedings then.

Col. Granville. When I saw them going on to make use of that as evidence, which was never allowed in any court, I thought I ought to move for them to withdraw. I shall not give my consent to have it read, until somebody satisfies me it is good evidence against sir J. Fenwick. I cannot see how you can admit this for evidence: are we to read all the trials that are upon this plot? therefore I desire you will bid them produce what is evidence against sir J. Fenwick, and not to trifle with you.

Sir T. Littleton. If you proceed in this manner, I know not when you will have done. They do not tell you, they produce this as evidence against sir John Fenwick; nor do I take this to be the only evidence to prove him guilty. If nothing but exact proof would have satisfied, this bill would not have been brought in: but this is to make as good proof as the nature of the thing will bear. You have heard several things before, in relation to Goodman, that possibly might strictly be no more evidence against sir J. Fenwick than this; as Goodman's being withdrawn. First, they offered to prove that he was gone; that it was suspicious that sir J. Fenwick was privy to his going: why did you admit the evidence of what he said to the grand-jury? What is this, but to give evidence of what he said to the petit jury, wherein the grand-jury and petit-jury have both believed him?

Mr. Harley. I think if you had come to one determination before you had entered upon this matter, you had very much shortened your business; that is, that you would not expect such proof as is necessary at law; and it may be, if you would come to it now, it would save you time: for I find by the counsel, that what is sworn against another man, at another time, would not be evidence at law against the prisoner; and I believe it he should except to a jury-man, because he was upon Cook's trial, it would not be allowed as a good exception, and he would be told, he was no way concerned in another's trial.

Mr. Howe. It is a strange sort of evidence that is offered here, and it is a strange way of bringing it in. The house made nothing lately of hear-say, and yet now hear-say must be taken for evidence. I have heard that the grand-jury take an oath not to discover what was sworn before them; this, since the grand-jury have subjected themselves to (yet you have brought them here as witnesses to give an account of what was sworn before them, which I am afraid is a breach of their oath), it shall make me give less credit to what they say. We are here to attain a man, but we must not talk of proof; that is a strange thing! I am sure, if you do not find it with proof, it would be against proof. Shall I be plain with you? I question, if this house had heard what Goodman sworn at that trial, and what was alleged against it, whether this house would have been of that jury's mind: for I have heard that two or three did swear, he was not at the place at the time he swore he was, as plain as a negative could be sworn.

Mr. Harcourt. If you please to let the king's counsel go on upon this, you will save a great deal of time, and prevent any exception to any evidence afterwards: for it is not in the power of man to offer any thing more absurd. I don't believe that ever any man heard of such a thing offered, that a record should be given in evidence against a man, that is no manner of party to the record: I am sure never any such thing was attempted before. As for the other things, you had something offered that made it seem doubtful how far you should give credit to them: Upon those matters, the counsel at the bar for the king told you, that there was some pretence that it was law, and practised below, and a book was produced to justify it: but in this case, if there be book, practice, precedent, or any thing to justify it, I will sit down. The answer made it ten times worse.

the gentleman said, he would not have the record read, but upon that record to prove what was sworn at the trial: why, does that concern any person in the world but Cook?

Lord Cutts. If the worthy gentleman that again last had made out all his propositions with clearness, equal to the assurance with which he asserted them, they would have more weight: but I will say, that which he hath asserted, does not appear to me so. I take this to be the same thing, in some measure, debated over again. It hath been told you, that this house are to give their judgment in a matter of great importance; and therefore I think it is fit that all the whole matter should be laid before them; when that is done, they only are the judges of what weight it is.

Mr. Sloane. I go along with these gentlemen, that this is no sort of evidence against sir J. Fenwick: but our question is about a witness that is withdrawn, and to know what he said, and how he was believed when he was here. How he is gone, we have seen already; and therefore though I think the verdict against Cook, nor nothing of that can be given in evidence against sir John Fenwick; yet if he hath withdrawn the witness, and the credit of him is at stake, as you have heard evidence of what he said upon oath before the trial came on, by the same reason you may hear what he said at the trial.

Mr. Pelham. I think it would shorten our debates, if we were truly satisfied about what we are a-doing, that we are trying sir John Fenwick, as we are told at the bar; he called it a trial, and it is a trial. I must confess I was in hopes I should never sit in the House of Commons to try any body; I did not think it the business of us; if I had, I would not have come hither: but since we are come into it, is any thing more natural, than to examine whether this evidence be proper, or such evidence as any court would allow of?

Sir W. Williams. I suppose there is no gentleman of our profession that hath seen any record, will say, that this hath been offered in any court of law: I believe, if he was upon his trial upon the indictment, nobody will say it would be read against him. Let us consider how many judgments, that have been given hastily in the late reigns, have been reversed. What is the reason that is given for it? It is far receiving that for evidence, which was not evidence in the law: Your bill of right takes notice of it.

Sol. Gen. I did not think this matter would have held you a quarter of an hour; but if gentlemen will debate upon the same matter that hath been over-ruled twice before, all that is to be proved by this record is, that one Peter Cook was attainted for high-treason; if the counsel on the other side would have owned Peter Cook to have been attainted, you had not been troubled to have the record brought to the table. But as to what they say, that sir John Fenwick was no party to the record, and therefore it can be no evidence against him, I suppose it would be evidence for him. Suppose Goodman had sworn he never had been at the King's-head-tavern, would not the prisoner have produced a witness to prove what he had sworn? Then I would put you in mind of a case, because there is a nicety in this matter without any reason; it was in the trial of alderman Cornish; he was indicted and tried, and the great fact was in the house of one Shepherd; there was a witness against him, one Rumsey, who swore, &c. says Mr. Cornish, he was a witness at my lord Russel's trial, and he did not name me to be one; and it went so far, that when Shepherd said, I was in the room; he stood up and said, No, it was read before I came in. Mr. Cornish would have produced a witness to have proved what Rumsey said: says the court, we cannot admit of that; for it does not appear to us, that my lord Russel was ever tried for high-treason; and there, upon that alip, was that gentleman destroyed. I pray it may be read; I have given no opinion of what force it is, but I think it depends upon the same reason; nay, you have more reason to do it, than any thing you have read to-day.

Mr. Price. It is very much pressed that you should read that, which, when read, they say, is not evidence, but only to introduce another matter. If it be not evidence, upon what account shall they read it? But if it introduce other evidence, this is an ingredient and part of that evidence. Now suppose the record should be produced, and they should bring witness to say what Goodman swore at that trial: would that be evidence? No sure, for nobody ever pretends that this hath been admitted either at law, or in parliament. By what law? By what rule? By what measure of reason are we to proceed in this house? If you would permit to be produced a record of conviction against a third person, and this to be evidence against one that is not present, I think you may as well admit to be produced a record of the conviction of any other concerned in the assassination. But I stood up principally upon the observation made at the bar, and he put you that which he takes to be a sinister case; for, says he, suppose sir John Fenwick had brought this record, and made use of it to take off Goodman's testimony, should it not be evidence? Yes, no doubt of it; and there is the distinction. It is one thing, where you are to give in a record to convict and attain a person, and another thing, where it is to prove a man perjured, and to invalidate his testimony; for when evidence is brought against a prisoner, he hath no way to lessen his evidence but what is collateral; if it be upon a trial when another is concerned, if the witness gave a contrary evidence, or the party was acquitted, then the record may be made use of against the witness: but it differs very much, where you bring evidence to take off the credit of a witness, and where you bring it to convict or attain a person. The case of Cornish, that turns upon the same reason, and it was only to be used to take off the testimony of Ramsey; but if this record of the conviction of Cook be brought to any purpose now, it is to satisfy your consciences; that Goodman gave a good testimony at that trial; and I wonder the sergeants should offer it, who are sworn to offer nothing in violation of the law.

Dr. Oxenden. If I did not think this question had been determined before, I should not trouble you in this debate; for did not we receive what Goodman deposed upon oath before a justice of peace? Was it read because it was taken in writing, or because it was his evidence? Now they offer you an evidence of his that was not put into writing, but they will prove by witness; what is the difference? If it had been taken down in writing, it must have been admitted as the same was before.

Sir M. Wyvell. That worthy gentleman desired to know the difference, &c. That deposition was against sir John Fenwick, but this evidence, that they offer now, was given against Peter Cook.

Att. Gen. You are now upon a debate, Whether you shall read the conviction of Peter Cook: I do agree with those gentlemen that have spoke of this matter, that the conviction of Cook, nor any evidence upon his conviction, can be evidence against sir John Fenwick. I do not pretend that this is; nor do not believe that this is offered upon any such consideration; but it is one of the allegations of the bill, that several of these gentlemen were present at this consult, of which sir John Fenwick is accused; therefore, I suppose, the counsel for the bill did offer this record to make good that allegation, and so think it may be properly offered: unless it be admitted; I do not see how it can be made good further; I do not think it proper to examine to what Goodman swore at Cook's trial.

Sir W. Williamson. I speak only to shew my concurrence with the attorney-general; Mr. Attorney hath stated it right, no doubt, as to the conviction of this person; as Mr. Attorney offers it, it may be proper enough.

Members. Call them in, call them in.

Sir C. Musgrave. I hear gentlemen say, call them in: Do you intend when you call them in to read this record? I think the learned gentleman hath stated it, that it ought not to be read as evidence. Now the counsel for sir John Fenwick said, they hoped you would not suffer it to be read as evidence against the prisoner: I never heard the counsel say, that Cook was not attainted, nor ever heard that any man did doubt it; then if it be no controversy between the counsel, to what end is it brought hither? Do you think that the steps that are urged to be taken in this case, will not be a precedent for posterity? I take it that there is great deal of difference between the paper you have read and this record; and therefore, if you call in the counsel, I hope you will not gratify them in reading of it.

Mr. E. Harley. Before you call the counsel in, I humbly propose it to you to consider to what purpose this record should be read; if as evidence, you overthrow all the course of proof that is settled by the common law, and statute law; for it hath been in all trials opposed, to give in evidence that which is improper, because it should not influence the jury. I would not have it said, that under the reign of king William, any thing was done contrary to the law and constitution of the nation. There hath been an instance given of the trial of Mr. Cornish, though that case does not come up to it; but we know what was done in those reigns hath been justly reflected upon; and I hope you will not make a precedent here, to encourage to do what is against law.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, this is your question, that the record of the conviction of Peter Cook shall be read.

Which question being put, the House divided. Ayes, 182. Noes, 110. So it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, You have had another question that hath been the subject of your debate, That the counsel for the bill be admitted to give evidence as to what Goodman swore against Peter Cook.

Mr. R. Harley. The learned gentleman did tell you, That what Goodman said at that trial, ought not to be given in evidence; and therefore, I think, gentlemen won't insist upon that, that is carrying it too far; and, I think, he opened it, that it was only to prove that Cook was attainted, and to make use of it no farther.

Mr. Speaker. Is it then your pleasure, that sir John Fenwick and his counsel be called in?

[Which question being put, it passed in the affirmative, and accordingly they were called in.]

Mr. Speaker. Sir Thomas Powys, the house hath determined to have this record read, not as evidence against sir John Fenwick, but to prove the allegations in the bill, and that Cook was attainted. Read the Record.

[Accordingly that Record was read by the Clerk.]

Sir B. Shower. We are sure the Record does not prove that he was convicted upon Goodman's evidence.

Serj. Lovel. Look upon the indictment.

Sir T. Powys. It appears by that that Goodman was a witness upon the indictment; but it does not prove by that, that he was a witness upon the trial.

Serj. Gould. May it please you then, Mr. Speaker, thus far it is agreed, that here is a record of the conviction of Cook; and it is agreed, and the record speaks it, that Goodman was a witness, for it is indorsed upon the indictment. Now the main dispute is, whether Goodman's evidence did prevail to convict Cook upon that indictment? And for that we shall apply ourselves. Call our evidence, some of the jury, and some that were then witnesses, and they will give you an account upon what evidence that conviction was.

Sir T. Powys. In what you were pleased to acquaint us at our last coming in; you were pleased to give such a reason in relation to the reading of this record, that if we had heard it before, we would not have troubled you to have it withdrawn; for it was proper to make out the allegations of the bill, and that Cook was convicted; but, we apprehend, they can carry it no further than what they have applied it to. But I perceive from hence, the gentlemen of the other side are encouraged to proceed to another piece of evidence, such they call it; they are going to call the witnesses to prove what was sworn at the trial of Cook, where sir John Fenwick, nor no person on his behalf, was present, either to hear, or observe, or cross-examine, or offer any thing to their credit, which possibly he might be furnished with, though Cook was not: I hope that will be no more allowed of as evidence here, than in any other place.

Sir B. Shower. We humbly oppose their calling of witnesses to give this account of the evidence given at Cook's trial. And we submit it to your consideration, whether you will think it just, that the evidence that is given with respect to one man only, shall conclude another person that stands at the bar in defence of his life, or that it shall be given against him. Every man's defence is several: and we opposed the reading of the record before, and so do now the calling of any witnesses to this purpose, for the same reason.

Serj. Lovel. We call these witnesses for no other purpose, but to prove that Goodman, what he did inform by that paper, he did swear before a jury.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you must withdraw. [Accordingly they withdrew.]

Mr. Manley. I thank God I have that regard for the laws of England, and to every Englishman's life, that when I see any thing attempted against it, I must give my testimony against it: I did not believe they would have insisted on it, for there was a gentleman that sat near to you, who in the close of his debate, I thought, had satisfied every body, that this was a thing that ought not to be read; if they should do it, it would be a thing of dreadful consequence; if you should admit of every thing these gentlemen that come in for the bill offer, I know not where it will end. How will it appear that upon Goodman's evidence the jury found Cook guilty? For they might find Cook guilty, and yet give no credit to Goodman; for he was contradicted materially, and there might be other evidence upon which they might find him guilty, and yet lay aside the evidence given by Goodman: but whether one way or the other, we cannot tell. They tell us, we are not to be guided by the rules of Westminster-hall; but we are to be governed by the rules of justice; and we are not at this time to seek a way to the king's favour, by voting against a criminal for high-treason.

Mr. Sloane. There is no manner of doubt of it. That that gentleman is in the right, who tells you, If this indictment and conviction of Peter Cook stood singly, as to sir J. F. it is no evidence; and if they will produce Goodman now, it shall be no evidence against them; but take the case as it is, here is a witness, who hath given me satisfaction, that it is one of sir J. Fenwick's friends or agents (which is the same thing as if done by himself) by whose means this witness is withdrawn: now the question is, What could this witness say, when he was here? What did he say? It is not conclusive, but it is material for you to hear what he did say when he was upon his oath.

Sir C. Musgrave. The gentleman of the long robe that spake last, was pleased to tell you, It is very reasonable that you should hear those persons, as to what Goodman swore at Cook's trial; I confess, I think this is harder than all the rest, because what you have hitherto admitted was in writing; one was an examination before a justice of peace, the other a record; but for any man to say, he can exactly repeat what any man swore at the trial, to me is wonderful: why, in his evidence, the least mistake of a word alters the nature of the thing, and therefore this would be a bold undertaking for any man; for if he wavers in the least circumstance, it is not true that he swore so: then this gentleman was no ways concerned in that trial; and to what purpose is it read, if not to the prejudice of sir J. Fenwick? I do not know but by the same rule, you may hear evidence of what any man hath sworn upon all the trials this three quarters of a year.

Mr. Sloane. I have been called upon to know in what cases testimony hath been given, that witnesses have sworn so and so at a former trial. It is every day's practice between party and party, that where a witness doth die, between the same parties (I will state the case fairly) it is given in evidence, that such a witness, at such a trial, did swear so and so; sometimes they take it in short-hand, and then they can tell the words of it; otherwise they repeat it upon their memories; but I will not strain it: but I put it with a further reason upon it, for we do not desire to hear it as conclusive evidence upon the prisoner, but only in this sense; here is a witness supposed to be carried away by the prisoner's means; and therefore, is it not necessary to hear what he said before he was deluded and carried away? Not that after it is heard, it is any conclusive evidence; but it is reasonable we would come at the truth, 'omnibus viis et modis, quibus mediis sciri poterit.'

Sir T. Littleton. A gentleman says, To what purpose should it be read, if it be not to the prejudice of sir J. Fenwick? On the other side, we may say, it is for his benefit; that is only supposing one way or another: I will hear any body to his benefit, and any body to his prejudice. Says a worthy gentleman, It is not done in criminal cases: why, in this case you have heard the grand-jury, what he swore before them already; and what objection is there more against hearing what he swore in another case, than against hearing what he swore upon the indictment? The main inducement for you to hear it is, because he is gone away, and cannot be heard viva voce, and with suspicion that it was by contrivance of the party.

Mr. Grey. I would speak but one word as to what the gentleman that spake last but one said; and that is, as to the courts below, That one man is allowed very often to give in evidence what another swore; it hath been so, and it is at the peril of any person that swears, that he swear truth; for he may be prosecuted, if he does not swear truth; but I would ask him, what remedy there is here, if he do not say the truth? We have no remedy against him, if he takes away this man's life by what he says here.

Mr. Smith. Truly, Sir, if I must give my opinion, I do think it is very reasonable that bills of attainder should be only upon extraordinary occasions; I think that, take it at best, if there was not a place where the witnesses are to be sworn, and more particularly examined, I know not whether I should give my consent for the passing of this bill through your House; for the witnesses against the prisoner are not sworn, nor the witnesses brought against them; so that we can only give our opinion upon the probability of the matter; for what that gentleman says weighs with me, that it is a difficult thing for any man to charge himself with what was sworn at a former trial; for the mistake of a word may alter the sense very much. We are told by a worthy gentleman, that there was two or three witnesses that did give such evidence against the testimony of Goodman, that it is a wonder almost how Cook could be found guilty: it is our misfortune that Goodman is not here; it would have been worth our while to have heard what Goodman could have said in his own defence; but since there are such witnesses like to be offered against Goodman's testimony, is it not reasonable that we should hear what Goodman said for himself?

Mr. Howe. Sir, I always thought it very reasonable, that you should hear any evidence that might tend to your information; but I think it is plain, that nothing can tend to your information that is alleged by any person that is not to be believed; that is to say, is not to be believed from the nature of the evidence, though from the most credible person in the world. I know not whether these witnesses are to be brought or no: but I have heard that Cook, after he was condemned to die, without any apprehension of his being saved, did, upon the Sacrament, declare, that Goodman was not upon the place at that time he swore himself to be there. I have heard since, that the same Divine that gave him the Sacrament, Dr. Wake, when he had confessed it, after he had made such a declaration, had such an abhor-rence of it, that he would go to him no more; but I cannot think we can have information from these persons, that I suppose did not think of giving evidence in this trial, and therefore did not take notice so particularly of what he said; and if so, it is losing your time to hear it.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, the question is this: that the counsel against sir John Fenwick be allowed to examine witnesses, as to what Goodman swore at the trial of Peter Cook.

Sir Godfrey Copley. I must confess it would weigh with me, if it had been made appear, that sir J. Fenwick had taken off any evidence, and I should be ready to apply it as well as I could; but I must needs take notice of what was said in this debate, that we had done as much as this comes to already: this makes me a little more apprehensive, and to take care what we do now, since what this House does hath so quick an operation. We are citing precedents of this very day already, and make one thing a hand to draw on another; and so they may easily be made use of in after parliaments.

Sir H. D. Colt. I believe no one gentleman doubts, that Cook was convicted upon the evidence of Goodman; if they do, I would know the reason of it; for upon the last act, there are to be two evidences to the same treason: there were but two positive witnesses against him for treason, and they were Porter and Goodman: I think, therefore, he was convicted upon the evidence of Goodman; what then needs any person to remember any particulars that passed at the trial, if they remember in the whole, that he was convicted by the evidence of Porter and Goodman?

Mr. Speaker. As many as are of opinion, that the counsel against sir J. Fenwick be allowed to examine witnesses, as to what Goodman swore at the trial of Cook, say, Aye. —Ayes 180. Noes 102.

[Afterwards the question of adjournment was put, and it passed in the negative; and several gentlemen that were against the bill, to about forty, went away together in a body; some of them having declared, that their health would not give them leave to stay there longer.]

And sir John Fenwick and the counsel were brought in again.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, the House do allow you to examine witnesses as to what Goodman swore at the trial of Cook; pray go on with your evidence.

Serj. Lovel. We call Mr. Collins, Sir. [Who was brought to the bar.]

Mr. Speaker. Was he a juryman?

Serj. Lovel. He was one of the petit-jury, Sir.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Collins, can you give the House an account of what was sworn by Goodman upon the trial of Cook?

Collins. To the best of my memory, I will give the best account I can. Goodman did say, that he came to the King's-Head in Leadenhall-street, and enquired for captain Porter, according as the captain had ordered him; and the captain came down and carried him up into the room where the gentlemen were. There was sir John Freind, sir Wm. Parkyns, Mr. Charnock, Mr. Cook, and sir J. Fenwick; there was two others, if you please to have me name them.

Members. Yes, yes.

Collins. My lord Aylesbury and my lord Montgomery: this was what he deposed.

Mr. Speaker. Go on, Sir; you have named those that were at the meeting.

Serj. Lovel. Did he give you an account of what was agreed on at that meeting?

Collins. I think it was about sending Charnock to France.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, you should repeat all the particulars, what Charnock was to do.

Collins. I cannot remember any thing further than what I have told you.

Serj. Gould. If you please that Mr. Cooper may be asked to this?

Mr. Speaker. Was you of the petit-jury that convicted Mr. Cook?—Cooper. Yes.

Mr. Speaker. Can you give the House an account what evidence Goodman gave to you for conviction of Cook, and what he said in that evidence?

Cooper. Mr. Goodman did declare upon his evidence, that he was at the Old King's-Head in Leadenhall-street, where he did meet with divers persons that were in consultation; he named Charnock, sir J. Fenwick, sir J. Freind, and divers others.

Mr. Speaker. What was the consultation?

Mr. Cooper. It was about sending Charnock over into France.

Mr. Speaker. To what purpose?

Mr. Cooper. To bring over forces, or encourage the bringing over of forces: that was the purport of his message.

Mr. Speaker. Will you produce any other evidence to this point?

Serj. Gould. We desire this gentleman may be asked to the same purpose.

Mr. Speaker. Was you one of the petit-jury?

Another Witness. There was capt. Porter, and Mr. Goodman, that were the two evidences; and Goodman did say, that he had been at the Old King's-Head in Leadenhall-street, one Cox's, and sir John Fenwick was there, and several other gentlemen, consulting of an affair to send over into France for some forces to be brought over into England; and that Charnock was the person, and they all agreed he should go over.

Mr. Speaker. But did he give you an account of what Cook and the others did agree to, upon which you found Mr. Cook guilty?

The same. We did apprehend that Cook did consent that Charnock should go over to France, and acquaint king James, that there had been a meeting of several gentlemen, and that they had made several offers of soldiers and people that were to be raised here, and to acquaint king James with it; and he declared, that sir John Fenwick was there at the same time.

Mr. Speaker. Pray, can you give this House an account of what exception was taken to Goodman's credit, and how it was answered?

The same. There was exception taken, that he was guilty of a great many crimes, and that he had his pardon; and the fines were levied upon him; but it was said then, that he had paid his fine, and that he was a very good evidence in the case.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, have you any other evidence to produce?

Serj. Lovel. If you please, Mr. Speaker, here is Mr. Tanner, the clerk of the arraignments, that best knows the nature of these things; that as to these objections that were made, it appeared to the court to be a contrivance, for he was never bailed, but discharged without any more to do. If you please that he may be asked, What objections were made to Goodman's reputation, and what answer was made to it?

Mr. Speaker. I did ask the juryman that; and I suppose you need not labour this point, unless the credit of Goodman comes in question here.

Serj. Gould. Then may it please you, Mr. Speaker, we have one other piece of evidence against sir J. Fenwick, which we are humbly to offer to your consideration, and I think it is very material; and it is some of the evidence which I did open in stating of the case, wherein sir J. Fenwick hath, in a manner, given a verdict against himself; for while sir J. Fenwick was working of his escape to go beyond sea, at that very time there was a letter written by him, directed to his lady, and delivered into the hands of one Mr. Fowler, who was to cause it to be delivered to his lady by one Webber, who was taken up when sir John Fenwick was.

This letter imports, That sir J. Fenwick looked upon himself as having no defence, but depended only upon a contrivance with the jury; they were to work with some persons of the jury, who were to stand it out, and to starve the rest; and so by that means to save him. Our evidence of this will be, that it fell out that Webber (we have him not here now, but have endeavoured it as much as was possible, but he is gone too out of the way), that he was taken at the same time that sir J. Fenwick was; but by reason of the protracting of sir John's trial, he comes, and is delivered, there being no charge against him; and he is, since his deliverance upon his Habeas Corpus, gone out of the way; but we shall, in the method of our evidence, produce you Mr. Fowler, the person to whom this letter was handed, who will give you an account of this letter; and then will produce this letter: to which end, we must humbly beg the favour of a worthy member of this House, Mr. Vernon, who hath this letter, that it may be produced, and shewed to Mr. Fowler.

Mr. Vernon. Sir, I received your order to bring the letter that sir J. Fenwick wrote, while in custody at Rumney, which was sent up to me by Mr. Mascall, who had it of Mr. Fowler; and, if you please, I am ready to deliver it.

Mr. Speaker. Who sent it to you?

Mr. Vernon. One Mr. Mascall, a justice of peace of Rumney.

Sir T. Powys. I hope now we shall make an objection to this letter with good authority. Surely for them to produce a letter, as sir J. Fenwick's, is not to be allowed as evidence, unless it was proved that he wrote it, because that sort of evidence was particularly taken notice of by parliament: and judgment given upon that sort of evidence, by comparison of hands, in the case of Mr. Sidney, and the act of reversal of his attainder does allow it to be illegal evidence. This is such an authority as, I hope will bear no dispute: and the courts of Westminster-Hall have since thought it so; they did so in the case of Crosby, who was tried the other day in Westminster-Hall.

Sir B. Shower. In this objection we have the opinion of inferior courts, and the parliament too; for the particular evidence Mr. Sidney was convicted upon, was upon a paper which was found, and proved by some who pretended to know his hand; and I am sure that is more than they can pretend to, and more than they have yet opened. We do therefore humbly oppose this evidence, it being in the case of the life of a man; and the king, Lords, and Commons, having declared, That this sort of evidence ought not to be allowed: and therefore, I hope, you will not allow it in this case. And in Crosby's case, upon reading the act of parliament, this evidence was not allowed, and Crosby was acquitted.

Sir T. Powys. I have a copy of the bill for reversing the attainder in my hand; and it says, 'The producing a paper found in the closet of Mr. Sidney, which was not proved by any witness to be his hand-writing, &c.' And, we hope, if in the judgment of the parliament that was not thought reasonable evidence to attain him, this will not be thought reasonable in parliament to attain this gentleman.

Serj. Gould. As this case is, we hope this may be a concurring evidence: it will be plain, upon the evidence we shall give, that Webber was with sir John, and taken with him; and at that time this letter was handed by him over to Fowler, to be carried to my lady. Now, Sir, we humbly offer it to your consideration, How far it is available, and what operation it will have? Whether, in a case of this nature, these two being taken together, and Webber delivers this letter to Fowler to deliver it to sir J. Fenwick's lady, and the import of this letter, concerns sir J. Fenwick for his acquittal; you will not suffer it to be read? It is not to charge him with a treason, for that is the case of Algernon Sidney: it is not to prove a crime upon him; but we will prove that sir J. Fenwick handed this letter over, that it might come to his lady; by which he desired his lady so far to work the matter, that some jurymen might be found to starve the rest, and stand out for him: if we could produce Webber, we would; it is plain, Webber corresponded with sir John, and was with him.

Serj. Lovel. I humbly beg one word in this matter: the counsel on the other side do very well know, the constant practice is, That in the case of a deed or will, let the value of the estate be what it will, if the witnesses cannot be produced, or are gone beyond sea, they always admit evidence by comparison of hands. But for the case of Algernon Sidney, there is no doubt but his attainder ought to be reversed, because that attainder was upon no other evidence; for there was no other proof, but paper, that he himself did say, was only for the exercising of his own ingenuity and parts; and it was said to be written for no other purpose, and proved only by the comparison of hands: had there been any other witness to corroborate, it had altered the case. But in our case, we do produce the letter, not for the convicting of the prisoner at the bar; but we are humbly to lay before you all the matter of fact. It will be worthy of your consideration, what you will think fit to take, and what to reject; this is a matter for your own judgment. We produce this letter for this purpose, to shew you, that after sir J. Fenwick was taken, he apprehended his case to be so desperate, that he used these indirect means.

Mr. Speaker. What mean you by that? This letter came from Mr. Fowler.

Serj. Lovel. Here is Mr. Fowler that received it from Webber, when sir J. Fenwick was by, in the presence of sir J. Fenwick.

Mr. Speaker. Shew Mr. Fowler the letter. [Accordingly the clerk went down to the bar, and shewed Mr. Fowler the letter.]

Mr. Speaker. Do you know that paper?

Fowler. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker. Where have you seen it before?

Fowler. I had it from one Webber, that was at Rumney, about the 3d of June, as I remember.

Mr. Speaker. Was that the time that sir John Fenwick was seized?

Fowler. He was then at Rumney. Mr. Webber, I was told, had some acquaintance with me, and desired to speak with me. I went to him; and he was rising; and when up, says he, Mr. Fowler, I would desire you to put a letter into the post; says he, there is no hurt in it; it is directed to Mrs. Frances Farrer, at the countess of Carlisle's in Soho-square; and when I had delivered it, he desired me to come to him again.

Mr. Speaker. Did you come to him again?

Fowler. Mr. Mascall, of Rumney, sent for me to his house, and told me, that he had heard that I had received some letter from Mr. Webber; and when he had opened it, and saw what it was, he thought fit to send it up to the secretary of state; and I made my mark upon it, that I might know it again.

Mr. Speaker. Have you made your mark upon it?—Fowler. Yes, Sir.

Serj. Lovel. I desire he may be asked, whether sir John Fenwick was not in the same room when Webber delivered it?

Fowler. Yes: but I question whether he saw Mr. Webber give it; for he delivered it privately, as I thought.

Mr. Speaker. Was sir John in the room then?

Fowler. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker. Can you say any thing more of sir John Fenwick's knowledge of that paper?

Fowler. No, I know no more.

Serj. Gould. If you please then, Mr. Speaker, because perhaps there may be some objections, that we should give an account of Webber, we will call a witness, that we have done our utmost to find him out.

Members. No, no.

Sir T. Powys. That which I was going to offer is, that this proof is short, if that which in the act of reversal of the attainer of Mr. Sidney is admitted to be no proof against him; for the act recites that letter was found in his closet, and proved by comparison of hands, and yet for all that, this sort of evidence is condemned by this act of reversal as illegal evidence. This case before you comes short of that; for here is no proof by comparison of hands, nor that it was in the possession of sir J. Fenwick: but only that a person in the room without the privy of sir J. Fenwick, delivered it to another; and the witness says, he did it in a private manner.

Sir B. Shower. With submission this letter could not be read in any place whatsoever against sir J. Fenwick, in a civil cause; for even in that case, they must prove it to be his hand-writing by comparison of hands.

Serj. Gould. I think not to insist upon it:*

* This Letter was written with a black-lead pencil, and was as follows:

"What I feared is at last happened; had I gone alone I had done it; but the other was betrayed from London. It is God's will, so we must submit. I know nothing can save my life, but my lord Carlisle's going over to him, (meaning king William) backed by the rest of the family of the Howards, to beg it, and offering, that I will be abroad all his time, where I cannot hurt him; and that I will never draw sword against him. I must leave it to you what else to say. All friends must be made. My lord Devonshire may perhaps, by my lady; my lord Godolphin and my lord Pembroke, by my lady Montgomery; Mr. Nelson by the bishop of Canterbury. My lord Arran might engage his brother Selkirk to use his interest with Keppel. I believe, if my lord Carlisle would go, it were best before my trial, or else they will cut me short for want of time; if he can prevail with him for a pardon, he will procure it as well before my trial as after, at least

But that we shall desire is this: we have now done with our evidence, only we shall desire the worthy member, Mr. Vernon, to give an account what was the reason why sir John hath not been tried; for indeed he hath very much trifled with the government, pretending still to make a free and ingenuous confession.

Sir T. Powys. I am of counsel for this gentleman at the bar; for his life, for his fortune, for all that he hath in the world. It is not only this gentleman's case, but it is a case that may be of great consequence in all future times. I have, as it was my duty, attended for at least these twelve hours, either in opening the matter, or by producing such evidence as, we hoped, we did fairly object to. Sir, there are several things offered on their parts, which I confess we little expected, and which will require something to be said to; and I have a great deal to offer on the behalf of sir J. Fenwick, both as to this method that is taken, and what is alledged in the bill, and what is contained in the indictment upon which the bill is founded, wherein I desire to be heard: and since you have been pleased to allow us to be counsel for him, I am sure we shall have a fair and favourable hearing. We have a great deal to offer to you, both as to the matter of the indictment, and the manner of it: and I hope to shew you, that the indictment, as it is laid, does not contain a sufficient charge of treason. We have likewise a great deal to say, as to the evidence they have offered, at least what they call so: but I must make it my request, that we may have liberty until to-morrow morning to make our observations, and answer what hath been said by the counsel on the other side. I am not in a very good condition by this long he may prevail for a reprieve, till some can come over to him. My lord also will have an opportunity to engage Bentinck [the earl of Portland,] and get my lord Essex to join with him. I cannot think what else to say; but the great care must be the jury, if two or three could be got that would starve the rest; that or nothing can save me. Money, I know, would do it; but alas! that is not to be had, nor shall I get enough for counsel. I beg of you not to think of being shut up with me; I know it will kill you, and besides, I have no such friend as you to take care of my business: though it would be the comfort of my life, the little time it lasts, to have you with me: and I have this only comfort now left, that my death will make you easy. My dearest life, grieve not for me, but resign me to God's will. You will hear, as soon as they bring me to town, where they put me, and then I would have a servant, or somebody with me. I am interrupted, so can say no more now. Engage sir John Lowther, the new lord, who has more interest than any body. Let my lord Scarsdale engage Jermaine to engage Overkirk for me. Speak to my lady Arlington. If my trial could be put off till the king comes back, there would be more opportunity to solicit him."

attendance, and by attending my duty in the courts in Westminster-hall; and I am afraid I am not now in a condition to do my duty, as may be expected from me. I must own it, I am not prepared as I ought to be; and I hope when there is so great a stake, you will allow us until to-morrow morning.

Sir B. Shower. I beg your favour in the same manner, and to the same effect as sir T. Powys hath done. It is to be acknowledged there are several things offered in evidence, which is dew to us lawyers. We do not desire to trifle: we do not desire it on behalf of the prisoner by way of delay, but on behalf of the length of the proceedings, that you will give us a fair hearing, as you have allowed it to the king's serjeants; and that we may make that defence that is incumbent upon us in discharge of our duty to the prisoner.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you must withdraw. (And being withdrawn.)

Mr. Smith. I would not give an opportunity to any man to practise with witnesses, to hinder the truth of the matter from appearing, after they have heard the evidence for the bill. I would know what list of these witnesses sir John Fenwick hath given in?

Mr. Speaker. You did make an order, that sir John Fenwick should deliver in a list of his witnesses; but I believe he did not send in a list to any body upon that account, for I have made no order for any.

Lord Coningsby. I am convinced that you are obliged to sit so long as to hear the witnesses on both sides; and therefore my motion is to call in the counsel, and ask them, if they have any evidence to produce; but I do not desire the counsel should go on to make their observations to-night.

Sir Walter Young. I think you are rightly moved by that noble lord that spoke last. I think if sir J. Fenwick hath any evidence to produce, he ought to produce it now; and that you ought not to give him time till to-morrow morning to produce that.

Mr. Speaker. Is it your pleasure that sir J. Fenwick and the counsel be called in, and told, that the House do expect, if they have any witnesses, that they do examine them to night; but as to their observations the House will give them time till to-morrow morning?

Which was generally consented to, and they were brought in again.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Thomas Powis, the House have considered of what you said, when you went out, and they are inclined to allow you time for making your observations: but they have commanded me to ask you, if you have any witnesses to produce? and to let you know, that if you have any witnesses to produce, they expect you would produce and examine them to-night.

Sir T. Powys. Sir, I would acquaint you with all the openness that becomes me on this occasion. I must confess we have not any witnesses that we propose to call; but when we come to speak to the matter, we hope to give you some satisfaction as to that; but at present we have no evidence to produce, unless it be a copy of a record.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, if you please to withdraw, you shall know the sense of the house.

Accordingly they withdrew.

Chan. of the Exchequer. I suppose, since the gentlemen have no living witnesses to produce to-night, you will not think fit to receive them at any other time, for it is giving them too much advantage; and the whole meaning of the chicanery of the counsel, is only to get time to reply, Mr. Dighton having heard the evidence. And now I have mentioned him, give me leave to tell you, That I think you cannot rise without taking some notice of him. I think there is as plain a subornation proved in Dighton, as can be, by one Roe; and when you have heard such a character of a man, and there is no other evidence that he can solicit, I think you ought to take care that he be forth-coming; and that he should be taken into custody. I think you may give the counsel further time as to the record; that cannot well be falsified; though I believe in a matter of this moment, where the government is concerned, there never was such a proceeding by the counsel, as this has been, to entertain us six or eight hours together, by delays.

Mr. Smith. I suppose before you hear any thing as to Dighton, you will do something as to the putting this cause off to another day; I humbly propose that you will go on this again on Wednesday.

Sir H. Hobart. When it is proper to go upon ways and means, I shall come into it: But while this is upon your hands, I believe you will never get heartily into other business: and therefore I humbly move you that you will go upon this to-morrow morning.

Thereupon the house came to these Resolutions:

Resolved, That this house will proceed further in relation to this business of sir John Fenwick to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Ordered, That sir John Fenwick be remanded to Newgate. That the bill be read a second time to-morrow morning.

Mr. Russel. I am unwilling to trouble gentlemen at this time of night; but I would know, Whether, when sir John Fenwick is called in, you will ask him any questions upon that paper?

Members. No, no.

The counsel were called in, and withdrawn again.

Resolved, that this House being informed that the counsel for sir John Fenwick have no living witnesses to produce except to prove a record, that this House will not hear any witnesses, except to prove the said record.

Ordered, That Mr. Dighton do attend to-morrow morning.

November 17. Sir John Fenwick and the counsel on both sides were called in.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Thomas Powys, you that are of counsel for sir John Fenwick, the House agreed last night, to give you time till to-day to make your defence, your observations upon the evidence that hath been given.

Sir T. Powys. Mr. Speaker, I am of counsel for sir John Fenwick, who now stands before you upon the greatest concern he can have in this world; and as you have been pleased to assign us to be of counsel for him, and I must own have very favourably heard us hitherto,

I shall think myself very unfortunate, if I should let fall any expression in his defence, that should seem indecent, and give offence to this House; for I am sure I have no intention to do it, but on the contrary, to behave myself with all the deference that is possible, in a case of this nature.

The thing I shall insist upon, will be upon three heads. 1. The manner of proceeding, and method that hath been taken in this prosecution. 2. I shall take notice of those things that are alleged against him in the bill, upon which he is to make his defence. 3. I shall beg your favour, to observe what sort of proofs they have offered on the other side, and which they call evidence.

As to the first matter, I must intreat the favour of you to be thus understood: That when I say any thing in relation to the manner of proceeding, I do not speak in opposition to the power of parliaments; for I know very well, that our lives and estates, and all that we have, are subject to acts of parliament; but I hope you will permit me to offer some reasons, which (I hope) may be of weight, in opposition to the exercising of that power in the way you are now going. Nobody can say, but when an act of parliament is passed, though the party concerned may think it was upon hard terms; yet when it is become a law, it is not to be opposed. I cannot say but those persons, who in the last sessions of parliament were imprisoned by an act ex post facto and subsequent to the fact complained of; yet when it was passed into a law, they were legally detained: But, I hope, I may so far take notice of their case, as some kind of reason against this, to the end that those laws may not grow familiar, that they may not easily be obtained; because precedents generally grow; and as that law 'ex post facto,' extended to liberty, so this extends to life; one precedent is apt to beget another; and therefore, sure, you will be careful how you give precedents, especially in case of life.

The first thing I observe, is obvious; that is, the person who is to be sentenced by this bill is forthcoming, in order to be tried in the ordinary method of justice. He is not only indicted, and actually under process; but he hath pleaded, and he is ready, when his majesty, in the course of justice, shall call upon him, to undergo his trial; and either there is sufficient evidence, legal evidence against him, as the king's serjeant insisted there was; and if there be so, then, under favour, there is no reason but he should have the benefit of an ordinary trial, which is the birth-right of all the king's subjects: or there is not sufficient evidence against him; and if there be not, it will be a good reason against making a particular law for taking away his life: For, we think, nothing can be said for this law, but want of evidence; and that, to my understanding, is a very odd reason.

Sir, I would not spend time in taking notice, That the meanest subject in the kingdom is entitled, by being born in this kingdom, to be tried by a jury, where there are those just advantages, that cannot be had in another case: There is a liberty of challenging 35, without shewing any reason, and as many more as he can any way object to with reason. The witnesses are upon oath, and all the proceedings are by certain known rules and methods, and not only by the statute of Magna Charta, but by the common law of England, much more ancient than that statute; and though the proceedings therein are such as a criminal may sometimes escape, yet the just advantages are so much beyond any thing of that nature, that I hope we shall never complain of that ancient course of proceeding by jury: I am sure it is the honour of our government, the mark of our freedom, and envy of our neighbours; and I hope, that method of trial shall never be laid aside, though sometimes it may not have the effect that is desired by it.

I would take notice to you, that in a case of the greatest crime, and most notoriety of fact, yet the persons concerned in it were brought to their trial. The regicides, who did not fly, but were found upon the restoration of king Charles 2, though their treason had the worst effect, even in the murder of the king; yet, notwithstanding, though the fact was so notorious, those that were found upon the place were admitted to their trials in the ordinary course of justice; although at the same time there was a bill of attainder against some that fled, and some that were dead, and so could not be tried.

I would, with your favour, likewise observe, That the parliaments of England have been so far from depriving persons from their ordinary trials, that whereas the common law of England says, that persons outlawed for treason and felony, if taken, shall be put to death without trial; yet the parliament, in the reign of Edward 6, made a law, providing, that criminals that returned within a year, according to that law, should be admitted to their ordinary trials.

Sir, all along the statutes run in favour of trials; there are not less than two acts of parliament in the reign of Edward 6, in the first and fifth year of his reign, that say, there shall not be less than two witnesses against any person for treason: And I hope I shall never see a law made so much in opposition to these acts, as that a person shall be sentenced to death without so much as one witness, as I shall shew by and bye.

Perhaps it might be thought extraordinary, That in the same parliament that passed a bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason, requiring two witnesses with great strictness, and giving further advantages to the criminal than ever were before allowed, an act should pass, to put a person to death, without any trial at all. And let any one compare the preamble of that act with this bill.

Sir, I take it, with humble submission, that the present case is not at all to be likened to most of those bills of attainder that may be cited; those, when they come to be looked into, will be found either to have passed against such persons as fled from justice; and therein they only pursued the rules of the common law, which allowed them to be out-lawed, and by consequence to be attainted: and the parliament therefore, in attainting them, did but the same thing; and therein, there was nothing done extraordinary. True it is, that where persons have been forthcoming, there have been some few bills of attainder: but I will presume to say, they are never mentioned without heavy censures, and a great complaint against them.

This cause is not like the late instance of the bill of attainder against the duke of Monmouth,* for he was present in the kingdom: yet he was in direct opposition to any method of trial; he was in defiance to all courts of justice: but here is a person who submits himself, and hath pleaded, and stands ready to be tried; and I hope, I may take notice, to take off all prejudice that may be raised, that this gentleman, though he was of the parliament that passed that bill, yet he was not in town, until at least a month after the bill was passed.

I do agree, there are some cases where persons have been attainted without being admitted to be tried. In the beginning of the reign of Edward 3, Roger Mortimer was attainted and executed, without being tried; but 28 Ed. 3, it was reversed, because he was not brought to judgment according to the law of the land, 1 Ed. 3. The like in the case of Edmund earl of Arundel: but 4 Ed. 3, Richard his son petitioned in parliament, setting forth the proceedings to be against the Great Charter, and insisting, that there ought to have been due process of law, and he was then restored in part; but 28 Ed. 3. there was an act of reversal, declaring, that it clearly appeared, that the said Edmund was unduly put to death; and that the statute by which he was attainted, was void, erroneous, and null. There is an instance in 82 H. 8. Col. 4. Inst. fol. 37. of Thomas Cromwell earl of Essex, who, though he was in custody in the Tower, yet he was attainted without being tried; but the words of my lord Coke are as follow, 'Auferat oblivio, si potest, si non utrumq; silentium tegat:' for the more high and absolute the jurisdiction of the court is, the more just and honourable ought it to be in its proceedings, and to give examples of justice to inferior courts. And he adds further, to the end, as I apprehend, that the reversal of this attainder may be of ill use: I am, says he, confidently persuaded, such worthy and honourable members shall from time to time be of both houses of parliament, as never any attainder, when the person is forth-coming, shall be had hereafter, without hearing of him; which I understand to be, without trying of him: and it is memorable, what my lord Coke recites, that he who thus died, attempted the like against another.

* See this Case, vol. 11, p. 1023, in a Note to which, p. 1040, is contained some matter concerning the mode of passing the Act of Attainder against him. In the works of lord De la more, see his Trial, vol. 11, p. 509, printed 1694, is an article, intitled, Observations upon the Attainder of the late duke of Monmouth, which see. See, also, 2 Ralph, 143.

There is another case, of Thomas Seymour, admiral of England, who likewise was attainted by act of parliament; and as it appears, without execution: you have an account thereof in the second part of the History of the Reformation, fol. 98, 99, 100, whither I will refer you, only to read the sentence of the learned author, there pronounced against him. That latter case is, that of my lord Strafford, which every body knows. I shall, as the best account of that matter, crave leave to read the words of the parliament in the act of the reversal. I will not trouble you with reciting the whole, but only read the beginning, and some part thereof in another place. "Whereas Thomas, late earl of Strafford, was impeached of high-treason, upon pretence of endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws, and called to a public and solemn arraignment and trial before the peers in parliament, where he made a particular defence to every article objected against him; insomuch, that the turbulent party then seeing no hopes to effect their unjust designs, by an ordinary way and method of proceedings, did at last resolve to attempt the destruction and attainder of the earl, by an act of parliament, to be therefore purposely made to condemn him upon accumulative treason."— And then it goes on to shew, it was carried by the tumult of the people; and then follows— "And to the end that right be done to the memory of the deceased earl of Strafford aforesaid: be it further enacted, That all records and proceedings of parliament relating to the said attainder, be wholly cancelled and taken off the file, or otherwise defaced and obliterated, to the intent the same may not be visible in after ages, or brought into example to the prejudice of any person whatsoever." So that the parliament that enacted that reversal did consider those proceedings as very evil and unjust, and was not willing there should be any remains of such an example to future ages.

Sir, having made these observations as to the manner of proceeding, I come now to that which is the subject matter of the bill at present before you, and which we take to be the charge against sir J. Fenwick: I must crave leave to observe, that in all courts of justice, where any person is accused, he is to make his defence secundum allegata et probata: it is not enough that a matter is proved, if it be not alledged; nor that it is alledged, if it be not proved; but if it be both alledged and proved, then it is a full charge, and requires an answer. It is not only the law of England, but I believe all nations, and wherever any person is to make his defence, especially in capital crimes; that to which he is to answer must be alledged against him: from whence I shall observe what is alledged against sir J. Fenwick; for, I hope, we are not concerned to defend him further than as to what at this time he is charged with. This bill of attainder, as it is drawn, and now stands before you, doth not so much as alledge, or say, that sir J. Fenwick is guilty of the treason whereof he was indicted; and that hath prevented us from producing witnesses to that, and several matters which the king's counsel have entered upon: for though you have permitted them to examine witnesses to several things quite out of the bill: yet, I hope, you are not come to any resolution, that these matters shall be thought fatal to sir J. Fenwick, that are not so much as alledged against him. We do not therefore think we are bound, or ought to follow them in those things that are totally out of the bill; and therefore his being guilty is not now the question, because it is not a charge upon him.

The first thing that is alledged in the bill is, • That sir J. Fenwick was indicted at the sessions, for that which is laid in the indictment to be treason (which by and bye I shall crave leave to be heard to); and, I think, nobody will say this alone does require any answer, further than to own the fact or to deny it: and we do admit that he was so indicted. I need not labour much to clear him of the consequence of that alone; for very often innocent persons have been indicted and accused (for an indictment is no more than an accusation); and this bill, as I have observed, doth not say he is guilty. When the bill hath recited that matter, it proceeds to take notice, That they by some unfair prevarications (for so I agree they were, if the facts alledged in the bill are true, which by the way hath not been yet proved, by producing any one witness) did obtain the king's clemency to put off his trial, in expectation of an ingenuous confession, which the bill takes for granted he hath prevaricated in, by charging several persons of honour and fidelity with matters of a high nature, only by hear-say; and by using other unfair artifices to put off his trial. How far it is made out, that I must submit to you; we think at present there is no proof of it, and by consequence we are not concerned to answer it: but had they proved it as fully as it is laid (though far be it from me to excuse such a behaviour); yet when a criminal is to be tried for that which will be of fatal consequence to him if he be convicted, nobody can say it comes near treason, by unfair means, to contrive to put off his trial.

The next thing the bill recites is, That one of the witnesses, who might have been produced against him upon his trial, if it had proceeded as was intended, is since withdrawn. I cannot say, but Goodman is withdrawn: but as the bill does not so much as alledge, that it was by the means or procurement, no nor privy, of sir J. Fenwick; so from thence that part of the bill charges no offence home to sir J. Fenwick: for in case the same witness had happened to have died by the act of God, it would not have been said to have been a good reason for this bill of attainder against sir J. Fenwick, unless he had contributed to it.

From these premises follows the enacting part, That sir J. Fenwick be attainted of high-treason; and in future times the act must be supposed to be grounded upon the inducement to it. And I humbly submit it to you, Whether this bill, condemning him for high-treason upon such recitals, will be thought to be reasonable?

These being the allegations of the bill, I will now, with your favour, come to that, which they on the other side do call proofs; and I must humbly observe to you, and submit it to your judgment, Whether in the case where a man's life is to be taken away, by a subsequent law made on purpose for him, the proofs in that case ought not to be much more evident, than if he were to be tried by a law already in being? In my poor apprehension (I speak it with all submission to you, Sir,) it would be too much at once, to make a subsequent law to condemn a man to death, and to do it upon doubtful and uncertain evidence, or rather upon no proof at all. Nothing could excuse such a law, but an undeniable proof of the fact. And therefore, surely, the position we find of Mr. St. John's, in my lord Stafford's case, is of most dangerous consequence: I am afraid none are safe, if that be admitted, that a subsequent law may take away a man's life without any evidence, other than the private opinion or conscience of every particular law-maker. He is pleased so to assert, that it may be done, as in Rushworth's History of that Trial, fol. 677. I am sure if this be so, no man knows how long his life is his own: I hope this doctrine shall never be followed or approved. Sir, we have the happiness to live under an establishment that every man does, or may know the law he is to go by: every one is bound at his peril to take notice of the laws, and to act accordingly, because they may be known: but at this rate none but prophets can live amongst us.

• In the next place, I would observe what course they have taken in their evidence who are the king's counsel.

First, They have betaken themselves to that which is not alledged in the bill; and we think that this is not agreeable to a course of justice.

In the next place, to make out what they insist on, they have produced but one person that comes hither viva voce to speak to it; and I must take notice to you, that he is not upon oath. I know very well it is not your course in this house to administer an oath; but I know very well, though it is not your course in this house to administer an oath, yet, I hope, that is so far from being a reason why this bill should pass without an oath, that it is a good reason why such a bill should not begin here: there is no place in the world where a person is sentenced to death without an oath. In the case of my lord Strafford, the proceeding first was by way of impeachment, and the witnesses had been first examined upon oath in the House of Peers; and that bill of attainder takes notice of it, reciting that it had been fully proved; and, by consequence, we may suppose, that they would not otherwise have passed it, that being the ground of their proceeding upon that bill of attainder: but for the bill to begin originally in this place, to form such a judgment, the heaviest that can be pronounced against a man, a judgment of death, corrupting of his blood, and forfeiting all he has in the world; and this upon bare allegations, without so much as the sanction of an oath, is extremely hard. Mr. Porter is such a person, that I know not how he hath gained so much credit, that this act should pass upon his parole to take away the life of a man. He was lately of that horrid conspiracy of the assassination of the king; and shall that man, who was so lately of that villainous disposition, to be engaged in a crime of that black nature, and not convicted by his own conscience, but by the danger he had run himself into, not so much as pardoned his crime, but at this time, if I may without offence use that expression, drudging for his parlon; I say, shall this person's life be taken away by his parole?

Sir, The next thing I would go to, is that (which likewise they call evidence), which is an examination, as they term it, of Goodman, taken before a justice of peace: but he was not examined, and I must insist upon it, that though you permitted it to be read, yet I did observe you did not declare it to be evidence; but you were, I presume, willing to hear all things, and then judge what would be the evidence. And, I think, the king's counsel did not press it further. Sir, as this is not evidence that would be allowed in an inferior court, so, I hope, you will not allow it to be evidence here; for then it is like to be followed by other courts, who observe the proceedings here as their great rule. It is only what Mr. Goodman thought fit to write down without being examined.

Sir, the next thing they resort to is, What Goodman swore upon his examination in another cause, where sir J. Fenwick was neither party nor present. Sir, there are, I suppose, such reasons against that sort of evidence from natural justice, that it is not admitted in any court: because there may be a weak defence, or the person that swears it against one, perhaps may not, when face to face, have that confidence to persist in it, in case it be false, against another; or at least that person who was not a party before, when he comes upon his trial, may think of such questions as may go a great way to discover the truth, may produce such evidence against his credit as may overthrow it.

But if what is sworn at one time against one man must be always taken for truth against all others, the trial of one of the company is the trial and condemnation of all the rest: and how contrary is this to a fundamental rule in our law, That no evidence shall be given against a man, when he is upon trial for his life, but in the presence of the prisoner; because he may cross-examine him who gives such evidence; and that is due to every man in justice.

But I would with submission inquire, how they are sure that Goodman would have sworn this matter again, if he was now forth-coming? Because he did swear so in Cook's cause, is it necessary that he would swear so again now, if face to face with sir J. Fenwick? Nobody can say so positively and absolutely; they only can imagine it, because he once swore it, therefore it is possible that he would do so again: Whereas we may as well say, he did then swear to save his own life; and having done that, and found an opportunity to get out of the way, his own conscience might put him upon flight, to prevent his doing of it again, and that might be the reason for the withdrawing of himself. However, I insist upon it, that there is no proof that it was by the procurement of sir J. Fenwick: The bill does not alledge it, and the proofs do not come up to it: Nay, there is nothing offered to such purpose, save only that Mr. Porter was pleased to say, That another man told him, that the 300 guineas he was offered, and 300 more he was to have received, were to have come from sir J. Fenwick: but hearsay evidence is to be rejected, especially against a man for his life; because every man is at liberty to talk at large: But God forbid that that should be allowed for evidence!

The next thing they went upon was what Mr. Roe said; that Mr. Dighton, who by your permission is solicitor for sir J. Fenwick, was inquiring of him what he could say to take off Goodman's evidence: The words I think he used were, What he could say to discredit Goodman's evidence; and, I hope, that does no way affect sir J. Fenwick: For it does not appear that he had any authority from him; but it is only suspected, because he is now solicitor for him, which he was admitted to after the time spoken of. But I take the words to be nothing relating to Goodman's withdrawing of himself; but to inquire what he could say to discredit his testimony, which supposeth he would appear; and imports the quite contrary of withdrawing himself: and if had gone no farther, I think, there had been no fault in that; for any solicitor may enquire up and down for the advantage of his client; and the word solicitor imports his employment. As to the offer Mr. Roe says he made him of a very great recompence, how far he is guilty of that, I suppose he can give some account, if you should please to enter into an examination of it; and as I find he does not doubt to clear himself: so that sir J. Fenwick is in no sort proved to be privy to Mr. Goodman's withdrawing himself, much less to be proved to have had a hand in it.

There is one thing more I would offer, and that is grounded upon the bill of indictment preferred at the Old Bailey against sir J. Fenwick; That the matter in the very indictment that they have read on the other side, as it is there laid, and as far as it hath been offered to be here proved, does not amount to treason; or, at least, it hath been made a very great doubt, and by some within these walls: But this I offer with all submission; I have the author in my hand, who is a person of note of the king's counsel; he hath furnished me with such arguments as, I hope, I may be admitted to put you in mind of without offence.

The indictment lays, That there was a conspiracy and agreement to call in foreign power, and to that purpose to send Charnock to France; but the indictment does not say, That Charnock was sent, only that there was a meeting, and an agreement, and a conspiracy, to send him: So the indictment does not lay it as a thing done, nor does the bill charge it so; but only takes notice, That he, I mean sir J. Fenwick, was indicted for conspiring and agreeing to call in a foreign force; so that this bill does not say that Charnock was sent. And I appeal to you, Whether it be proved that he was sent: For Mr. Porter says no more, but that there was a meeting at the King's head, and he named sir John Fenwick to be one who was present; and there it was, he says, agreed, that Charnock should be sent into France. Now, if there was nothing more than an agreement and conspiracy to do it, and no further act, but such a meeting to do it, but the person was not actually sent, or, at least, not proved to be sent; then, from this learned author's opinion, I insist upon it, that this is not a sufficient overt-act of treason. In the late case of my lord Russel, whose innocence is vindicated by this author, he takes notice, That a conspiracy or agreement to levy war is not treason, without actual levying war; and of that opinion was my lord Coke, and my Lord Chief Justice Hales. A conspiracy or agreement to call in foreign forces, unless actually done, or a person, at least, actually sent, or something more than a bare agreement for that purpose, is the same as a conspiracy to levy war. And in the case of my lord Russel, the proof being only, That he and others met together, and agreed to seize upon the guards, and levy war, which he never actually did, it is insisted upon by this author, that that was not treason; for that indictment went no further. And therefore my author says, "Show me where such an accusation was ever agreed to be more than a conspiracy to levy war; and that such a conspiracy was ever agreed to be treason within the statute of Edward 3, till within these few years."

Sir, now I must humbly submit it to you, whether this be any thing more: and for the purpose you will please to consider, What this present bill, and what that bill of indictment is: for it is not, for that Charnock was sent into France to solicit forces; but only that sir J. Fenwick was at a meeting, where they did agree so to do. Calling in foreign forces is levying war, but conspiracy to levy war is not treason, unless it be actually done: a conspiracy to call in foreign forces is nothing more. And therefore I humbly insist upon it, That neither by this bill, or by the indictment recited in it, or the proofs offered before you, any thing is charged, but only an agreement at the meeting mentioned by captain Porter, a single person, and he not upon oath, to call in foreign forces. For he only says, That Charnock told him he had been in France. I shall not trouble you any further; we have not thought fit to produce witnesses, for the reasons I have offered: for that we do not find, that sir J. Fenwick throughout the bill is charged with being guilty of treason; and we are not willing to enter upon the defence of a matter not charged upon him. I hope, Sir, you will not make a precedent, That where a person is indicted, and ready to abide his trial, in the ordinary course of justice, as sir J. Fenwick now is, that he might be taken out of the hands of the ordinary judges, and be brought to this bar, to receive his trial here.

A matter of this nature may be of very great consequence: we know at present upon what ground we stand; for by the statute of Edward 3, we know what is treason; by the two statutes of Edward 6, and the late act of treason, we know what is proof; by the statute of Magna Charta, we know we are to be tried, 'per legem terræ et per judicium parium'; that is, a peer by his peers, and a commoner by a jury: but if bills of attainder come into fashion, we shall neither know what is treason, what is evidence, nor how, nor where we are to be tried. Sir, I submit it to you, and hope this bill shall not pass.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Speaker, I am of counsel for sir John Fenwick, the prisoner at the bar: and first, I am humbly for to thank you for your candour, of which I have had frequent experience; and humbly beg for myself, That if I offer any words that are indecent, or unfit for me, that you will interrupt me; for it is furthest from my intention so to do. The bill that is brought into this House against sir John Fenwick, and that whereby every one of you (with submission) are to declare and pronounce, That he shall be drawn, hanged, and quartered, as a traitor. And the question before you is, Whether you will do this in this case?

Sir, I shall not pretend to question, nor enter into any debate or argument in this thing concerning the power of parliaments: no question, but in all governments, there is some supreme power; and by our constitution it is lodged in the king, Lords and Commons. There are precedents of attainders, and that many; but can they shew me, where there hath been any attainder by parliament, for high-treason, upon one single act, which, if treason, was determinable at common law? There have been bills of attainder for flagrant treasons, and for great ministers of state: some topping sinners, who have been above judges and jury, and whom inferior courts could not tell what to say to: but I believe I may say this, That for a single consult or agreement between four or five private gentlemen, in a private room, in which there was no danger, but by the consequence of the resolution, if it was put in practice, no man can shew any precedent for attainting any person in parliament.

If you please to observe, the 25 Edw. 3 reserves the power to parliament, to proceed in treason not expressed within the statute; but as to the compassing the king's death, adhering to the king's enemies, and those things that are there particularly specified, it seems the sense of the parliament to leave them to the rules of the common law. So 1 Hen. 4. No. 144, upon the roll it is at large complained of accusations in parliament for treasons and felonies, and declares for the future, they should be determined in the inferior courts.

1. This was occasioned by sir Raw. Harry; Cotton's Abridgment, 189.

There is a melancholy precedent or two of single acts of attainder; but they are most of them reversed. Sir Thomas Haxey in Richard the 2nd's time was attainted for bringing in a bill into the Commons House against the prerogative; but 1 Hen. 4. it was reversed with great censure, Cott. Abridg. 362, 363. There are others in Hen. 8's time, but they were for acts in that reign, which were questionable, whether or no within the statute of Edw. 3, and were for such actions, as perhaps were not for the honour of the prince, or good of the government, to disclose by public trial, as the attainder of the queen, and others concerned.

I beg leave to repeat the words of a great author, the bishop of Salisbury, in the History of the Reformation, which I crave leave rather to do, because it hath been approved of by this House, for he had thanks of the parliament for it, fol. 359, 360. where speaking of these sort of attainders, he says, "After these executions, followed the parliament in 1539, in which these attainders were not only confirmed, but divers others were made of persons in custody, without bringing them to trial;" (and he says,) "which cannot be enough condemned as a breach of the most sacred and unalterable rules of justice."

That of the marchioness of Eker, &c. I shall make no paraphrase upon it: there is no question but you will agree, and I must admit, Salus Populi to be Suprema Lex; but for an act, not the last of May, but last May was twelve months, the danger passed, the persons executed that were concerned in the great treason, and all danger that might have been from that act gone, and no fear now concerning it, I hope you will not use the extraordinary power of the legislative, to punish for that fact which may be punished by the ordinary rules of law.

The reason suggested in the bill is, That it is impossible to have this gentleman tried by the rules of the common law; for otherwise there is none: for you will not waste your time; and if the doctrine that was broached here yesterday be true, there is no occasion to trouble you now; for according to their doctrine, there is legal evidence, and there is no need of a bill of attainder; but taking that for granted, that we must do, otherwise there is no reason for this bill. Then the bill says, That Goodman was an evidence, and that he is withdrawn; which I must observe, is neither laid, nor proved to be by the privy, consent, or procurement of sir John Fenwick. There is no pretence of it in the bill; no insinuation of it, nor any evidence to that purpose. Then suppose Goodman is withdrawn, we may presume you will not pass a bill to put sir John Fenwick in a worse condition than if Goodman was present, if he had been ready to have sworn the same thing.

In case you do pass this bill, you do put sir J. Fenwick in a worse condition than he would have been if Goodman were here: perhaps it might have been reasonable to have an act passed, that Goodman's depositions should be read at the trial, if Goodman was withdrawn; but we hope it cannot be a reason to condemn sir J. Fenwick of high-treason without trial; for the consequence of this is (if it were by his means), that he is punished greater than the thing requires. For if Goodman was here, sir J. Fenwick would have had his trial by a jury, the benefit of challenges, exceptions to the array, might have challenged upon account of favour, if any of the grand-jury had been impanelled; had his legal exceptions to the testimony of the witnesses; might have these witnesses examined upon oath; might give evidence upon oath to it; and all this he is deprived of: so that now he is in a worse condition, by Goodman's absence, than if he was present. We insist upon it, therefore, and submit it to you, whether any punishment can be imposed by the legislative power, but only to supply that defect, and put the case in the same circumstances it would have been, if such a miscarriage had not been committed. But this bill is to condemn him to death upon the oath of one witness, though there was your act of parliament last year requires two. With submission to their judgment, it was the law of the land before that; and in all cases, where trials are 'per testes;' and it is the law of God, and the law of the whole world; and no law allows a man to be condemned but by two witnesses; and the reason that here one witness is admitted, is, because he hath the benefit of a jury, and challenges to them, who the law supposes are privy to the fact, and therefore are to come from the vicinage, from the neighbourhood of the place where the party dwells; and for that reason, in cases of felony, where no statute interposes, the law allows but one witness. Natural reason requires two witnesses in case of so great crimes, because that one witness can be no rule to guide your judgments; one affirms, the other denies; this is equal; and presumption ought to be on the side of innocency, rather than otherwise; but we hope, in this case, it will not be thought reasonable to pass the bill to condemn sir J. Fenwick for treason, and to condemn him to the basest of executions, upon the testimony, nay, upon the parole of one witness. And it is no more than if Goodman had been dead, then you would not have done it. If Goodman and Porter had both come to this bar, you would not have done it, but have referred him to his trial at the common law. Now what is there pretended by them to induce you to judge the contrary, or at least without so much as an allegation in the bill, that sir J. Fenwick procured his withdrawing? I propose it to your consideration, Whether there be any proof that Goodman is withdrawn? He was once in custody, let out upon bail, the prosecutors approved the bail, he never yet called upon his recognizance; nay, there is not one tittle of evidence, but that Goodman may be in the same lodging where he was: and then suppose, when you have passed this bill, Goodman should appear again, and contradict his testimony he has given before; then it may be too late for you to do right to sir J. Fenwick. It is not so much as offered that Goodman could not be found; they offered a printed-proclamation, which I am sure the king's serjeant will not allow to be any evidence. Whether it passed the great seal before it was printed, or whether it passed it at all, non constat; for it was not read; they waved it. It does not appear sir J. Fenwick consented, or procured Goodman's withdrawing; he could not procure it, for he was a prisoner, and so not likely to effect it, being a prisoner, especially for his life.

As for my lady Fenwick, whether she did or not, I am sure you will be of opinion it ought not to affect sir J. Fenwick: suppose Clancy a stranger to sir J. Fenwick, and in truth he never saw him: or suppose him a friend, and he officiously did what he did; he ought to answer for it; and I think he hath undergone the punishment the law thought fit to inflict in that case; it is his own crime, and by the rules of justice, no man's crime ought to tend to the punishment or misfortune of another man: the act of one criminal, thought to be a party, or acquaintance, or a friend of sir J. Fenwick's, ought not to affect him, nor nobody but the actor; it is he that hath suffered for it.

And what hath been said in that matter ought not to influence your judgments; for it is not improbable, but what Clancy told Porter is false; you will never allow hear-say, nor permit your judgment to be governed by any thing but what is certain, and hath all the moral rules of persuasion: hear-say was never, by any law, in any court of the world, allowed, nor indeed believed in private conversation.

As to my lady Fenwick, there is this further, That husband and wife, in respect of crimes, are distinct persons; and what one does cannot affect the other, no more than she deserves to be executed for what sir John Fenwick did: and as to what Porter says concerning it, it only relates to himself; it proves no suggestion of the bill, which is, That Goodman is withdrawn, because a stranger to sir J. Fenwick (and it must be so in construction of law) made an attempt upon captain Porter; therefore Goodman being withdrawn, there was an attempt upon him, and by the same person, and by the same means: this is no evidence; it carries no logic in it, and will not prevail upon your judgment.

We offer another thing to your consideration: it is said, that one Roe was spoke to by a solicitor of sir J. Fenwick's, Whether or no he could say any thing to the discredit of Goodman, as to his robbing or clipping? The asking of that question was lawful; and to desire him to testify it was lawful: I must agree, to offer too great a sum of money may subject him to an information in the King's Bench; (but Mr. Attorney knows that best) but God forbid it should affect sir J. Fenwick! Mr. Dighton was not his solicitor at that time, not appointed, nor had any liberty to come to him; besides, it cannot be an evidence, nor cannot induce you to believe, That the same person was instrumental to get away Goodman, because he asked Roe, if he knew Goodman to be guilty of those crimes; for there is no evidence, that he asked him to persuade him to withdraw himself.

There is another thing we could offer to you: there is no proof of that, which, upon the first reading of this bill, was aimed at, to be punished with greater pains than the common law inflicts, and that is, the giving of false papers and accusations against great persons; they have not attempted any thing like it; so that that is to be taken as if there was no such thing. Neither is there any proof of protracting his trial, by any promises of confession or discovery; they opened it, but did not attempt the proof of it, but waved it.

But take it to be so; I hope you will not pass an act to attain a man for making a false accusation, which only incurs an action of Scaudum Magnatum, a fine and imprisonment upon an indictment; and, I hope, you will not condemn him to a greater punishment, when, at the time he did it, he had no notice of that punishment. The design of the law is, to influence men by fear of penalty; and how can that he, when penalties are not known at the time the fact was committed? I speak with submission still; it seems not just, that I should forbear with so much caution, from an action that exposes me to the penalty of 40*l.* as from an action for which the law says, I shall forfeit my life: now, Sir, in this case it might be expected that he should incur the penalty of fine, pillory, and imprisonment; but not that he could incur the penalty of death.

Then, Sir, as to the protracting of his trial by such promises of confession: certainly the putting off his trial, in itself, is so far from being a crime, that it cannot be thought but lawful: it is every man's duty, upon the principle of self-preservation; and it was at the liberty of the government and ministers, to do as they thought fit in it.

In the next place, we do insist, that there is no treason alledged nor proved in this case: there is no pretence of truth nor charge, in respect of the assassination; nor of buying of arms or horses, though mentioned in the indictment: and if sir J. Fenwick had been to have been tried upon this indictment, and they had had both these witnesses there, all that could have been proved, must be of the consult; as to the rest, he must have been found not guilty: and I believe it is most notorious, that the whole company there could not have raised what was talked of. Now, as to this single act, it hath been said, that a conspiracy to levy war is not treason: My lord Russel was attainted for it, and that attainder was reversed upon this very account, and the act declares the reason of it, he being denied his lawful challenges, and by strained construction of treasons he was unlawfully convicted of treason. Now the overt-act in the indictment was this, that my lord Russel, and others, did consult and conspire to seize the king's guards: the proof of it went further, that they sent sir Thomas Armstrong to view them and seize them: but then the question is, whether the consulting to send a man to invite foreign forces, is any more than a consult to seize the king's guards? We say each are levying of war, and it is not within the clause of adhering to the king's enemies; for they must be either present aiding and abetting of them, or sending them money, arms, and ammunition, and the like; and I think, for that, I may appeal to your act made against corresponding with the king's enemies; which, I suppose, if the law before was otherwise, it needed not to have been made. Now here is only a consult and agreement to do this act.

It hath been questioned, Whether scribere est agere? But here it is only mittere; nay, it is not so much, it is only agere mittere; six men had between them a little private discourse, and at last one of them did agree to send Charnock to France: The question is, whether the law of the land will warrant this to be treason? And if not, then you must not pass this act upon such a single point. Dr. Story's case is denied to be law; this case is no more than that in my lord Dyer, for writing a letter to invite the Spanish king to invade England; and it was a time of great fear of them, as it is of the French king now; and he was attainted upon that, but that judgment hath been questioned and denied to be law. My lord Hales expressly, in his Pleas of the Crown, says, that a conspiracy to levy war is not an overt-act of the king's death; and that attempting to levy war is not treason. Now the sorts of treasons are these three; compassing the king's death; levying war; or, adhering to the king's enemies. Now for compassing or agreeing to levy war, to apply that to be an overt-act of compassing the king's death, hath been always complained of as a strain of the law.

Upon these reasons, we think this would not have been an act of compassing the king's death, as laid in the indictment; and then if it be but a question, whether it be or no? we hope you will not proceed in your legislative, especially when he is deprived of the advantage of insisting on this at his trial at common law: witnesses are there upon their oaths; he might have had a challenge to the jury; he might move in arrest of judgment. Now the question is, whether you will pronounce sentence of death upon him for high-treason, upon one single act, a year and a half ago, just after the act of parliament for regulating trials in cases of high-treason; and if we had had a trial at law, we should have canvassed these things, if we had witnesses upon their oaths; for the pardon reached the 29th of April, they could swear no new discourse but just in May; and now they say it was in the middle of May; if it had been before, the king's grace would have exempted sir John Fenwick from punishment; and these things we should have had the advantage of, if we had had the liberty of a trial.

There is another consideration; sir J. Fenwick hath pleaded, and hath so pleaded to issue, and issue is joined, and a Venire Facias is awarded. Now we submit it to you, whether you will think fit to take it out of the hands of the common law, when there is no extraordinary necessity? And the consideration we have to offer to you, if you do not cast out this bill, if we should have the good fortune, as we hope for in another place, sir J. Fenwick stands still liable, and must submit to his trial, if the king's counsel think fit to prosecute him, and we think it hard to undergo your censure, to be condemned in this place; and if (perhaps) he be acquitted here, to undergo the like danger in another, and then to be tried in a third: and for these reasons, we hope, you will reject this bill.

Serj. Gould. May it please you, Mr. Speaker, I have hearkened to what these gentlemen have objected; and could not be aware of all they have said; they have enlarged upon several topics; I shall recollect them as well as I can, and answer them in the method they have taken. I never did think, that the parliament would take things out of the ordinary course of justice, nor attain any of treason, unless in cases extraordinary; and these gentlemen have agreed, that in cases extraordinary they have done it. They likewise have agreed, and sir Bartholomew Shower has told you, that there are some treasons, by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, reserved by that act, to be declared by parliament. Sir Thomas Powis says, This is taken out of the ordinary course of justice: So says sir Bartholomew Shower; says he, here is an indictment before you, the party hath pleaded not guilty; and they say he may be tried in the ordinary course of the law: and therefore they look upon it as improper to bring it here.

The gentlemen are mistaken very much, to think that I did say, that the examination that I said was evidence here, would be allowed below. If I had thought so, I should have thought at the same time, this House would not have meddled with it: but I do disagree with them in this; and take it, that where a case is extraordinary, you will come and meddle with the matter. Here is an abominable treason, that is agreed on all hands. Here is plot upon plot; here hath been a plot now to take away the king's evidence; there was two witnesses in the beginning, and it is very plain that one of them is not here; for that there was a proclamation produced, and I did look upon that matter as taken for granted, that Goodman was withdrawn, and for that matter they may be easily satisfied. They say, we have not proved the suggestions of the bill; but we think we have: for first of all, captain Porter hath here sworn it expressly; it is not a thing of loose, bare talking, but he hath proved a deliberate and formed conspiracy; he hath proved, that it was actually agreed upon a first, and at a second time; and that Charnock was sent in order to the execution of it: and what was it for? It was plainly to depose the king.

He tells you, for that purpose they had desired 8,000 foot, 1,000 horse, and 1,000 dragoons from the French king; and these gentlemen agreed to join them. Now can there be a greater evidence of deposing the king, and consequently of imagining his death? It is an evidence of the imagination of the death of the king, as well as of the rebellion; it being so in the necessary consequence of it. Now, I think he hath fully proved that. Then we offer to you, how far you will allow of this examination: Why? because upon a second contrivance here is a witness withdrawn: and can we give you greater evidence of that than we have given? we have proved that there was tampering, let the thing run as far as it will. Captain Porter was dealt with, had 300 guineas in hand, and 300 more he was to have remitted to him; and was to have 300*l.* a year, whereof sir J. Fenwick was to pay one. It does follow after, that he is withdrawn: we must leave it to this honourable House, what construction you will make of that; Whether here is not a second plot?

Now this matter is brought before this honourable House, we have gone so far in it, as to produce Goodman's examination that was taken before a justice of peace: we have shewed you, the evidence that he hath given upon a former trial; and now he is gone, sure nobody but must justly infer, it is by sir J. Fenwick's means: so that here they have taken away the evidence that is necessary in the ordinary course of proceedings. In such an extraordinary case I think it hath been usual for the parliament to interpose: therefore, what they pretended, under favour, that this should not be evidence, is all taken off. For now we are in parliament, you will make use of such informations as can give you any light into the matter, and may obviate and cure the distemper that is upon us; and you are judges of your own methods, and how far sir J. Fenwick hath been concerned upon the instances we have given you, that is in your judgments. As for what sir Thomas Powis tells you; says he, this power hath not been executed by parliaments very frequently, but it hath generally been done where persons are withdrawn from justice, and cannot be come at in the ordinary course. Why, we are in the like case; if so be we cannot come at justice in the ordinary course, and that by our evidence having been tampered with, and drawn away; then, Sir, under favour, by their own arguments, it is proper to come before this honourable House; so that notwithstanding what hath been said, we do think we have given you evidence.

And as for what they said, that we have not given any account that sir John Fenwick, by giving assurance of his confession, had protracted his trial; for that I did apply myself, that Mr. Vernon might give you an account of it: so that upon the whole matter, we must leave it to your consideration, and hope we have given you good satisfaction, that there hath been a great plot against the government; and there was no evidence of any other matter before the judges, and they allowed it to be high treason. Here is the same evidence, only we have not one of them viva voce.

Serj. Lovel. Mr. Speaker, I shall not trouble you nor the House very long; but I humbly hope, with a little pains, to satisfy the House, that most that hath been said on the other side is not much to the purpose. Sir, I will consider, with the leave of this House, what the common law was before 25 Edw. 3, and how the law does now stand; and draw some consequences from thence, and the necessity of this case.

The statute of 25 Edw. 3, I must observe it, is not an enacting law, it is only a law declaratory; for all those particular instances of treasons that are mentioned there, were treasons before that law was made; and so, by the preamble of it, plainly appears: but the judges had a greater liberty upon constructive treason, and upon accumulative treasons; and that was left too much at the discretion and liberty of the judges below, and the executive power of the law. Then that statute comes and restrains the judges in that point; and says, that they shall not give judgment in any cases of treason, but only in these cases particularly mentioned there: and that statute says, that if any other matter which shall be thought treason should come before them, they shall not proceed to judgment, but acquaint the king in parliament with it. I only make use of it, to prove how treasons stood before that act, and how it comes to be altered from the common law: and I am sure it is not to be denied; but that one witness was sufficient at the common law: but then comes 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, and that, for the security of the subject, does ordain, That in cases of high-treason there shall be two witnesses of the fact: but that statute does not alter, but was made for the security of the subject in point of proof. But in that statute of 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, that does provide there shall be two witnesses in cases of high-treason, there is an exception of treason for counterfeiting and forging of the coin; and that is the reason that the law is taken now, that though there must be two witnesses in the cases of other treasons, yet in the case of coining there needs but one. The offence or crime is never the greater, because there are to be two witnesses to prove it. In this case that is here before you, we come to desire your help, because one of the witnesses is by art and fraudulent means withdrawn: Does that purge the crime at all, or lessen it? No man will say the crime is less, but it does prevent a regular trial before the courts below; and that is the reason why we did come here; and we hope this defect shall be supplied by a special law. But, say they, it is very hard a law should be made ex post facto to take away a man's life. It would be very hard, if the case was as they have stated it, to make a crime ex post facto that was not so before: but I do not take it to be hard for a law to be made to repeal another, to make a matter triable that was not triable before.

Suppose a law should be made, that all treasons from and after such a time, suppose from a time before the fact is here supposed to be committed, as May was twelve months, should be triable as at the common law; no doubt the parliament may repeal a law in part, or in all. No man can say but sir John Fenwick might be tried at the common law by one witness, before the statute of 1 Edw. 6. So that I do observe, and humbly submit it to you, that this law, by the act, is not changed as to the crime; the crime is as it was before, it is only changed as to the number of witnesses. The instances that have been observed on the other side, with humble submission, I think, do not reach our case. We do not insist that there are two legal witnesses; we do confess the information that hath been read is not a legal proof; but this House, in their legislative capacity, is not to be confined to the evidence that a jury must have below. This House may take what ways and methods they please to satisfy themselves. Say they, here is the life of a gentleman that is concerned. I know all good men will be tender of the life of a man: but here is the life of the king, and the safety of the kingdom, the peace and safety of us all, that is concerned in the same case; and let them put these things into the balance, and consider which ought to weigh most.

You have a record before you, of the conviction of Peter Cook, who was indicted by the same witness.

A learned gentleman, that is of counsel for the prisoner at the bar, did make the same objections as are made now, at the Old Bailey (it may be, there are some other particulars now); and after all the debates and arguments that could be used at that time, it was unanimously resolved, that the crime was high-treason: and if it was high-treason in Peter Cook, it is no less in sir John Fenwick, who was present at the same time, and engaged in the same business: for what was a crime in one, was the same in both.

I think it is too diminutive an expression, to say, this was nothing but a little twittle-twattle. They did there meet upon a solemn consultation; and not only once, but they did meet a second time; and what was it to do? It was to invite a foreign power to invade this land, and to make war with the king and kingdom; and they did promise and solemnly engage to assist them with armed forces; and it was proved, that they did agree with Charnock to go into France; and Charnock was not willing to go the first time he was desired, till he found they were staunch and steady in their resolutions; and upon a second meeting they were all found so, and then he would go: I think that is an overt act of treason, if there be any. And when he came back, he said he had been in France, and brought an answer to the message he went about: This is all now laid before you. But, say they, this is an extraordinary case; I do agree it; but because it is an extraordinary case, and for the safety of the king and kingdom, it is fit there should be an extraordinary remedy.

They ask, what mischief it would be if this gentleman should be left to the ordinary course of law? It hath been the wisdom of all ages to make a law, to punish such as by their artifice would evade the law. Here is this gentleman, as we say, guilty of high-treason; but that we submit to you.

This gentleman was in the prosecution of the law, and might have been tried in the regular way, and had the witnesses upon their oaths; (the grand jury have found billa vera upon their oaths) but we must appeal to a worthy member of the House (who because he was a member we did not call upon him) to give you an account how he did delay and protract his trial; and now they know he cannot be tried at all, they pretend he is willing to be tried: and because he cannot be tried, they would have it as an argument that he should not be punished by any other means.

Sir, if so notorious a crime as this is should be committed against the body of a nation, and go unpunished, either in the common course, or by some extraordinary methods, the nation would be in a doubtful and dangerous case.

What this House hath passed their judgments in this matter, it will go to another place, where it will have another examination; and it will have that regular consideration that all other acts have. We are in an extraordinary case, and do think, that this extraordinary case does deserve an extraordinary punishment.

Sir B. Shower. I beg pardon but for one word: no man does abhor such consults more than myself; but I do not think, that discourses are such an overt act of high-treason, as deserves the punishment of death.

Sir John Fenwick and the counsel then withdrew. And being withdrawn, Admiral Russel. I think this may be a proper time to ask questions: if so, I think myself enough concerned to trouble you with one or two. I think, in the paper [meaning Fenwick's informations] that hath been read, I am mentioned twice. These are the questions I desire to have asked, what proof he hath of this? whether ever he saw—? And, what proof he has that I sent captain Lloyd over, and that I gave him a list of the ships? And that I said, we could not fit out 30 ships in May? and whether or no, since this revolution he hath had any conversation with me?

Col. Crawford. What that honourable person says, calls me up; my name is mentioned in sir J. F.'s paper; I desire you would ask him, why he mentioned me in his paper, as he hath done? And that you would require him to make proof of what he says in relation to me.

Col. Godfrey. I desire some questions may be asked him in relation to a noble lord, my lord Marlborough: if he be guilty, I would have it known, and I would as willingly have it known if he be innocent, as I believe it will so appear. I would have him asked, whether, since the beginning of this war, or from the time of this king's landing, sir J. F. did ever speak to him, in public or private? Or ever did write to him, or receive any message by word of mouth, or letter, from my lord Marlborough? He says, that some service he had promised king James, inclined him to promise him his pardon: I would know what that service was? And in relation to his sending Lloyd into France, whether he can, by any body else, make that appear?

Col. Crawford. That gentleman hath put me in mind of one short question: whether ever he conversed or spake with me in his life?

Mr. Bridges. Whether sir J. F. hath any body but himself to support the hearsay he hath given an account of? And I desire a question may be asked him on behalf of the duke of Shrewsbury; what proof he has that the duke of Shrewsbury came into the office of secretary of state again, by the operation and consent of king James?

Mr. Vernon. I desire a question may be asked previous to that, because it is so in time; how he knows that noble lord was in treaty with king James, before he went out of the secretary's office, when he first came there?

Col. Granvil. I desire he may be asked, what proof he can give, that my lord Bath was to betray Plymouth into the hands of king James, or the king of France; and whatever else my father is accused of in that paper?

Mr. Harley. I humbly propose it to you for the method of your proceedings, since you take this method, whether it will save you time for you to look upon that paper, and ask him as to the several parts of it, what proof he can make of it.

Mr. Howe. I do not oppose sir J. Fenwick's being examined to this paper; but it might have been more to your credit, if you had examined him before your vote: [a vote made a little before, by which that paper was condemned]. But here are a great many gentlemen rise, to ask a man to that which he does not pretend to any proof of. The best way for saving your time is, I conceive, to have the several parts of the paper that does concern these gentlemen, read to him: and to ask him upon what grounds he gave the king that information. This will lead him into all that he knows of the matter.

Mr. Bowcawen. I am not against the question that is proposed last; but you may ask him that at last. But there is a noble lord that is reflected on in that paper, and that is my lord Godolphin: I desire you would please to ask the same questions as to him.

Lord Coningsby. I did intend to take care of my lord Godolphin; there is a hard reflection upon that noble person; but under favour, you must, I think, let him know you have such a paper; and then ask him in general, what proof he has to the particulars of that paper? And then you will do injustice to nobody.

Mr. Norris. There have been several questions moved by several worthy members; and, I think, the questions ought to be asked: but, I think, there is one previous question to all these: and that is, when you tell him that you have such a paper, I think the first question should be, whether ever he delivered those papers to the king?

Sir R. Delaval. I find I am named in that paper that sir J. F. hath given; I desire that part that relates to me may be read to him; and that he may give a reason why he hath said so of me and Mr. Killigrew.

Lord Walden. There is another mentioned, and that is commissary Crawford; I desire he may be asked, what proof he hath, that he gave Mr. — a list of the army?

Chancellor of the Exchequer. I can't blame gentlemen for asking questions that concern them or their friends: some are for reading of it to him, I am against that: but yet I would have you to enquire into this paper. And being you intended to do it, it might have been as well enquired into before Mr. Dighton came last to him. I think you may put yourself into an easy method, and avoid all leading questions; and ask him upon every name in that paper, as you come to it. What he knows of that gentleman? And ask him no other question.

Mr. Smith. I was standing up to the same purpose; I would not have you put words into his mouth, nor let him know by any question what answer he is to make.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, I am willing to do you any service I can: but here are long informations, and I never read them, nor know the contents of them, but as they were read at the table.

Mr. Attorney General. I think the method lately proposed will save you a great deal of time, and is proper for the discovery of the truth: that you will name the persons to him in order as they are in the paper, and ask him in general, What he knows of those persons? But when you call him in, I am not for asking him to the particular things he hath said against them in that paper; because that paper, though it is under his own hand, is not his own; and if he knew it then, he knows it still.

Col. Mordaunt. I won't pretend to propose any thing, only for the shortening of your time: If after you have informed him there is such a paper, that you should ask him, Whether he will own it? And then, What sort of proof he will bring to prove it? You will find he will either tell you, he will advise with counsel, or whether he will give any answer at all.

Lord Cutts. I have only one question to be asked sir J. F.; It is not a question that relates to any person named in that paper. I think there is no one person that he hath named, but is eminently known or believed to be in the interest of this government; and none but what are in some post of trust and employment in it. Then, I think it highly necessary to know, how it comes to pass that he hath had so much conversation with persons of that character, and none with those people that he hath been seen daily to converse with? And if he hath, why he hath not discovered them, as he hath done the rest?

Mr. Speaker. Is it your pleasure I inform him we have the informations?

Mr. Palmer. If I am not mistaken, when you first called sir J. F. before you, he referred himself to what he had informed the king; and referred himself to that paper, as often as you asked him any questions. And if you ask him general questions, I presume he will give you the same answer: Therefore, I think, it may be proper to ask him, Whether this is the paper that he delivered in, or not? Or otherwise, I doubt he will tell you, he knows nothing but what is in that paper. Now, if he refers to that paper, you may ask him, if he knows it again, if it be shewed to him.

Mr. Sloane. What this gentleman has said, has partly interrupted what I was going to offer; but as to what he says, That when he was here before, he referred to his confession delivered in to the king; we did not tell him we knew of that: But he put it further, That he was not bound to accuse himself, and that what he said might be given in evidence against him; and so far he was in the right:

For if he knew of any body that was concerned in a conspiracy against the government, that was misprision of treason at least in him. I don't question but it was a very mischievous contrivance; but if he should confess it, without some assurance of being indemnified, he proves himself to be guilty of it.

Mr. Vice Chamberlain. You are now upon the method of your proceedings. There is great suspicion whether this paper be sir J. F.'s own or no. If you will tell sir J. F. that in the paper in your hand he hath laid things to the charge of persons of trust, whom this house hath a good opinion of; and that this house desires to know, What ground he hath for it? if he does not think fit to give you an account of it, there is an end of your enquiry.

Mr. James Montague. The house seems to agree, that they will have sir J. F. sent for in: I suppose you will not have the counsel, nor solicitor, by; and when he withdraws, I desire he may be kept private from his counsel and solicitor.

Lord Cutts. By sir J. F.'s behaviour, when he first appeared at the bar, and by what he said then, I believe sir J. F. did tell you to this sense, That he had assurance from a noble person, that what he then said, should not rise against him in judgment; and I think he was told, If he dealt ingenuously, he might expect favour, or to that effect. I do, for the saving of time, mention it to you, to consider how far the house may give him security, that what he here says shall not rise up in judgment against him; and that if he dealt ingenuously he might expect some favour from this house.

Mr. Harley. You are upon the nicest thing in its nature, that possibly can come before you. I think before you call him in, it ought to be understood that the questions be very plain.

Mr. Manley. I think you have been well moved from the other side, That we should not read this paper to sir J. F.: And I am of that opinion from this consideration, besides what hath been mentioned: We are here in a judicial capacity as well as a legislative; and this paper I take to be an examination made upon sir J. F.; and as my memory serves me, some things he speaks of as matters of fact, which he does positively assert; which being contained in the same paper with other matters of hearsay, if you should read that paper to him, and ask him a question, Whether that be his paper? That, I doubt, will be contrary to the rules of law: For it will be asking, Whether this information against himself be true or false? And I think it does not become the dignity and honour of this great assembly, to ask him any questions that may make him accuse himself.

Mr. Vernon. I would observe to you, that he has not considered these two papers: The first of these papers I think the bill refers to, and that is under sir J. F.'s hand; and there he does charge nothing at all upon himself, but it is an accusation upon the persons named:

In the first paper he does say, 'There was a select number to manage the affairs of king James; and — was sent over, but they are not named; and afterwards he went about to explain it in the second; and the bill referring only to the first, I suppose you will confine yourselves only to the first paper.'

Mr. Chan. of the Exch. I would think of some way to reconcile these things you are going upon. For though gentlemen are in the right to press for these questions, yet I do not think it the business before you. Therefore I think you should acquaint sir J. F. that this paper hath been presented to you, which this house hath thought false and scandalous: But before he goes away, this house has a mind to hear what he would say to it; and let him say what he would upon that, then you would not lead him by any question. The first person that is named I have a great respect for, and am as willing he should be vindicated as any. The first question that you ask him is, 'What he knows of my lord Godolphin?' But that you should literally ask him questions, as the paper states it, I don't think it proper for this assembly to ask; for there are facts beyond the Act of Indemnity, many of them. After you have done with the paper, I have some questions to ask him: I take these matters to be false; but I shall have some questions to ask him which I believe will prove true.

Mr. Bridges. Before you call in sir J. F. I would offer one thing to your consideration: I think that paper you are upon is written with sir J. F.'s own hand. Why may it not be fit for you to ask sir J. F. if that be his hand?

Members. No, no.

Mr. Speaker. Is it your pleasure that sir John Fenwick be called in?

Which Question being put, it passed in the affirmative. And he was brought in without his counsel.

Mr. Speaker. Sir John Fenwick, this house does understand, that you have given informations against several persons of great quality, that have been in the government: and they do expect from you, that you should deal clearly and candidly with them, and give them an account of what you know in relation to these persons. I am commanded in the first place to ask you, 'What you know of my lord Godolphin, in relation to this matter?'

Sir J. Fenwick. I am under a double prosecution for my life: I know not but what I may turn to my own prejudice: I hope the house will not think it an obstinacy in me; and since this house have done me the favour to hear me by my counsel, I hope they will please to consider what they have said.

Mr. Speaker. No doubt the house will consider what you have said by your counsel, that is in reference to your own defence; but they do expect from you, as I told you before, that you do deal candidly with them: is what you know of this matter.

Sir J. Fenwick. Sir, I am under prosecution for my life: and, I hope, the house will please to consider, that I know not what inconvenience may come upon me by it; and I hope the house will excuse me, for I do it not out of obstinacy, but for my own preservation.

Mr. Speaker. You would do well to advise yourself well in this matter; it is of great concernment; the favour of this house, if you deserve it, may be of great kindness to you. I have only in command to tell you, what the house expect, and you are to consider how to answer it.

Sir J. Fenwick. I hope the house will not put me upon any thing that will hurt myself: I should be sorry to incur the displeasure of this house, but I hope they will consider my condition; and I am sure the justice and honour of the house is such, that they will not press any man to do any thing that may hurt himself.

Mr. Speaker. Sir, if you please to withdraw.

[Accordingly sir J. Fenwick withdrew.]

Lord Cutts. I would humbly propose something to you to save your time, and remove this inconvenience. The house have heard what sir J. F. says: I cannot but say, that in matters of blood we cannot be too tender; but that I would propose to you, if this house approve of it, is this: suppose you wave the whole matter to the last moment of passing your bill, and then I shall have something more to say to you in the matter.

Mr. Clerk. Now I think it may be very proper for you to proceed in your legislative capacity. I am glad the house have taken so much pains in the examination of the matter; and it is no small satisfaction to me, that the gentleman was brought to the bar upon this enquiry; very probable, another time may induce him more to comply than he does at present; though, if I may speak my opinion, there is little hope of the gentleman's answering your expectation here: and I think the first thing you are to do now, is to read your bill.

Mr. Pulteney. One of the allegations of the bill is, that his trial was put off upon several repeated pretences of making a confession. The counsel for the prisoner took notice that that allegation was not proved: the counsel for the bill told you, they must refer to a worthy member of this house, who could prove it; the worthy member is Mr. Vernon. I suppose, before you enter into a debate, on these will be after the second reading of the bill, gentlemen will desire to have all the evidence. And I find your order is, that Mr. Vernon do give in his evidence while sir J. F. is at the bar, and therefore I humbly move, that sir J. Fenwick may be called in while Mr. Vernon gives his evidence.

Mr. Speaker. I suppose if Mr. Vernon gives evidence, you will call in the counsel.

Members. Yes, yes.

Mr. Speaker. I pray, then, hear the motion.

that hath been made. Shall I put the question, that sir J. Fenwick and the counsel be called in, while Mr. Vernon does give his evidence?

Which question passed in the affirmative; and sir J. Fenwick and the counsel on both sides were brought in.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you that are of counsel of both sides; the house, before they proceed any further, was willing to hear the testimony of a worthy member of this house, which hath not yet been given; and they are willing that sir J. Fenwick and you should be present while it is given. Mr. Vernon, will you please to acquaint the house, &c.

Mr. Vernon. If I understand the counsel for the bill aright, that which they did appeal to me for, was about the protracting of sir J. F.'s trial, and upon what pretence it was. The account, Sir, that I can give of it, is this: that sir J. F.'s trial was put off, will appear best from the frequent adjournments of the sessions at the Old-Bailey for six or seven weeks together. For when sir J. F. was committed to the Tower (which was, as I take it) on the 19th of June, there was, I believe, a sessions to be held soon after; for, as I remember it, the first application that lady Mary Fenwick made for putting off sir J. F.'s trial was upon the 30th of June; and the petition was, that he might have some friends come to him to advise him how to make his application to the king: on the 30th of June or about that time, my lady Mary Fenwick did first propose, that somebody should be sent over from sir J. F. to the king upon some matters of importance, but did not declare what they were; but only that she was told there was such matters, and she had a proper person to send, and would acquaint the lords justices with the man, if he might have leave to go to the king: but afterwards my lady Mary Fenwick said she could not provide a person so soon; and, I think the 2d of July, she came and offered to go herself; and said, if it was not as much for the king's service, as sir J. F.'s benefit, she would not undertake the journey. She had leave to go, and would have capitulated, that the trial should be put off till she returned; but the lords said, when she should return, would depend upon her pleasure; but they would write to the king at the same time, and gave notice of her intention, and that the trial should not go on till they had an answer of their own letter.—There was a passage in the transport-ship going to Holland, and my lady Mary Fenwick desired to speak with sir John in private, in order to her journey; the same night she came back again, and said, she had considered of it, and said, she would not go; and several reasons she gave. Upon the 7th of July there was a noble lord that was in the commission for the administration of the government, said, he had had an application made to him from another noble peer, my lord Carlisle, who desired that he would go to sir J. F. for that he had been very earnest to speak with him. That noble lord did acquaint the lord justices with it, who acquiesced in what he thought fit to do in the matter.—He went the same day to sir J. F. and the next day the lords justices met again; he then told he had been with sir J. F. and that sir J. F. had told him, he had sent to the king; for he did not allow it should be otherwise communicated. My lords then thought it was fit to stay for the king's answer. This was the 7th of July; and by what accident I know not, but no manner of account came till the 7th of August, that the letter was received; but the 7th of Aug. the letter was acknowledged to be received; and the answer that then came to it was, that the king had not received any great satisfaction by the message; (I know not what it was) but that sir J. F. should be tried; but withal, that noble lord acquainted my lords justices, that the king was pleased to write to him, that what sir J. F. had to say, should be sent him in writing. It happened at that time, that the judges were upon their circuit; and there being the king's directions to receive what sir J. F. had to say in writing, that noble lord did undertake to go again to sir J. F.; and, I suppose, he did receive something from sir J. F. which he sent to the king: when the answer to that came it was in September, and that noble lord was at the Bath; and so it required a little time.—Why then it appeared, that the king's direction was, that what sir J. F. had sent to the king, he should prove it; and he should likewise shew his ingenuity in confessing what he knew of any other designs against the government: and the 10th Sept. as I take it, I was directed to go to sir J. F. who was then in the Tower, and to acquaint him with this message from my lords justices. Sir J. F.'s answer was, That he had no more to say, or some words to that effect; and then he must prepare for his defence as well as he could; but if he could speak with that noble lord, he should be glad to do it; but he was not come from the Bath, and direction was then given for his trial. Again, in the mean time, that noble lord did come, and he did go to sir J. F. and he brought an account from him, That sir J. F. would prove to the king, and make out what he had said; and was ready to give the lords justices satisfaction: and upon that, I was sent to sir J. F.; I carried the message in writing, which you may see when you please; and it was to ask him, Whether he was willing to make out by proof, what he had already said to the king; and whether he was ready, in compliance with the king's directions, to give the lords an account of what he knew of any design against the government? I carried sir J. F. this message, and he returned an answer in writing, That he was ready to make out to the king what he said, and would acquaint the lords with all the matter that he had not observed to the king; (his arraignment was then to have come on the 17th) but he did dictate a paper which was brought to the lords, which they thought fit to be sent to the king; and the trial was put off as to that time; and before we answer from the king came, it was (I believe) the beginning of October: and this is the account I have to give you.

Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen, you consider that this evidence is given, with relation to that part of the bill, that sets forth, how sir J. F. had delayed his trial by offers of confession. You have heard what the evidence is; if you have any thing to observe as to that point, you may speak before you withdraw.

Sir Tho. Powys. As to this matter, I can only say, that in itself at least according to our rules of law, it is not, in any degree, treason: what you will construe it to be, I cannot tell. We think it is only what is very usual when persons are under an accusation; they will put off their trial as long as they can: perhaps their witnesses may be out of the way, or something else may be the reason of it, and it does not carry any crime in itself; at least, not of the nature that this bill is of.

Sir Barth. Shower. We do think, with submission, that, considering the nature of the bill, and the particular case of sir J. F. will (in some measure) answer this fact: I take this singly in itself, as it hath been observed, not to consist with honour; but it does not import a crime, for any man to use little insinuations to put off his trial. But, suppose it was unlawful, or that which they call prevaricating: I hope it is far from making him guilty of high-treason, which is the greatest crime this bill designs to pass sentence for; and, I hope, you will consider, if it be an offence, it is so at common law; and the same evidence will prevail to bring sir J. F. to condign punishment by the common methods. And if it be no offence, I hope you will not by law make it an offence, so as to inflict the greatest punishment for this artifice.

Mr. Speaker. Mr. Serjeant Gould, have you any thing to say?

Mr. Serj. Gould. No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker. Then withdraw.

And being withdrawn,

Mr. Sloane. I propose it to you, Whether, if the paper be evidence, it should not be read in the presence of the prisoner?

Members. No, no.

Then the question was put for Candles; which passed in the affirmative, and they were brought in.—Ordered, That the counsel be discharged any further attendance at this time.

Mr. Melhoun. There can be no debate previous to the reading of your bill. I desire the order of the day may be read.

Accordingly the Order of the day for reading of the Bill a second time, was read by the clerk. Then the Bill was read a second time by the clerk.

And being afterwards opened by Mr. Speaker, and he having expected for some time, and no member rising up to speak:

Mr. Speaker. Shall I put you the question of commitment?

Sir Tho. Dyke. Sir, I hope you will not put the question of commitment until some exception is made to the bill; I am sure it is as liable to exceptions as any bill that hath been brought in a great while: it is a tender subject to speak of, the pretence of the bill being for the preservation of the king and government: and if I thought it was really so, I should be heartily for it; for I think there is no comparison between the value of the king's life, and that of private persons: but that hath been often said, but not proved; therefore, I think, I may tell you my reasons why I am against the bill. That the parliament hath a power to make such a law, is agreed; but I think it ought not to be used but upon extraordinary occasions, when great persons are concerned, that cannot be otherwise brought to justice, and when crimes do not fall under the denomination of the law, which is not the present case. This case is, that a gentleman is charged with treason; and it is proved but by one witness; though the counsel did say, that a consult to levy war was not treason. Now either it will not be the crime that is alledged, or it is not proved. Here you are judges, prosecutors, witnesses and jury: I would know in what country it is so? Besides, the witnesses are produced here, and not sworn; and upon the whole, there is but one witness. Sir, I am against the bill, and against it, as being of dangerous consequence.

Mr. Pultney. This matter before you is of such a nature, that as a debate is rising upon it, I hope all gentlemen will hear one another with the greatest attention that may be. The worthy member admits you have a power to pass the bill, and I do not find that contested by any body; though (with submission) the latter part of what he said, contradicted what he admitted at first; but since that is so much agreed, I shall say but little to it, and that is this: that without such a power as this, any government would be imperfect, and would want a sufficient power for its own preservation, upon extraordinary occasions. You have been told, this hath been an untrodden path; but, I believe, gentlemen are pretty well satisfied it hath not been so untrodden, and many precedents of that kind have been quoted; and the counsel against the bill have admitted, that there have been frequent precedents. An objection hath been made to some of them, that they were made in ill reigns; but I take it to be no objection, that the precedent was made at one time or another, since it is agreed, that we have such a power, and that that power hath been executed. The chief matter before you is, Whether in the present case, there is sufficient ground for you to exert that power? And upon that, give me leave to observe the nature of the crime of this gentleman, and the evidence that hath been brought to prove him guilty of that crime. His crime is high-treason, the highest crime in the law: it is for conspiring the destruction of the king, and the overthrowing of the government. The overt act which the bill tells you (and which is mentioned in the indictment) is his inviting li-

French force, in order to accomplish his design. If this crime would admit of aggravation, some other parts of the bill would aggravate it; but I think it will admit of none. The counsel at the bar made a doubt, whether or no, that which was laid in the indictment did amount to a sufficient overt-act of high-treason; and his argument he drew from a book that hath been put out by a learned gentleman of the house; but the gentleman could easily have answered himself; and, I presume, did not speak his own opinion. For that gentleman did write a book, called, 'His Majesty and Government Vindicated,' by which he endeavoured to overthrow the arguments in the other book of the other gentleman.—As to the proof before you, you have had the testimony of Mr. Porter, whose evidence hath been justified by the several convictions grounded upon it; and by the confession of several gentlemen, that have owned the fact at the very time when they have been going out of the world: and there hath been no evidence brought by the prisoner at the bar, that should invalidate the testimony of this gentleman. And so (with submission) you have one undoubted evidence, that does charge the prisoner with the fact mentioned in the bill: you have other proof that does not come up within the letter of the law; but you have strong circumstantial proof, that every gentleman will apply to his conscience in the judgment he shall give in this matter. One of the allegations in the bill, is, that he did, by repeated promises of making a confession, from time to time, gain a delay of his trial. It is a great presumption, that that was in order to a design that he had of seducing Mr. Goodman, that was one of the witnesses; for it was observed to you, what practice there was in the case, with the other evidence, Mr. Porter.—Sir, gentlemen have objected the consequences of making a precedent: you were very well told by a worthy gentleman that spoke the other day, near the place where I am, that in the case of a good parliament, it is not to be imagined that they will make use of this precedent, but upon as good a ground as you have now; and an ill parliament, they will have the same reason, for they will copy after the same precedents that have been made before, and will not stick at doing of it. Besides, let gentlemen consider the way of arguing: I have a power to do such a thing, and yet if I have such a ground as is sufficient, I shall not make use of it: to say you have a power, but shall not exert it, is as good as to say, you have no power at all. There were some precedents cited by a learned gentleman that spoke against the bill, and he particularly quoted that of my lord Strafford; and the act of parliament that repeals that attainder, was in part read to you: but, sir, the reasons given in that bill of repeal of my lord Strafford's attainder are, that it was obtained in a tumultuous manner, which influenced the parliament in doing of it; and that it passed in the house of lords, when most of the lords were absent; and at last, the king, when he gave his consent, by commission, to the passing of the bill, it was with great reluctance. It is certain, all these are reasons that are given; but there is not one that questions the parliament's power of doing it; though upon the trial, gentlemen may remember there was a doubt in the law, whether the evidence was sufficient. Sir, it hath been urged to you, of what ill consequence it would be, and how much injustice, to make a law to punish a man ex post facto; but that the parliament may declare that to be a crime, which was not so before, nobody doubts; and without that, the clause in the 25th of Edw. 3, signifies nothing; and I do not imagine it is a greater injustice to supply in point of form, as to matter of evidence, when the fact committed by the prisoner was against a known law, at the time when it was committed: and the rather, if I think that defect of form in the courts below was occasioned by the prisoner. It is a matter of blood, it is true; but I do not aim at this gentleman's life in it; but any man must believe he must be concerned in great matters, to bring to pass this great design; therefore, all I propose by it is, to get his confession, which in all probability we might have had, if the other witness had remained here.—Sir, upon the whole matter, I do think we have power to do this: I do think here is good evidence (I speak with respect to myself) to think him guilty of this crime. I do think, if this bill does miscarry, there is the greatest blow that can be given to your constitution. And give me leave to use this expression; I think, if this bill miscarry, it not only turns this plot upon you, but makes it impossible ever to come to the depth of any other; and for these reasons, I am for committing of this bill.

Mr. Newport. Sir, I am unwilling to trouble you at any time, but more especially at this time, when I am afraid I am like to speak against the opinion of the majority of the house; for I see gentlemen are in great haste for the commitment of this bill.—Sir, in this matter I look upon myself, as every gentleman here, to be a judge; and therefore, I will in this case, as in all others, go according to the dictates of my own conscience: I must be saved by my own faith, and never will pin my faith upon another man's sleeve: perhaps it may be, a weakness in my nature, that I am very tender in the matter of blood; but I hope gentlemen will not be in so much haste to commit the bill; for 'De morte hominis, nulla est cunctatio longa.' A gentleman below said, the other day, it was possible in his own private opinion, he might believe the prisoner guilty; and some notice was taken of these words: but, Sir, I would put a case for argument's sake, and would have it taken no otherwise; and I would go a little further than that honourable gentleman; and suppose that I knew, of my own private knowledge, that sir J. F. was guilty; yet, Sir, with humble submission, as a judge, I do not think it ought to weigh one way or another with me; and will give you my reason for it; for as a judge, I am to go according to my judicial knowledge, and not according to my private knowledge. It is a maxim, 'Nil est quod non sit iudex, si non sit forma iudicii'; and it puts me in mind of a case in Hen. 4's reign: two men travelled together, and one killed the other, and the judge saw it: afterwards that judge went the same circuit, and an innocent man came to be tried before him for it; and yet the judge, in that case, was obliged to go according to his judicial knowledge; all the judge could do (the man being found guilty) in that case, says the book, was, to require the judgment and execution, and to make application to the king for the poor man's pardon.—The evidence that is produced, is first a living witness; the next evidence was the confession of Goodman, taken before a justice of peace; for that, truly I did not think yesterday it was a legal evidence: I am sure in a court of law it would not be admitted; but the house was pleased to read it, and gentlemen, when they pressed it, told us, read it, 'valeat quantum valere potest.' Then if you strike this paper out of the case, with humble submission, there is nothing left but the testimony of captain Porter; and so then, in that case, you have but one witness. It would seem a little strange, that the commons of England, that lately were so very careful of the lives of the subject, and were so desirous of passing a bill, that did provide, that where there were two species of treason in one indictment, and one witness to one species, and another witness to another species, that that should not be good evidence to convict a person of high-treason; that they should be attainting a man for treason upon one single evidence! Surely they will say, we have mightily changed our opinions since last sessions. I speak not this upon the account of sir J. F.; I know him not, though I am not a stranger to his character, and I hear that is none of the best: I speak it as it may be my case, or any man's whatsoever. God knows, we live in an unsettled time, and how soon a precedent of this nature may turn upon any man whatsoever!—Amongst the great irregularities committed in the late reign, I thought that of Mr. Algernon Sidney one of the greatest strains I saw in Westminster-hall; for there, was my lord Howard a witness against him, and the next evidence was a book that he had wrote against sir Robert Filmore, which, I think, is printed since this revolution, and I have it in my study; and I hope, I shall not be hanged for it. That was construed to be calculated for a treason that hath not been committed above two months, and was the second witness to convict him; but that attainder was reversed, and it was fit it should be so; for I thought it a hard strain to convict him upon that evidence. I am very sorry this bill is brought into this house; nor can I imagine, after all that hath been said by the learned gentleman, why this man was not tried when there were two positive witnesses against him. All the reason this gentleman has told you, is, that he promised to make an ingenious confession: but any man might have easily seen through this confession, that it was only an artifice to abuse the king's best friends; nay, the rather, when this gentleman's brother had served this very government, but two or three years ago, the same trick. We know my lord Preston was attainted of high-treason, and then he must do something for his pardon; and he made an ingenious confession, as he called it, whereby he accused most of the great men; and when he had a pardon, though his confession was under his own hand, and delivered to the king, he denied every word of it; and what he told was to save his own life. My neighbour cited you several precedents; I have looked into a great many of them, they are mentioned in Rushworth's Collections, in the great Argument, that Mr. St. John made for passing the bill against my lord Strafford; and as to those precedents, all I can say is, I could not have come up to them, if I had lived in those times. The last precedent was of a cook that put poison into the pot of the bishop of Rochester: And what did they do? They did enact that he should be boiled alive.* I have a great honour for the present bishop; but if it had happened in his family, I should hardly have consented to the like.† 'Judicandum est legibus, non exemplis.' I should be glad this gentleman might suffer his due punishment; but I am not, by any means, satisfied in the passing of this bill: and as to what gentlemen say is the reason why this man was not tried, because it was thought he would have made an ingenious confession: Sir, if they have made any mistake, I will not help it by the passing this bill of attainder. I ask your pardon for troubling you so long: I am a judge in this matter, and ought to deliver my opinion. I hope no man doubts but I am as zealous for this government as any man whatsoever; but let what will come of it, I cannot give my vote for passing of this bill.

Mr. Solicitor General. This is a bill for attainting sir John Fenwick of high-treason: it is the greatest crime we know in the law; and, I think, the greatest crime known in a government. It is much greater than murder, or any

* See Foster's Report of William Nicholas's case (Crown Law, pp. 68, 69). The Statute 22 H. 8, c. 9, is printed at length in Rawl's edition: and by the preamble it appears, that one John Roose, a cook, had poisoned 17 persons of the bishop of Rochester's family, two of which died. John Roose, therefore, by a retrospective law, is made guilty of high-treason, and he is ordered to be thrown into boiling water, the idea of which new punishment possibly arose from Roose's having been a cook. thing else; because it subverts the government, and the law whereby these crimes are punished; and persons should be deterred from committing these crimes. It hath been made a question by the gentlemen at the bar (I think two of them), whether this matter that sir J. F. is indicted and accused of, is high-treason or not? I must confess I heard something of it without doors; and that they would make it out, that if he was guilty of the matter charged, it was not high-treason. I thought it somewhat a bold matter, but did not think they would have undertaken it in this place, though they might have pretended some flaw in the indictment: But it seems they have the authority of a good lawyer in it; and they have quoted one learned author, as they please to call him, though I take that for a great compliment: I believe they may mean myself; and they have done me some honour; for they say, my lord chief justice Hales was of the same opinion; and then said something of Dyer. Now he hath read something at large out of that author he spake of, and challenges any one to shew any opinion, that ever a conspiracy to levy war was high-treason within the statute of 25 Edw. 3. Now, I would give a challenge on the other side, that he would shew me any opinion before that time or since, that a design to depose the king is not high-treason within that statute. The author that he speaks of says that expressly in the matter of my lord Russel, and tells you particularly; and in 'The Government Vindicated,'* which was only an answer as to the prosecution of my lord Russel, there are several cases cited, that a design to depose the king was high-treason, and agreed to by that very person; and it always was agreed to be high-treason. Then take the state of this case, and that of my lord Russel: The great matter was, that he sent some persons to view the guards (it was said, in order to seize the king); this was evidence against my lord Russel, for a conspiracy to levy war: But it was said, that this was not so much a conspiracy to levy war against the king, as against the guards. But this is of a quite different nature: Captain Porter hath given you an account of it (and I think Goodman's examination is to the same purpose,) that they met in Leadenhall-Street, and consulted how to bring king James back again; and the only method they could think of, was to send Charnock over to king James, that he might prevail with the French king to send them 10,000 men, and they would meet him here with 2,000 horse: And for what purpose was this? It was to bring back king James again. I would be glad to hear if those gentlemen that were at the bar, or any body else, could say this was any thing else but a design to depose king William: And they cannot shew me one lawyer's opinion, but that designing to depose the king, was ever called imagining the death of the king, within the statute of 25 E. 3. The first resolution of this matter was pretty early; I think it was Henry 4.'s time, and that was pretending Richard 3 was alive, and that he was the lawful king: So that the matter is treason, as it is charged in the indictment. Then, as to the precedent, that it is an ill precedent: I must confess, I am not afraid of a precedent of this kind: I should be glad if these gentlemen should turn back, and see how many attainders have been by act of parliament. But I dare say, there have been more men destroyed by the irregular judgment of a commission of Oyer and Terminer, than by all the acts of parliament, whether legal or illegal.—As to what they say of my lord Coke, who mentions the attainder of my lord Cromwell and sir J. Mortimer; the gentleman pretends to repeat my lord Coke's words at large; but he did not deal so well as he ought to do by you; for he should have told you all my lord Coke tells you: that Cromwell was never brought to answer, never permitted to say any thing for himself, neither in parliament, nor where he was. Now, pray, Sir, is this the present case? Hath not sir John Fenwick been heard by you? I would be glad that gentleman, or any body, could shew me, that any person hath so fair an hearing before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, as sir John Fenwick hath had before you. As to sir John Mortimer, it is much of the same nature: My lord Coke says, there was a jealousy of sir John Mortimer's pretending to the crown; and because they suspected him, they did give out, that he said, that the earl of March was heir to the crown; and if he did not, he would pretend to it himself, &c. Now, says my lord Coke, this was but a bare pretence, and nothing else: He speaks as if he did not ever think him guilty of those words, and says, having indicted him, they not being able to proceed that way, they made it good by act of parliament, and he was condemned: So that what my lord Coke complains of, is, that these persons so condemned were never heard; and if this be the truth of the matter, these precedents (with submission) have no affinity with yours. But I believe this may be said in this case, sir John Fenwick hath been heard, and that more than ever, any one in parliament was before, in a capital matter.—As to the case of my lord Strafford, he had counsel assigned him to stand by and hear, but not to prompt him. If there arose any point of law, he was to propose the matter to the lords, and the counsel was to assist him by their direction. And in the case here before you, you have allowed sir John Fenwick counsel, not only to assist him in point of law, but to assist him in point of fact too. They have made answer for him; so that I say, he hath been tried fairer than any man ever was in parliament, be it upon bill or upon impeachment, that is, as to the matter of precedent. Then it hath been said, this would not be good before the judges. I must confess it; but the evidence captain Porter gave of his own knowledge of sir John Fenwick, every body will agree is what the law will allow. But he is but a single witness, and you ought not to proceed upon the evidence of a single witness. Let us see how the law stands upon the whole matter: You have made an act of parliament last sessions, and I own the law was before that, that there should be two witnesses in case of treason; but all that goes no farther than to trials in the King's-Bench, and commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, and gaol-delivery. And if you look upon those acts, it is very plain; for they refer mostly unto the judges, what they shall do in such and such cases: But then you will see what is the reason of making those rules; I think there was good reason that you should not put that power in persons below, that you have in yourselves: You give them rules to proceed by, and they are to keep up strictly to them; you may act by other rules. It is one thing when I command my servant to do such a thing, and another thing when I act myself. And there is a difference when a judicature is by few, and when it is by many; the law puts a greater confidence in many than in a few. The ordinary trial is by twelve jurors; but if it be a matter of an high nature, as an attain, then it shall be by twenty-four; and you do prefer a greater number in every thing to a few. It is said, though a judge do think in his conscience a person guilty, yet he ought not to make use of that private knowledge; and a case was quoted out of Hen. 4. But I think that judge might have behaved himself something better than he did; and sure I am, now he would be blamed. I do not say, that a judge upon his private knowledge ought to judge; he ought not: but if a judge upon the bench knows any thing, whereby the prisoner might be acquitted or convicted (not generally known) then I do say, he ought to be called from the place where he sate, and go to the bar and give evidence of his knowledge; and so the judge in Hen. 4.'s time ought to have done, and not to have suffered the prisoner to have been convicted, and then get a pardon for him; for a pardon will not always do the business: for there may be a forfeiture that the king's pardon doth not restore. But though we act as judges here, do we act only as judges? I thought we were as well triers of the fact as judges. There is this difference between the judicature of Westminster-hall and this court: They are to judge upon a fact found by a jury; but we act both the part of a jury in trying, and also of judges in judging what the fact amounts to: So that if a jurymen may make use of his private knowledge to acquit a prisoner, as (I think) nobody doubts but it is his duty to do, then every gentleman in this House may make use of his private knowledge to acquit the prisoner, or convict him.—I confess, for my part, I am satisfied, that sir John Fenwick is guilty of this crime for which he stands accused. I do think this crime is high-treason; I think there is no danger of a precedent in this case, if you convict him, being convinced upon the evidence you have heard, that he is guilty: I do own, if any gentleman think he is not guilty of meeting at the King's-Head in Lendenhall-Street, or at Mrs. Mountjoy's, for the purpose given in evidence, he ought to be against the bill; but I think, every man that is of that opinion ought to be for the bill. I am one of those that think he is guilty, and therefore am for committing the bill.

Mr. Harcourt. I can readily agree with the gentleman that spoke last, that high-treason is the highest crime in the law; and further, that the matter of the indictment that is mentioned in the recital of the act is undoubtedly high-treason; and I am sure he will agree with me in one thing also, that the greater the crime is that any person is accused of, the clearer the proof ought to be by which he is convicted.—Some gentlemen have begun their discourse in relation to the power; but sure it is no argument, because I can do a thing, therefore I will do it; because we have power to repeal Magna Charta, and all other subsequent laws, which have been made in favour of life and liberty, and property, by the same consequence we ought to do it: A better reason must be given me, before I consent to this bill.—Then for the precedents, it is said, there have been many, and many have been mentioned; and if I thought it worth while, I would mention many more you have not heard of. As for precedents in general, they are so far imitable as they are grounded upon true reason, and agreeable to justice; but I do not remember any one precedent of this nature, for a person in custody, forthcoming, to be tried, yet to be attainted without a trial at law, but what has been universally branded; and they all seem to be reproaches even to those ill reigns in which they were usually made; and rather to be marked out as rocks for us to avoid, than patterns for our imitation.—Before I particularly mention the facts how they stand before you, I would beg leave to observe upon the general method of your proceedings, and tell you what staggers me in it.—I have often heard this called a trial, and that we are the judges; the gentleman that spoke last gave us another title, and told us we were the jury also. I know no trial for treason but what is confirmed by Magna Charta, per judicium parium, by a jury, which is every Englishman's birth-right, and is always esteemed one of our darling privileges; or per legem terræ, which includes impeachments in parliament; but if it be a trial, it is a pretty strange one, where the person that stands upon his trial hath a chance to be hanged, but none to be saved. I can't tell under what character to consider ourselves, whether we are judges or jurymen: I never heard of a judge, I am sure not of a jurymen, before, but he was always upon his oath: I never heard yet of a judge, but had power to examine witnesses upon oath, to come to a clear sight and knowledge of the fact: I never heard of a judge, but if a prisoner came before him, the prisoner was always told, he stood upon his defence, and had not only a power to condemn the guilty, but to save the innocent. Have we this power? Suppose upon such a trial as this (if it must be called so) it may so happen, that a person that comes before us, should be the innocentest man in the world; what judgment is it that we can give for so much as such a person hath made his innocence fully appear? Is the Speaker, by his warrant, to send him back again to Newgate? You can't dispose of him otherwise, though you were satisfied of his innocency: but in such a case, the party must undergo a double trial, which is contrary to all the rules I have heard of. If I am a judge in the case, I beg leave to tell you, for my own justification only, what a definition I have met with of a judge's discretion: my lord chief-justice Coke says, it is 'discernere per legem'; and by that discretion I beg leave to consider this case: if judges make the law their rule, they can never err; but if the uncertain, arbitrary dictates of their own fancies, which my lord Coke calls the crooked cord of discretion, be the rules they go by, endless errors must be the effect of such judgments.—As to this particular case, I did expect from the gentleman that spoke last, that he would have told you there was a plain evidence, why you should go on to the passing of this bill; but instead of that, I am surprized to hear a thing mentioned, that in parliamentary proceedings a man may be hanged by one witness; certainly that is not to be taken for granted.—As to this particular case, I would take captain Porter as upon his oath, for supposition: You have one witness against sir John Fenwick of high-treason, and, with your leave, I desire to examine what you have more in this case.—Yesterday you voted a paper to be read, Goodman's narrative or examination; it is a different case now you have it before you to determine upon. Yesterday the question was only for hearing; but gentlemen now consider how far they ought to believe it, and the other evidence we heard. And first, there is some evidence that Clancy tampered with Porter, and gave him a sum of 300*l*. and so they would infer, because Porter was tampered with to be gone, therefore Goodman was. It was told us further (and I desire I may be informed if I am mistaken,) that Clancy said, he came from sir John Fenwick; and afterwards my lady Mary Fenwick said, she would make good what Clancy had said; and from these arguments they presume, that sir John Fenwick knew of it. Give me leave to tell you a rule I never heard contradicted, that presumption is to be made in favour of life; but to presume a man guilty, because Porter was tampered with by another, because he said it was by sir John Fenwick's order; shall we presume sir John Fenwick did it? Is hear-say to be evidence? Or is a man to be had to the gallows upon presumption? How often, and with how much reason, have we heard exclamations against judgments upon presumptions, invidious, constructive and accumulative treason? &c.—Gentlemen, there is some further evidence, and that is, of what was sworn at Cook's trial; and some gentlemen thought fit to have the record read, and an examination of what was sworn there. I can never go so far as to think it reasonable, that what evidence hath been given in one case should affect another man; but all this is to be answered, by calling it parliamentary proceedings. We doubt it is no evidence in the courts below, but they are mentioned with some kind of disdain, as very inconsiderable. In this case, I beg leave to say this in their vindication, that whatever the rules in Westminster-hall are, it is not therefore reason because it is a rule; but because it is reason, and reason approved of by long experience, therefore it is a rule; and if they make their rules for that cause, I hope that is a cause why we should imitate them: but I would not have those rules thought matters of form, but substance, or more properly part of the law itself.—Upon the whole matter; if no gentleman will give us a reason why this is evidence, but one witness, and that not upon oath: and if we are to come to our parliamentary discretion to supply that defect, the want of the other, it is a discretion I will disclaim all the days of my life. And I hope you will reject the bill.

Lord Cutts. If, sir, the gentleman that spake last had been speaking to Westminster-hall, I should think that he had shewed a great deal of reason, and spoke with a great deal of judgment; but since I think you are here upon a quite different foot; I shall not follow him (because I will not unnecessarily detain you) to answer every particular.—I remember, when the counsel for the prisoner first spake, they took notice to you, that precedents were pre-creative, and one begat another, and they are apt to multiply; therefore I do think, it is of the highest moment to you, what precedent you make to-night: and if any gentleman can be satisfied, that the precedent of passing this bill, will be of worse consequence than the precedent of not passing it, I shall humbly submit. I do think, sir, the matter before you is of the highest importance; and I must confess, it is with a great deal of satisfaction to myself, that I do see gentlemen seem to apply themselves with a great deal of seriousness to this debate. Sir, I shall not pretend to make a particular answer to what the counsel for the prisoner did say; as to the precedents of acts of parliament, I think this answer is sufficient at present for that, that if we have no precedent, we are under a necessity of making one. It is told us, that of all the precedents none will justify us in this proceeding; but at the same time it must be considered, that we are in a case, the like to which never yet happened in England.—The first thing I shall apply myself to, is the jurisdiction of parliaments; and truly, I think, it will be very necessary to say a little upon that. I have heard none call this power in question, the thing speaks itself; it is the legislative power, and the etymology of the word tells you what it is: It is a power that can make laws, and abolish them; a power that is superior to all other powers whatsoever, and we are part of that legislative power; and therefore I shall say no more to that, it being a matter agreed, that we have a power to proceed in this matter. Now I will take leave to observe something as to the particular case before you.— Though a gentleman that spoke some time since, did speak to you of the nature of the crime; yet, with submission, I think there remains something to be added to what he said. The conspiracy of which sir John Fenwick is now appears guilty, is not only against the life of the king, not only to depose the king, not only a conspiracy to raise a rebellion, but at the same time to contrive an invasion from abroad, and bring in a foreign power. I know not what better expression to tell my thoughts in, than by using a term which physicians use in some desperate cases; they tell you, there is a complication of distempers; and I think this is a complication of treasons; this is the highest crime, and it is attended with all the aggravating circumstances this crime can admit of. Now, in giving our opinion, and passing our judgment upon this matter, I think there are two considerations ought to guide us: there is a consideration we owe to the prisoner that is brought before us: and another consideration which we owe to the common security. As to the first of these, it being a matter of blood, wherein the life of an Englishman, the life of a man of his quality and figure, is at stake, we ought to proceed with all the calmness that is possible; and I do agree, if there was nothing but presumption, that ought to be in favour of life. But pray let us consider how this matter stands: let me desire those gentlemen that are of opinion we ought to have so much tenderness for the prisoner, to lay before them another scene, and sort of consideration, at the same time. I do consider the hardship (if I may use that expression) of passing this sentence; I do consider what a condition we had been in, if the contrivance that was laid had taken effect; that is the weightiest part of the matter before you: and though it was disappointed then, I know not how far off it is at present; this ought really to weigh with you. And I hope I may take leave, upon this occasion, to observe to you, what one of the wisest and best of the Romans said upon an occasion of this nature: he tells you, That a man that would consider his duty aright, must consider the matter in all its parts and circumstances; and when that is done, must act adequate, as well to the community, as to himself and his neighbour. I would apply that to the present case; and would desire those gentlemen that express so much tenderness in this case, to have some for the government, and themselves. It was told you, That the prisoner before you does not stand convicted of any crime; it was told you at the bar, that the most we ought to pretend to, is no further than to leave him in the condition we found him; I think, with submission, the prisoner stands convicted of high treason, with the rupture of the earth, and that is, the general consent of all mankind; for I will be bold to say, I do verily believe, that there is not one gentleman within these walls, nor that walks the streets, not a living soul, that doubts of his crime. But, Sir, I would put this matter yet further; I am not only satisfied in my own conscience and reason, of the justice of your proceedings, which ought indeed to be the foundation of every man's opinion; but I am satisfied, that in this way, there is no hardship imposed upon sir John Fenwick, if he will be his own friend: for I doubt not, upon what hath passed in this proceeding, that before things are brought to the last extremity, if sir John Fenwick be his own friend, if he be so much a penitent and friend to the government, and to posterity, to tell truth, and leave off his dissembling, and be plain; I doubt not but he will find favour. Now, Sir, I would beg leave only to answer one or two objections; for some things that have been said against the passing of this bill, I do not think material. One objection that seems to me to carry the greatest appearance of weight, was made by one of the counsel for the prisoner: he said, It would look strange in after ages, that the same parliament should pass the bill for regulating of trials in treason, and this bill of attainder. Sir, I desire you will please to observe how this matter stands; and, in the first place, as previous to that, I take leave to observe a few things: it is a proposition generally agreed to, and not to be denied, that that which is designed for the preservation of any creature, ought not to be made use of to their destruction. Now this treason bill was designed for your preservation, to screen you against the danger of arbitrary power, and the malice of false witnesses; and this bill of attainder is brought to screen both you and the government from your enemies, both abroad and at home. And I think the treason bill is no objection upon these considerations: besides, the treason bill was only made to be a rule to inferior courts. The learned gentleman that spoke last, told you, the rules of Westminster-hall were not rules, because they were observed there, but because they were grounded upon reason. Why, Sir, in answer to that, I will only take leave to tell him, that that which is reason in Westminster-hall, does not carry the same weight here. I think that matter was so well explained by the learned gentleman at the bar, that there need nothing be added to it. He told you very well, it is one thing what I trust to do by my servant, and another thing what I do by myself. It is very obvious to any man's understanding, if this power were lodged in the judges, what use they might make of this unlimited power; but no gentleman can mistrust any thing that shall be done by this house. Another objection that was made—counsel for the prisoner, was, says he, This is evidence, or it is no evidence; if it be evidence, then, says he, why do not you try him at law? If it be no evidence, why do you admit it here? Now, Sir, with submission, this carries the face and form of an argument; but if you take it to pieces, I think there is no convincing weight in it: for, Sir, the reason why this matter comes before you, is, because by the absence of one of the witnesses, according to the formal part of the law; sir John Fenwick will be acquitted; but it is generally agreed, that the consequence of so great a crime going unpunished, may be dangerous to your posterity. This bill of attainder is brought into the House, that you may supply that want of form, you being convinced of the reality of his crime.—Another objection made by the counsel at the bar, was as to captain Porter, whom he reflected upon; says he, shall a man that hath owned himself guilty of such a villainy as the murder of the king, of a sudden have such credit as to sway with you? I would take leave, upon this occasion, to repeat to you what my L. C. J. upon the bench did observe at Charnock's trial: The same thing was urged and pressed home by Charnock; and my L. C. J. was pleased to take notice, that it consisted with the wisdom and justice of all states and governments to allow of such evidence, because without it they could never come to the knowledge of any treason or conspiracy; for, he added, whom will you have an account of these things from but the actors of them?—And therefore, when they are penitent, and willing to atone for their crime, by doing all the service they can to the state, and justice to mankind, we ought not only to receive, but encourage them.—When the danger the government would be in, if you did not pass this bill, was urged; it was answered, but what danger will you and your posterity run in not passing of it? I think the matter appears so plain and clear before you, that when all the other parts of the question are passed over, I should think it a reflection upon the House, to enter upon a particular answer to it. I had not said what I have said, that I think any part decisive, but to clear myself to the world for the opinion I am going to give; and perhaps what I have said, may give occasion to some others to say something that may be much more to the purpose; but for the reasons I have given, I am for the bill.

Mr. Sloane. Sir, I as little care for meddling in matters of blood, as any man, and should be glad to avoid giving my opinion in this case; but I think it is incumbent upon every gentleman that hath the honour to sit here, in point of trust; I think it his duty to them whom he represents, to the king and kingdom in general, to give his opinion when he is clear and satisfied in it; and if I was in the least dissatisfied, I should venture the displeasure of the House to absent; but upon the whole case, and the proof that hath been given, I am very clear that sir John Fenwick is guilty of this treason, that he is accused of; and that it is treason without any strain, and well warranted by precedents.—I would first take notice of what is said to your jurisdiction in general; I remember it was said this was an encroachment upon Magna Charta; for by that, no person is to be tried for his life, but by the judgment of his peers. Those gentlemen that have made that objection, have intirely forgot the other parts, which is the next sentence; Nec super illius, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per regulare iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ. What do they make that to be? It is true, in the ordinary course of justice, persons must be tried, a commoner by a commoner, and a peer by a peer; but there are several sorts of trials and laws in the land: and when you come to consider what is meant by per legem terræ, you have the commons lex terræ; you have the statute law, and lex loci, the laws of particular manors; and there are several sorts of trials besides that by jury; there are trials by battle: the defendant in case of appeal may try it by battle, and he that is killed loses the cause. Then there is a law above all these laws, and that is the law of parliament, which my lord Coke calls lex parliamenti and lex parliamentaria in another place, which he says is, ab omnibus inquirendat but a paucis nota; and it is not fit it should be known how far they can go (and so it is in chancery), and that is a law that is unlimited, and that is one of the laws saved by Magna Charta. I say, therefore, that without any encroachment upon Magna Charta, or any law whatsoever, you enter regularly upon his trial.—I would answer another thing that was said against a trial in parliament; and I must confess, I did wonder to hear it from that honourable ancient member, that if he was to be tried, he should rather chuse to be tried in Westminster-hall. Why, sir, before I should have given so sudden a judgment as that, I would have considered what my case was: If I had had such a case as count Coningsmark, a bad cause and a great deal of money, I would rather be tried there; or if I could be tried as sir George Wakeman was; but if I had a good cause, and would use no corruption, instead of twelve men that might be corrupted, I had rather be tried by 4 or 500 gentlemen that are beyond it. You see how trials went below, the trial of my lady Lisle, that could neither see nor hear; and there came a person to her house that was proved to be in Montmouth's rebellion, and she was burned for it.—Then as to the case before you, I would offer my reasons why I believe this gentleman to be guilty; here is capt. Porter, he hath positively sworn, that he had another meeting at Mrs. Mountjoy's, and there they did consult, and agree to send Charnock over to France; and Charnock was directed to go with a message to invite a foreign power over here. Now the question is, whether he is to be believed; and I would go upon the same reasons for believing a witness, as they do in Westminster-hall; and will go as far along with those gentlemen, as to the credibility of a witness; but if he be to be credited in Westminster-hall, why is he not so here? And therefore, if they had brought any testimony against his credit, as made him guilty of perjury, or forgery, it had been an objection against his testimony; but it was so far from that, that they did not offer to prove one word of that ; but what was said was said from the counsel, and that is to go for no evidence. The counsel did indeed sledge against his credit several things, but did not prove any ; and if they had, they would not have taken away his testimony in Westminster-hall : that is, that he was concerned in the late intended assassination, and treason : this was the same objection that was made below ; and they brought witnesses to prove that and some other things, but they did not weigh any thing ; for if it should be an objection that he was in the conspiracy, then you can have no evidence of any villainy, for they will never trust honest men with it. Therefore I do take it, that Porter stands before you as a very credible good witness, without any imputation whatsoever. Then, sir, say they, he is not upon his oath ; that is an objection to your jurisdiction, and though they say they own your jurisdiction, yet when they say so, they speak against your jurisdiction ; and by the same reason you can go upon no impeachment whatsoever ; for you can in no case give an oath. Then, sir, they tell you, he is but one witness, and that it is in the case of treason, and there ought to be two witnesses ; and therefore though you have jurisdiction to do any thing whatsoever, yet you have no jurisdiction to go upon this cause. Now, sir, because this seems to be the most formidable objection that is insisted on against the proceedings in this case, I beg your leave that I may fully answer it.—And taking it to be true, that the fact is proved by one witness, I conceive we may proceed in this cause, though they can't in Westminster-hall ; and I do take it, that there is a great deal of difference between one and the other ; and I do not take your proceedings upon this bill, being there is but one witness, to be any strain, but what you may extend the legislative to, without going beyond what hath been done. I therefore beg you to consider what the law originally was as to treason, and how it came to be altered. Before the statute of 25 Ed. 3, it was uncertain what was treason, and what was not ; then the statute came and reduced it, that as to all inferior courts, these are your treasons, and no other shall be adjudged so ; but the parliament reserved to themselves a power, that if any case should happen like them, they were to determine it themselves. So, sir, that at that time, and after that time, one witness was good in case of treason : as now it is at this day for robbery, felony, or any other fact but treason. And till 1 Ed. 6, one witness was good in all treasons : Then comes two statutes in Ed. 6's time, and the first takes notice, That since the 25 Ed. 3, by several statutes treasons had been made which were unreasonable, and therefore repeals them, and makes several new treasons : Then comes a Proviso at the end of it ; ' Provided always, that no person whatsoever, after the 1st Feb. next coming, shall be indicted, arraigned, condemned or convicted for any offence of treason, &c. unless the offender be 'accused by two sufficient and lawful witnesses, or shall willingly, without violence, confess the same.' Now that Proviso relates only to the treasons particularly mentioned in that statute. Then comes the next statute 5 Ed. 6, and pursues the same words ; But now this did not mean any facts whatsoever that were left to the judgment of the parliament, because these facts were not within their cognizance. They are not parliamentary words ; indicted, arraigned, convicted, but only used by the courts below. Why, sir, if it be so that one witness is sufficient, here you have not only one credible witness, but he is propt up extremely well by collateral circumstances ; and though I do not allow that below they can proceed upon one witness with pregnant circumstances ; yet for the reasons given, considering how this evidence is propt up, I think it is sufficient before you : For there was another witness against him, and it hath been proved what that witness could have said if he was here ; and it is plain that men have died upon the same testimony. I must confess, when I was for reading of Goodman's examination, &c. I was not for reading them as conclusive evidence, nor do I think them so in any sort, either the conviction of Cook, or Goodman's examination before a justice of peace ; but it is a stronger evidence in this case than any other, because the witness is not dead, nor is he withdrawn by the means of any body but the prisoner, or his friends ; which, as I take it, appears upon the evidence ; and if so, I think it comes to the case, That if any one gets my deeds, if he will not produce them, they shall be presumed to be what I say they are. I must confess, the acting of his wife or any agent might not be evidence, if it appeared they did it officiously without his knowledge ; but being Clancy said he came from sir John Fenwick, and it was for sir John Fenwick's advantage, I will believe it was by his privity : And for myself, I think it no strain, if in this case we take him to be a good second to captain Porter, though it ought not to be admitted in Westminster-hall.—Then it is said, That you have no jurisdiction to proceed by attainder in this case, where the person does appear, and he is in the hands of the law, and ready to take his trial : I quoted you an instance the other day, 12 Car. 2, where they attainted persons that were dead, without examining one witness ; and I have viewed all the books since, and there is nothing appears, but the bill ordered to be brought in, one reading, and another, and some petitions for making of savings : There is one rank of people that were dead ; a second rank, which, as you were told from the bar, were the king's judges : some of which, it is true, were tried by the law : But how ? Not by the direction of the parliament : It was before they came into the hands of the parliament : and the parliament takes notice they had been tried. There was another sort that was never tried, but absented ; and though they might have come into the hands of the law and been out-lawed, the parliament took cognizance of them, and attained them of treason. Sir, I do take notice, that there was a fourth sort of people convicted at that time (for if we were confined to the rules of Westminster-hall, no doubt we could not give a lesser judgment than that for treason); there were the lord Mounson, sir John D'Anvers, and others; and the statute recites, that they were concerned in the murder of the king; yet in regard so many had actually suffered, they did not give them the judgment of treason but to forfeit their estates, &c.—This is to shew you the jurisdiction the parliament have over offences, and how they can alleviate the punishment according to the circumstances as they appear before them; therefore I think this is a plain proof that we have a jurisdiction to go on with the bill; and at the same time, I say this, I would put it out of the case, whether the prisoner be a little man or a great man, that is now in judgment before us; and I would put it out of the case, what a good thing his discovery would be; I do not think that a good argument: neither do I think it any argument if this man escape, what danger we shall be in: But I do give my judgment from the argument of his guilt, and our jurisdiction.

Mr. Pelham. Sir, the learned gentleman that spake last, seemed so very clear in his opinion, when he began to speak, that I was in hopes he would have given me and every body satisfaction in this great point, especially when he began with Magna Charta, which says, That every man shall be tried by his peers, or by the law of the land: I do take it to be part of the law of the land, that no man should be condemned for treason without two witnesses; but after that he did lay his finger upon the sore, he told you, the great objection was, that the courts of Westminster hall are so governed and tied down, that they cannot pass any sentence for treason, but upon two witnesses; and he told you, they ought to be tied so: Indeed he did say we were not tied so: But I own to you, he did not give me any satisfactory reason why we should not be tied so. It is said, we are not tied, and it is impossible we should, for no act can tie the legislative power, and several gentlemen have said, that though there are several statutes that declare there shall be two witnesses in cases of treason, yet they do say, that in case of attainder by parliament, one witness may be sufficient. Why may it not be thought, that these acts extend to the legislative, as well as the statutes of Ed-3, by which it is presumed, that the parliament may proceed upon one witness? And I take it, that there being no such hint, it is a presumption that the lex terre does crave an observation of it by the legislative power.—I did presume yesterday to tell you, that Mr. Algernon Sidney did stand upon it as his natural right, that they could not proceed against him, there being but one witness; I did not bring his case as parallel to this, or think that his authority should influence you; but he was a man that had that love to liberty, and the good of his country, that he would not have said so, even to save his life, if he had thought it inconsistent with either of them. But I have looked upon his trial since, and there he does declare, that the being condemned by two witnesses, is the law of God, and the law of man; the just law that is observed by all men, and in all places; it is certain he reached even by these words, the power of parliament; when I do say power, I do not mean, but that when such a law is passed, all are bound by it; but in some sense we may say, you cannot do what is not just for you to do; you can do but what is just and agreeable to the trust reposed in you.—The gentleman says, he thinks it a strange opinion of him that said, he had rather be tried by a jury than the house of commons: Indeed, if he could be sure of such a house of commons as this, he might retract what he had said: But I have seen that 'done in the house of commons, which hath not made me extremely fond of that trial. I have sat here when 6 or 7 noblemen have been declared enemies to the kingdom without any evidence at all, and the reason was somewhat like what it is now. The power of parliaments was brought in as an argument then; and it was said, it was only in order to an impeachment, but no impeachment followed; yet these noblemen went with that brand in their foreheads; and if any disturbance had been, they had been exposed to the fury of the people: And though we are sure of this House of Commons, and may be of all in this reign, yet I know not how facts may arise, and what parliaments we may have; and upon that account I am very unwilling a precedent should be made, at least contrary to the usage in all manner of courts whatsoever.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Sir, I shall not trouble you long in this debate, that hath taken up so much of your time already, in the consideration of some matters we have been upon; though I did think your time not very regularly spent, till this occasion offered itself: I hope, therefore, now it will take up less of your time. I see the great matter that was insisted on before, is insisted upon still; and I do think we may say it among ourselves, though we would not let the counsel, that we are tied up in this case by the rules of Westminster-hall; but I believe if that was the case, and the question was no otherwise, than, whether or no we are tied up by the rules of Westminster hall? I believe it would receive a determination, that we are not bound up to those rules.—But I will take leave to tell you what I think is proper for us to ground our judgment on: I think one great reason even of those who are against the precedent, why they did admit sir J. F. to have counsel, and to examine witnesses, if he had any, and to cross examine the witnesses, and why they were willing to hear evidence on both sides in the nature of a trial; the great reason was, because that in a case of so great consequence as this is, they would have the best information they could obtain. Why did they desire to be informed; but that afterwards they could lay their hands upon their hearts, and give their judgment upon their private opinion, whether he was guilty or no? They say we are not to give our judgment upon our private opinion, I always will. (It was not long ago we were not to have our religion upon our private opinion neither :) And when I am justified in that, I will rely upon it. Whether this be strictly legal evidence, I do not lay so much weight upon it, as whether it hath satisfied my conscience; and I believe there is not a man in the House but is so (upon what he hath heard,) and doth believe that sir J. F. is guilty; and if we believe he is guilty, I would be glad to know by what rules in the world any man can give his vote against this bill, being of that belief. And I tell you why I think every man believes so; because every man in the kingdom that hath not heard so much as we have heard, does believe him to be so; and I cannot think that their representatives only should be of another opinion.—What evidence have you had? You have had capt. Porter's evidence, and that would be good even in inferior courts; and besides that, you have the evidence of what Goodman did swear before the grand-jury; you have heard what he did swear, and the grand-jury did believe him; you have heard likewise what he did swear in another cause to the petit-jury, and they believed him, and convicted the prisoner upon it: And though this be not legal proof, strictly speaking, will any body say that I have reason to disbelieve this man, and think he had sworn false?—Ay, but here is but one witness, gentlemen tell you. I will put you a case where I believe this house would attaint a man without any witness. Suppose two persons had seen sir John Fenwick kill the king (I believe we should not have pulled him in pieces in a barbarous manner, but he would have had a trial) and suppose before his trial they had been conveyed away, if before they had sworn this to a grand-jury, and they had found the bill, I believe this house would have attainted him for it.—Sir, I do not think that we should stand upon these little niceties, nor be bound by the little formal proceedings of other courts, when the government is at stake. We are sent hither to take care that the public safety do not suffer any mischief from the enemies of it: We have had plot upon plot, and I have heard so much said on behalf of the Lancashire plot without doors, that I wish we do not get an ill name upon ourselves before we have done. We have this power to exert upon extraordinary occasions; and here is a man that hath endeavoured to subvert the government and well-being of them that sent you hither, I hope you will use it now; and if they knew who were not of that opinion, I believe those that sent them would hardly send them any more.

Mr. Howe. Sir, as to the argument, that if it was known how we gave our opinion, those that are against this bill, the people would not abuse them again: I am not afraid of that; I have been told so often, and yet I find the people I live amongst, use me better and better every day; and I believe, sir, they will desire to use me, when they will lay other men aside. I must in some measure support what seemed to be reflected on an honourable gentleman, in that he said, he had rather be tried by 12 than 400. I am of his opinion, and this is my reason for it; I have my lawful challenge in case of the 12; and if there be any on the pannel I have offended, I can desire they may be withdrawn, and that cannot be done in any case here.—But gentlemen put the stress of their argument upon that which nobody denies, and prove it handsomely; and well they may; for it is self-evident, the power of parliament they insist on, when nobody pretends but we have a power to do what we please; but I must say of their power, what Bracton says of the king's power. 'Hoc tamen non potest facere, quod non potest justè facere.' It is said, We are not tied up to the rules of Westminster-hall; we are not so; but I beg leave to tell them, that what is reason and justice in Westminster-hall is so every where. And I do take these particular points we speak of, to be grounded upon reason and justice, and so far we are to pursue them.—Two evidences was not given as a restraint upon Westminster-hall, for fear they should do something that is ill, for they are answerable for every thing they do ill; but they were allowed to the people of England, that they might have a fair trial; and it was thought conformable to the laws of God, the law of reason, and the law of all countries, that no man's life shall be taken away upon any particular occasion. And for to say, that a man's life may be taken away by two witnesses in one place, and by one in another, is to say, that there is no certain rule to prove a man guilty of a crime that may forfeit his life, which is not admitted in any country whatsoever.—But truly, sir, we are going a little further; for the gentlemen before told you, there was no need of two witnesses, one would serve; but now they go a little further, for they tell you, there needs never a one at all; for I do say, if every gentleman here is to be guided by his private opinion, there is no man but before he heard this cause did conceive in their opinion some judgment of his guilt. And, sir, I think no man but would have told you, that would have been an unjust judgment.—But they do say, That the bill of treason that was made last sessions of parliament was to limit Westminster-hall: and that I will trust that with myself, which I will not trust with my servant. Why truly, if I, or my servant, was to commit an error, or a great crime, I had rather my servant did it, than myself: but I do not think that my servant should be bound up from doing an unjust thing, and myself should have the liberty to do it. Another thing that law provided against was, that people should not be hanged without sufficient evidence, and these things have been long complained of: but I never thought that the evidence of one witness, and no witness, would be supported in these days.—But, sir, what have you done? We have prevented people being executed by an arbitrary power, and in an unlawful way in Westminster-hall: but if you give this example, you have brought the same proceedings into this house, and that they may be perpetually executed here, and so the subject will be never the safer for the bill of treason.—And I do believe likewise, That it is better that a very heinous fault, or a mistake, should be committed in Westminster-hall for ten years together, than once perpetrated in this house: and my reason is this, because Westminster-hall have a law to be tried by, if they transgress that law; and there is a way by turning out of judges, and other things; and this house hath no superior power; and when they do a thing, they make it a law; so that this house (as it hath often been observed) can make this nation unhappy, because this house can only establish arbitrary power and misery upon this nation by a law.—Sir, as to the evidence, to say something to it, since every body hath spoke to it; for my part, I do confess to you, the longer I sit here, and the more I have heard of this trial, the less I have been convinced within myself, that these witnesses can know any thing of sir J. Fenwick's guilt. I have heard captain Porter give his evidence; but that is no sufficient proof to me: I have heard what evidence Goodman did give to the grand jury; but whether they did ask such questions as I should, if I had been of the grand jury; or whether they did confront him with evidence, I cannot tell. Therefore though the grand jury was convinced by it, it is no reason to convince us; because we might not be convinced by the same evidence.—But to go further; there is very great reason to believe that Goodman was not then at this place, and that not one word that Goodman says is true. I have such reason for what I say, that if Cook's trial had been before this house (not to arraign Westminster-hall, though I think we are a superior power, and I may say what I please of that trial); I say, if Cook's trial had been before this house, and what I have heard be true, I do think they would hardly have found Cook guilty upon Goodman's evidence: for there were three as positive evidence as could be, that he was not at the place when he swore he was. And I observe a little failure in captain Porter's evidence in that point; for I do not think it proved by captain Porter, that Goodman was by when this discourse was: for he says, he spake of this thing at Mrs. Mountjoy's, and dined there. [Members. No, no! It was at the King's-hearl.] Well, there was but one place where it was. Now whether captain Porter heard them talk of it before Goodman came in, or whether Goodman be a good witness, he having been there but the latter part of the time, which seemed to me to be the time they should have given over their talk of the business, they having been so long together before; but it does not appear to me that Goodman can be a good witness.—But I take it, that it is not just nor reasonable to find a man guilty upon one witness, and circumstantial evidence. I did mention a case where there was a positive witness, and a circumstantial witness, it was in my lord Delamere's trial; and yet that was not thought a convincing argument by the lords to find him guilty; and I hope no consideration will oblige us to do that, which I am sure we should blame them for doing.—The consequence of this, gentlemen say, they do not fear. I believe, if sir J. F. had been told, when he was major-general of king James's army, that I should come here to sit upon his life, he would have laughed at it, and thought it impossible; but the contrary has happened: And I have seen parties hang one another with such violence, I pray God we may keep from it: I do not know; we are all concerned in some measure, it having been the unhappiness of this nation, that at one time or another every body hath been concerned, that they may have a proceeding of this sort against them; and this surmounts all that at present gentlemen can do; for it extends beyond all pardons, and will reach beyond the act of Indemnity. God knows who may be served so, notwithstanding all the act of Indemnity.—Sir, there is one thing that is said further, which the gentlemen at the bar conclude with as a substantial argument, that we do not aim at sir J. F.'s blood (God forbid we should), but at his confession: You will hear read the bill once, and twice, will commit and pass the bill, (sir J. F. not confessing), and still this is not to aim at his blood.—But it happens, perhaps, that this man knows no more of this matter; and this man is racked in a manner to death, from reading to reading, because he does not confess; and at last he comes to be hanged, drawn and quartered (instead of high-treason) for not confessing it.—This I take to be the dangerous part of all the arguments that have been urged: For this I must tell you, That according to my private opinion, I do believe that sir J. F. does know of no more persons concerned (nor do I believe he knows all that he says) than he tells you. He hath not been a man that hath kept company with great men: He hath generally relieved the poor Jacobite officers: There are five people, as I take it, he hath told you he did converse with: I would fain know in what plot any man converses with above five of the plotters? There may be a plot that may be most dangerous, and yet a person that knows of this plot, may not know above two or three others that are concerned in it.—But the great argument is, Take care of your government. In the first place, they must suppose the safety of the government depends upon his execution, or why do they use it as an argument? But I wish they would shew me the government would be one penny the worse, if the bill does not pass. Do you want examples of punishment to deter men. No; you had lawful proof against four or five persons, and they have been executed;

Here are examples made, that nobody for the future may presume to plot together, and not be executed.—What is the reason of this bill then? Why, there is a plot going on. Sir J. F. hath been imprisoned this six months or more; and will you hang him because there is a plot going on? What consequence is that? Do you think that he knows any thing of it, or that he can discover it? It hath been started since his confinement, it may be, and he knows nothing of it: So that as to what is pressed of his confession, I know no one thing would be gained by it, that could be useful to the government; for I believe all hath been discovered already that he knows, and that plot hath been utterly disappointed, and they have been fain to make a new one. Will you proceed in a bill of attainder, unless the matter be of the greatest consequence? The preamble of the bill for attainting the duke of Monmouth, gave a substantial reason for it; That he was in arms, and could not be brought to justice. That implied, That if he could have been brought to justice, they would not have attainted him.—I think I need not give you more arguments in this matter; I wish I could hear those that have been given, well answered. I shall say no more, but I know this, that my private opinion shall never guide me in this case. It is not the same thing with the case my worthy countryman put: In the case of religion, my private opinion does not affect other persons; indeed it does the papists, where they will murder others that are not of that religion.

Mr. Norris. This is a very solemn debate, and it is upon a very solemn occasion. It is a case of blood; it is a case that in my life-time, I thank God, I never had to do with yet; and in this matter wherein I am now to be judge, I will use as much caution as any gentleman within these walls. I am so conscious to my own inability in what I have to say, that I cannot expect to convince any body; but what I say, is to discharge my own duty, and satisfy my conscience in that. I doubt not but every gentleman considers the station that he is in, and the trust reposed in him by those that sent him hither: we are intrusted with the lives, liberties, and properties of every man in England; and we are answerable for them to those that sent us hither, to our posterity, and to ourselves. In this matter, many things of great weight and importance are before you: here is the life of a man, the preservation of the king and government, and the power of parliaments to be considered. Sir, as I shall be cautious of taking away the life of a man, so I shall be careful of the preservation of the king and government, and the power of parliament; and though I do not think it requisite, nor never will give my consent to support the government or honour of this House at the expence of innocent blood; yet I shall not be afraid of giving my opinion in this matter, to bring a criminal to punishment: besides the treason he hath committed, he hath crimes of a nature almost equal to treason; and for which, because he hath evaded the cognizance of Westminster-hall, he is now brought before you; and there are several instances, where this House hath taken notice of offences of a less nature, and for a less reason than this is brought before you.—To quote precedents is a little dry subject; but however, I will instance in one, that (I think) does assert the power of parliaments in this case, which has not been mentioned yet; and that was (as I remember) in 3 Rich. 2. of an agent that came from Genoua, who was, by a misfortune, killed upon a quarrel that happened in the streets; he that killed him was brought to his trial; it could not be brought within the statute of 25 Ed. 3, but he was brought to his trial, and it was found only se defendendo; but he being a public minister, it was thought fit that the nation should take more notice of it: and he was attainted afterwards by parliament, and there is a record of it: they did not think fit to make a general law, but they made an example of the man that committed this fact.—A great many gentlemen have supposed this, and supposed that, and what ought not to be supposed; but I will make an easy supposition; I will suppose that we are the Commons of England in parliament assembled; and if so, sir, we have a discretionary power to do whatsoever we see is for the good of the kingdom; and if we are to be circumscribed by the rules of Westminster-hall, and we are to do nothing but what they would do, to what purpose do we sit here; If we are intrusted with this power, and may exert it, I think here is a fit occasion for you to exert this authority.—Sir, give me leave to take notice, that the strain of argument that was used some years ago, is very much altered by the same gentlemen; (I will mention it) I think it was 1678, when the bill of Exclusion was brought within these walls; the arguments ran then (for I have seen them in print) those that were against that bill; What will you do? say they; Will you do this thing? Pass a judgment against a man without hearing of him? Hath he been brought to your bar, to answer what you have to say against him? How do you understand that he is guilty of the crimes you accuse him of? And they did not use those arguments against them that were for disinheriting the duke of York: But the answer then was, Do you dispute the power of parliaments? Is there not a discretionary power in the parliament? I do take notice, that those gentlemen that used that argument for the bill of Exclusion, now use it a quite contrary way. Sir, I think the power of parliament is not to be trifled with.—It hath been urged, and said a little while ago by a gentleman, That he does not believe captain Porter is a good witness. I will give you a good reason why I do think he is a very good one, and they at the bar think so too, because they would have given a great reward to have taken him off; and for the same reason, I believe Goodman to be a good witness too: Sir J. F. was satisfied, that Goodman did know how far he was concerned, and he hath been prevailed with to be out of the way.—Sir, here are a great many circumstances that agree so well together, that (I think) no person can doubt of sir J. F.'s guilt; and, I think, it is in this case in the body politic, as in the body natural, when a man is almost past the cure of physicians, when a man hath a gangrene, or a rotten member, which the physicians by the ordinary means cannot cure, the remedy the college of physicians themselves in that case would use is, they would say, ‘Immedicabile vulnus ense recidendum est.’—I am of opinion, that the legislative hath this power, and that this is proper occasion to exert it; and to compare small things with great, it is like thunder and vengeance in the hands of Providence, that is not used but upon extraordinary occasions; and then it ought not to fail, for that makes a man trifle with, and despise that power that is not effectually able to exert itself; and if the sword of justice be drawn, if they find it rusty and will not cut, they will have a mean opinion of your power for the future.—Gentlemen are afraid of precedents in this case; for that reason I am for committing this bill, because I would make this a precedent; and I will tell you why; Because it may happen in future ages, that ministers of state, and persons concerned in the government, may be faulty, (I think I may suppose that); and as the law stands now, he is but a bungling politician that cannot ruin the government, and yet not come within the bill of treason to be hanged for it: And therefore for the keeping an awe upon ministers of state, and because I would have this House always have it in their power to punish future offenders, as they shall see cause, as well as this unfortunate gentleman at the bar, I am for committing this bill.

Mr. Finch. Sir, the question now before you, arises upon a case wherein you have a man accused of high-treason, and for that there is but one witness, which by the rules of Westminster-hall is confessed by every gentleman is not legal evidence. I remember the other day, when this evidence was offered, and an objection made to it, the answer was, That we ought to hear it (though in Westminster-hall they could not do it), because we sit here as judges, and we can distinguish what is legal evidence, and what is not legal evidence, and can give its just weight to every part of it. I do observe now, in this debate, some part of the evidence, which no man can say could have been given according to the rules of law, is insisted upon, and weight laid upon it.—And here they have taken into consideration the power of parliaments; and the method of parliaments has been insisted upon. As to the power of parliament, Whether the parliament can do it? And whether, if the parliament pleases to do it, they are tied up, as gentlemen are pleased to express it, to the rules of Westminster-hall? That the parliament can do it, it is a hard matter to gain-say, That any thing is out of the reach of the supreme power of a nation, the legislative authority can do every thing: Yet, though gentlemen have said this, and others have observed, That there wanted no authority to prove this, being self-evident; yet give me leave to instance in some particulars in this case, with the authority of the judges upon it, where the parliament have proceeded according to the rules of Westminster-hall.—We read in Hen. 8th's time, That the lord Cromwell, earl of Essex, was attainted in parliament; and history tells us, That he was attainted by a law of his own making. Now, says my lord Coke, That seems strange; but enquiring of an ancient person that lived in those days, he told him the meaning of it; that lord had consulted with the judges, Whether or no, if a man was attainted by parliament, and was not brought to be heard, such attainder would be good in law? The judges started at the question, but could give no other answer than this; Truly, if such attainder be made, we know no law to find fault with it, for it is done by the legislative authority. It fell out, that the instance of condemning a person in parliament (not according to the rules in Westminster-hall) fell out to be the nobleman's case; for he himself was so attainted immediately after.—Give me leave to instance in another kind of authority, the authority of parliament touching these attainders, and what has been the consequence of them; If you will look into the record of Rich. 2d's time, I do not mean the record that hath been quoted, nor the case of John Imperiall, for killing the Genoua ambassador, which was declared treason in parliament ten years after the man had been tried in Westminster-hall for it; but I mean the 11 Rich. 2, how many were attainted by the proceedings of those times; I do not mean by acts of parliament, but those attainders were in an extraordinary manner, not according to the rules of Westminster-hall: And 21 Rich. 2, the whole parliament, and its whole proceedings were reversed, and the parliament annulled: In that year were the persecutors of the 11th year themselves attainted: And 21st year of Rich. 2, the act that repealed that parliament repealed the pardon too; but in order to come to the attainder of those persons: that being done, was not enough; for the lord Arundel had a pardon the 17th of Rich. 2. Upon that they made a law to repeal his pardon by patent, that they might come to the attainder of that lord; and that lord was attainted by act of parliament. But I must observe one thing a little further, that that very parliament, that doubtless knew their own power well enough, and that their attainders were firm, being made by the legislative power, yet they had a little jealousy themselves of their proceedings; for they passed an act to make it capital to go about to reverse any of those laws; and another act, that all the lords and bishops should be sworn. Now see what fell out after: Rich. 2, was deposed, for consenting to those laws; and Henry 4th, in the first year of his reign, abrogated the whole parliament; and repealed all those laws. These turns have been upon these extraordinary proceedings of parliament.—Give me leave to give you another instance, and that in another case, as odious as possible could be. In the murder of Edw. 2, there was Roger Mortimer attainted in the first year of Edw. 3, and the record says, That it was notorious to them all: and what then? They adjudged him to be attainted in parliament. When time had a little worn off that extraordinary zeal (which truly was commendable, though it had transported them a little too far beyond the rules of justice), and they came to consider what precedent they had made for posterity, it had another face; for in 28 Edw. 3, was that attainder reversed, because he was not brought to answer as he ought to have been. There was also an act for attainting the earl of Arundel, which in the same 28 Edw. 3, was reversed, because he was not brought to judgment by due process of law.—But now we are told, we are not tied here to the rules of Westminster-hall. Gentlemen do not enough distinguish in this matter; the forms of Westminster-hall, say some; the rules, say others; and others say, there is no difference between the form of proceedings, and the rules, of Westminster-hall; but I hope no gentlemen do think but the parliament, though they have a power to act as they think fit (as instances have been given), yet the parliament itself are tied by the rules of common justice. Now I would have gentlemen that say we are not tied by the rules of Westminster-hall a little to consider the matter. Are the rules of Westminster-hall no other than what are necessary for the executing of justice? If they are no other, how can we be said to go according to justice, when we go beside those rules? I desire them to consider of the consequence of this proceeding; there is no danger, I hope, of this parliament: but if we shall say, that the rules of Westminster-hall are not such as are necessary for the proceedings in a course of justice, we shall shake those barriers of our liberty and property, I am afraid, a little more than gentlemen think of at present: and shall we declare they are not necessary, when our ancestors have thought them so, and their wisdom hath derived them to us, and the wisdom of the nation in parliament hath established these rules?—I can't say what consequence may follow upon this. This parliament can never do any thing to endanger the lives of the people of England; but heretofore parliaments have been damned with several brands, set upon them by succeeding parliaments: as for instance, one, I think, in the 38 H. 6, 39. That parliament was wholly repealed, as packed, and passing laws through rancour and malice, and having passed no good ones. Now, suppose a parliament should come, that should not be so tender of the liberties of the people as this; and they should be so bold as to shake those laws that are made for the rules of justice, if they have so good a parliament to guide them in it: will not this be an inducement to such a parliament as that, to shake all our laws and liberties? But I can't trouble you any longer, my head will not give me leave. I am against the bill, and have offered you my reasons.

Col. Wharton. I hope gentlemen, in a matter of this moment, will have patience to hear one another; and since every gentleman is to give his vote in this matter, I desire to give my reasons for my vote: I am of the opinion of another gentleman, that we have not touched the sore yet; yet I do not think, that the rules for Westminster-hall are rules for us. The gentleman that spake last, as he always does, made a very florid and elegant speech, and brought you several examples of attainders that have been condemned from one parliament to another, in several reigns: but I do not wonder at that, when the crown went from one to another. An instance was given in the case of the lord Cromwell, which was spoke to from the bar; and sir Thomas Powys laid a great stress upon it, that this was condemned as a wrong judgment, because he was not heard: I believe that may be a reason why many of those attainders were condemned; perhaps it might be a custom of our ancestors to pass bills of attainder without hearing the party. This person hath been heard, and fully heard; and I believe no person, that hath been attainted, hath had so fair a trial; and therefore parliaments having condemned bills of attainder, because the persons have not been heard, that will be no reason why any parliament should condemn us. A gentleman told you, that the law of God and man was, not to condemn a man but upon two witnesses; but there are many instances to the contrary.—It is told you, that Porter, here before you, is not a good evidence, because he is not sworn; and that you are to go by the rules of Westminster-hall. Says the gentleman that spake last, you are to go by their rules, but not by their forms: I must confess there is a great difference between them two; for a form is only the manner and method by which we proceed in doing of any thing; but the rule is the foundation we are not to err from; but I can't agree we are upon the same rules as Westminster-hall is: the rules of Westminster-hall are, when a man is brought upon his trial, the jury are all to be upon their oaths; by which oath they are to make a true judgment according to law. This is not the case here: if I was a jurymen, and was to try a man, and one witness swore against this man, and no other witness; though I did in my conscience believe him to be guilty, yet in that case my conscience is discharged, and I must find him, not guilty: but no man can say this is the case here.—What are we now a-doing? Here is a bill to attain sir John Fenwick of high-treason: if I reject the bill, I do declare him not guilty; and if I do think him guilty, I do declare against my own judgment; for my judgment here is not bound up as a man's judgment upon a jury: for his judgment is bound up to proof, according to law; and my judgment is bound up by my own belief: this is the proof I must go by; and I think every man is bound in justice and duty to his country, as he believes sir John Fenwick to be guilty, to be for the commitment of this bill; and till any gentleman will convince me, that this is not a rule I am to go by, I must continue in this opinion.

Mr. Boyle. The disorder that worthy gentleman was in, makes me the more concerned for fear of falling into it myself. I hope, in this debate, gentlemen will be very cautious of using it as an argument, what application our votes shall have without doors, and with those we represent, when we are to give judgment, as far as in us lies, for the life and death of a man: and therefore I must observe, that the eagerness that is justifiable upon impeachments, may not look so well now we are judges upon a bill of attainder. You have gone over the whole course of the evidence, and I believe that this debate will shew you pretty plainly, what is to be the fate of this bill; for I believe all the arguments will now be used that can be: as to what hath been said of extorting a confession, I take it to be quite out of the case. I am sorry to be engaged one way or another: I would not, if I could help it, out of the house, be upon a jury of life and death; yet in that case, I should know the law, or be told it by the judges: But in this case, we are both jurymen and judges, and know not what rules we are to go by; but set up a court of equity, which hath no bounds but our own consciences.—As to sir John Fenwick, I know him not; as to his cause, I am sure I am against it; but how far I think him guilty or not, I think is not the single point to be considered: I must confess, there have been several people accused of this conspiracy, and have been named by the evidence at the trials; and I believe they are much alike guilty, being upon the same evidence; but as to all that hath been opened before you, and proved, it can amount to no more than this: There is but one evidence, which by the law would not be a good evidence to convict him in another place: and therefore I do agree with the gentleman that spake under the gallery, that this is a very extraordinary case; for one witness is not sufficient at law to convict him, and the law would be very different hereof. I am to judge according to my own opinion, and not by the rules prescribed by the law; but though this proceeding is not strictly according to the law of the land, yet if it was such an extraordinary case that required you to dispense with those forms, and come to this extraordinary manner of proceeding; I think, for my own part, it might be supported by the necessity of it: for it is impossible that it should be otherwise in practice. Thus when the government is at stake, and nothing will preserve it, but the breaking through the settled forms, then the government will break through them: and whatever rule you prescribe, it will always happen so.—There is a very extraordinary case, and that was in the conspiracy of the state of Venice, above 100 years ago, I think, set on foot by the Spaniards: Then the state, to get the whole matter out, promised a pardon to as many as were concerned in it; and after they had promised it, and treated with them about it, they thought it necessary, for the preservation of the whole, to break their faith, and they were all put to death. This was upon point of preservation of the government.—But sir, as to precedents, give me leave to say, I do not give that authority to them, unless I know all the springs and secret histories, and transactions that were their guide in making those precedents; and as to precedents that have been quoted, when the parliament has declared what was treason, and what was not treason, or have declared constructive treason, they may be grounded upon the statute of 25 Ed. 3. But I think there is no statute upon which they can ground the condemnation of a man upon one witness.—In the case of my lord Strafford, upon constructive treasons, it was there said, that it was a fire that had lain hid for 240 years, and that it never broke out before, but to consume him and his posterity. It was answered by Pym, If that was the case, it was not for want of law to justify such a proceeding, but all that time had not produced such an offender.—I do not doubt, but if any one will consider the late conspiracy; and if that was the question, but it was as extraordinary as any thing can happen; for it was to subject their country to a foreign power, which is very extraordinary, and several persons were concerned in it: But there is one extraordinary part which I do not remember this gentleman is accused of; and that is, the assassination. Treason itself is a very extraordinary crime; but give me leave to say, that extraordinary part is not alledged against this gentleman; and this bill does not seem to be brought in for that, wherein he is concerned in common with some others, but for the subsequent matter alledged in the bill. This bill is grounded not so much upon that he is guilty, as a great many more are, as upon several circumstances which have happened to nobody else. Give me leave to instance in a case, now in my head (I beg your pardon that I ramble, it is from the awe I have upon me from this assembly), in Catiline's conspiracy; and if that was our case, no doubt there would be another sort of argument for it; there they consulted what to do with Cethegus, and the other conspirators: he was at the head of an army, which only expected his orders to lay Rome in ashes; the question was, Whether they should break the Porcian law; and for the safety of the senate they were put to death before the assembly rose.—Now to come to this part of it: Though sir J. F. is a great offender, yet I think his case is not so extraordinary, as to make you proceed upon this bill. I do take his living or dying not to be of that consequence as this bill of attainder. I know not how he comes to be so considerable when in hold; for when he walked about town, I never heard he was feared or regarded at that time.—But to come to the allegations in your bill, upon which they are to ground your judgment: The first part is a new conspiracy, that is, for intending to create a jealousy between the king and these noble persons. As to them, you have already passed a vote in their justification; and I think their actions may justify them to the world, as much as any vote of the house of commons; but whatever that may be, I think it was a foolish piece of conspiracy, as well as an ill one, for one when he was in danger of being hanged for one plot, to venture upon another: and I think, there was at that time two witnesses to bring him to his trial, and that is an allegation in the bill. And as to the protracting of his trial, it is natural, and so justifiable, whether innocent or no, and what every body attempts; and nobody can wonder at it; but in one case or the other it can be no sufficient ground to attain him.—The next thing that is said is, that he hath been the occasion of the withdrawing of the evidence. Now I must observe, that is not alledged in the bill, and is proved but by hearsay: But suppose it was true, and alledged; if any man concerned in treason shall endeavour, by friends, or otherwise, to get off an evidence, can that amount to that which is designed to be punished by this bill, to high-treason? It is the part of those that are intrusted with those matters, to be in expectation of such practices. What are gaols for, but to keep them in custody? And the people employed in those businesses are to take care of it. Are we to supply a defect of what ought to have been done in another place?—So that I do say, that a precedent in an extraordinary case is no precedent to be used in a little case. It may be urged, but it is but a pretence, when you have passed this bill, which is the record, the matter will appear no otherwise than are the suggestions of your bill. A man hath aspersed great persons, which is a great fault indeed, (for he is not charged with the withdrawing of the evidence) therefore attain him upon one evidence. I think by this bill you will open a door for a precedent of all treasons of the same nature. Sir, there have been many precedents mentioned; I will trouble you with none, because most gentlemen have read the argument of Mr. St. John's in this case. I must confess, unless there was that necessity as is pretended, which I do not see, I do not see how you can justify passing this bill of attainders, either by the law of God or man, in any nation allowed. I must confess, I have no manner of concern how this question goes; what I have said is more to satisfy my own judgment, than work upon other people. I am not satisfied there is that necessity that is pretended; and therefore as my judgment is now informed, I can't give my vote for committing of this bill.

Mr. Smith. Sir, I own myself to be very unfit to speak in this argument; but since I am to give my vote in a matter of this consequence, I beg leave to give my reason why I give my vote, as I intend to do. I know the matter before us, both in the nature of the crime and punishment, as well as the consequence of it, requires a very deliberate consideration; but, at the same time, I do take the hazard and danger of this government to be a matter of great consequence too.—Though there have been several precedents instanced in relation to attainders; and though I have observed, that must have acknowledged, that they might be justified upon extraordinary occasions; yet when they have asserted that, they have told you, they were upon a wrong foundation, and so were laid aside. Now, I think it no great matter to say, that those attainders that were made in rancour upon contended titles, were reversed when the opposite party got the power, no more than if any action, be it never so justifiable, should be reversed when king James comes again, which I hope will never be. Is it any argument, that when Hen. 4. came to the crown, and deposed king Richard, that he reversed all the attainders in his time? There might be reasons might sway with persons for reversing particular acts of parliament, which might be very good, or might be not so, there was such a change of government at that time; but they take notice, it was made a particular article against Richard 2, as if when the power was come to other hands, they would not have deposed him if they had not had that argument: Neither do I take that argument to be of any weight, That attainders have been reversed, because the people have not been heard; when this gentleman hath had as full a hearing as ever any person had upon any Bill of Attainder, or impeachment whatsoever; and he hath had the advantage of counsel in this case, which, as has been told you, was excepted out of the late act of parliament, and of the most able counsel too.—It is said this is a matter of no great consequence, because it concerns sir J. F.'s life singly; and he is not thought to be so considerable, as by his escape to bring the public in danger. Now it hath been always one principle I have laid down, that if a plot be discovered, and not thoroughly prosecuted, it strengthens and grows upon you, and ten to one if it does not subvert the government.—Now, God be thanked, that we have prevented the design upon the king's person, and several have been punished for it; but I think we are not got to the bottom of it, and that we ought to provide against it in a much other manner. Can any one think that sir Wm. Parkyns, or sir John Freind, and the rest that are discovered, were the only persons concerned in this conspiracy? I take it, that there have been much greater men in it; and when I see such a struggle both to get people out of gaol, and send people out of the way, and all arts used that can be, I must suppose, when such extraordinary courses are taken, that there is something extraordinary still to be done; and I would not have men by bribing of witnesses think to secure themselves: It hath been used as an argument to lessen the matter, that this was a little after the act of indemn-nity. Can any thing aggravate a thing more? Sir, these very arguments turn against them. We are told here, that we must not consult our own private judgments in the matter; and we are told, at the same time, if there were two witnesses that we did not believe, we must not find him guilty. We are told of a judge, that though he knew a person to be not guilty, yet it was a commendable action in him, that he condemned the man: But that hath been very well answered already, and I shall not meddle with it further; only this I will say, that I never will in any case be a jurymen or a judge, where the convictions of my own conscience shall not govern me, but an evidence that I do not believe. And because that story was told you, I will tell you another, that I think more commendable: And that was; a man was tried for a murder, and there was positive evidence against him. The jury went out, and stayed a great while: There was eleven against one for finding him guilty; but at last the one almost starved them, and they brought the man in Not Guilty. The judge sent for the gentleman, and desired to know his reasons for differing with the rest: And, at last, upon assurance that nothing should be done to him, Why, says he, would you have me find the man guilty, when I was he that killed the man, and he was innocent? Then, sir, if you take the evidence as it is; I think, first, here is captain Porter; I do not find any body excepts to him; and his evidence hath been approved of by several juries, and several persons executed upon it, and nothing material hath been objected against it. I will not say, That sir J. F. hath owned a great deal of this himself; he hath given every body satisfaction how far he stands guilty in his opinion; but it is brought so far home, that there was sir J. F.'s own letter was to convey him abroad. Here hath been attempts upon other persons; you hear what hath been done by the solicitor. They say, he was not his solicitor at that time. Here are very pregnant circumstances. One gentleman said, you ought not to make use of Goodman's evidence here; and yet he could make use of every thing to disparage him; for he could say, there were three positive witnesses against him.—Now when it is so notorious what parties there are for king James, and we find persons plotting in every part of the kingdom: when you have an open invasion before you, and when designs are laid against the king's life every day: if this be not a time to exert an extraordinary power, I submit it to you.

Sir Rd. Temple. Sir, I shall not trouble you with any thing that hath been offered to-day. That which calls me up, is the danger of the precedent you are about to make, and the arguments that have been used to support it; which, I think, are more dangerous than that. I must confess it is a new doctrine to me, That the laws that are made by the parliament, are to be no rule and guide to this house. Sir, the birth-right we have is in our laws; and I did ever think till now, that the laws were not only made for Westminster-hall, but for all the subjects of England; and especially, that they were to be a rule to the parliament that made them, till they should think fit to alter them.—Here have been great mistakes between the power of parliament and the jurisdiction of it: the power of parliament is to make any law, but the jurisdiction of parliament is to govern itself by the law; and this, give me leave to say it to you, hath been the opinion of all your ancestors, and the method they ever used. Shall we make a law here in a particular case against all the laws of England? It is 'ultimum remedium et pessimum;' you may use it in a case of absolute necessity, but otherwise it may be a precedent to overturn all.—There are several things in making this precedent, that overthrow all the laws and liberties of England: first, you are passing judgment upon a man upon one witness. I have heard a strange debate to-day, that there was but one witness in treason, before the statute of Edw. 6. You know, that in case of treason, there was by the common law required two witnesses: for if there was but one, the party might demand trial by battle, and that was the common law of England.—There is another thing that is extraordinary: here you are going to pass an act without any trial at all: for to say this is a trial before you, the commons, is a mistake; you never did assume a jurisdiction of trying any person, nor can you: you may for your own information hear what can be offered, but it is not a trial, where witnesses are not upon their oaths. There is no manner of power or jurisdiction can be pretended for you to try; in that is a second thing. All the bills of attainder you have had, have been in three cases, where the persons have been either dead, or fled, or have been without the compass of the law, and could not be brought to answer: and you have had some bills of attainder after trials had in Westminster-hall; but never a one of those have been called trials, but they have been generally reversed; and for what! They tell you, that they have been reversed by one party, and another party: it was in the same king's reign, in Rich. 2's reign, they were forward and backward, as the court party or the country party were uppermost.—There is another thing in this, that I think of a most dangerous consequence; and that is, that you are for making way, for what I know, by this precedent, for a rack, for so it is said; this is to force a man to be an evidence. Why, give me leave to say to you, it is a new way not known in England, that you will hang a man unless he will confess or give evidence; but I think it is something more than a rack, for here is hanging, drawing and quartering in the case; and I do not think this proceeding will make him an evidence, with any credit or reputation to this house, nor am I of opinion, that he can discover any thing worth such a precedent.—Now give me leave to say one thing as to the jurisdiction of parliament. It hath passed here for current, that the parliament hath a power to declare what they will treason, though so by no other law; it is the greatest mistake in the world: I heard a great debate upon this, upon my lord Clarendon's Case; and it is plain, that statute relates only to cases brought from inferior courts to parliament; for it says, that if any other case supposed treason, which is not in that statute specified, doth happen before any justices, the justices shall tarry, without going to judgment of the treason, till the cause be shewed and declared before the king and his parliament, whether it ought to be judged treason, or other felony? I speak to the jurisdiction that the parliament has by that statute: it is, that if the like treason, for at common law there was a great many treasons, should fall out, and be brought before inferior courts, of which they doubted, whether they were treasons or no? then they should be brought before the parliament, to judge whether they were treasons or felony: But how shall they judge? By the laws in being. And who is this judgment in? Not in the parliament by bill, but only in the house of lords: Much less is it, that you may judge that to be treason in this house, that was not so by the common law before. So that, give me leave to say, therefore there is no such power reserved to the parliament, to declare any thing treason that is not treason before.—I must say, it is of the last consequence, that we should make a law in a particular case, to take away from him all the liberty that belongs to a subject. Some gentlemen talk of the great favour he hath had at this bar: I know not what to think of it; I am sure you allowed the king's counsel such privileges as I never saw before, and that was, to offer that for evidence that every body acknowledged was not so; and I do not think any body would think it a great favour to be heard in this manner, especially to things not in the bill.—It is said, every man must go according to his private opinion, it is not said judgment neither; the instances that have been given are of a quite different nature: A man is not to give his judgment against his knowledge: I think that judge ought rather not to have tried the cause at all; but if we sit here to judge, we sit to judge him according to the law of England, and then we must judge him according to legal proof. Will you sit upon a judgment that is not only not tied to the rules of Westminster-hall, but is not tied to the laws of the land: and attain a man without a legal trial, without legal evidence, and upon one witness, when the law says, you shall have two; and after all, say it is a reasonable proceeding? I know not how it came about, that the act of grace was passed; it did not rise from this house; If it hath any ill consequence, let them answer for it that were the cause of it.—They say the government is at stake, because the plot hath not been found out to the bottom. That is not our fault: This man hath been long enough in custody; if he hath trifled with the government, I am sorry he hath imposed upon them; but if it be so, I think there is nothing in this case, of that consequence, as to make you make this precedent.

Sir Wm. Strickland. Mr. Speaker, I would not make use of any ill precedent: And yet if the present occasion, and the necessity of the kingdom required it, I would make a precedent. I am glad the several ill precedents are avoided in this case, and I would be bold to say, whether this gentlemen suffers or no, no man can say that he hath been hared to death by counsel.—Sir, I should be as tender in point of blood as any man; but I do think, if the safety of the king and kingdom is concerned, it is not one private man that we must have respect for, so as to let the public suffer by it. I do think, that upon this occasion there have so extraordinary things happened as have hardly happened in former ages; that one who is known to be in a conspiracy to bring over a French power with a Popish army, to destroy our lives and liberties, after his trial has been deferred by his equivocations and pretences to make a great discovery; when he comes to make it out, he accuses the best of your friends; and this is only an artifice to get time till they could get the evidence out of the way; think, if you do not take notice of it, and let the legislative supply that defect, it may be of ill consequence, and may encourage any one to commit the worst of mischiefs, upon hopes, that if they can get the evidence out of the way, they shall go unpunished.

Sir Fr Wunnington. I shall trouble you but a little while, it being late; but gentlemen saying it is an extraordinary case, I shall give my reasons why this bill ought not to be committed; for every member here now is a judge, and he must take the blood of this gentleman upon him in judgment, either to condemn or acquit him; and I must confess, I have very much admired, to hear that doctrine preached, that every man, as he is satisfied in his private conscience, ought to judge this man guilty. I desire to know by what authority we sit here? We sit here and have a legislative authority, and it is by the king's command we come together; but at this time we are judicially trying this man for his life; and therefore I humbly conceive, that we ought to proceed secundum allegata et probata; and for any man in his private opinion to say he is guilty, he does not act by the commission he sits here. For to tell you of the Lancashire Plot, or that a man shall not be chosen hereafter, seems to be argument to enflame, but nothing to the question.—Now, sir, I will humbly offer to your consideration, and the judgment of the house, why I think we cannot judicially condemn this man, for I think the question of commitment to be the same as of his life and death.—I do agree upon all the precedents good and bad that have been cited, and doubt not but in extraordinary cases, it is in the legislative power of the parliament to look after the safety of the kingdom; but I shall offer why this does not come to that case.—I humbly conceive in this case, for I will not speak to the rules of Westminster-hall, but upon the right reason of the thing; for if it be reason in Westminster-hall, it may be so here, and that ought to overcome every thing: But whereas gentlemen say you have one witness, I do not apprehend you have one good witness, and I will give you my reason for it, for you must take capt. Porter upon his parole, and consider what he says upon his word, and then I do appeal, if you take what he says upon his word, whether ever they did know that a bill of attainder proceeded against any man upon bare affirmation? No; in that case you should have turned it into an impeachment, if the thing looked probable, and then you had the witness upon oath; and the ancient method of bills of attainder used to be first by the impeachment of the person, and then to turn it into a bill of attainder.—Then see what it is that is insisted on by the king's counsel, and recited in the bill, that there was a bill of indictment found by the oath of two witnesses, that is, Porter and Goodman: Under favour, I think they are not to be counted as witnesses in the point; and I offer this as a reason; and, I think, it is natural justice in all courts of the world, that if a man be accused as a malefactor, he hath the liberty to cross-examine the person that accuses him. Now we very well know, that in case of bills of indictment, when they are found by the grand-jury, they never admit the prisoner to put cross-questions, because the bill of indictment is but the accusation; and if an accusation be enough, who can be innocent? Why, then, if it be so, then this oath that was given to the grand-jury, is not such an oath upon which you can put such a value.—Then, Sir, go to the paper of Goodman, which you would read, and consider the validity of that; Goodman being now absent, the prisoner hath no opportunity to cross-examine him; and I beseech the house to consider the ill consequence of it: Any minister of state may come and get an examination before a justice of peace, or secretary of state, and the man is conveyed away, and a bill of attainder is clapped upon his back, and this shall be read as evidence against him: He is but half a witness, and a witness upon an accusation, not upon a trial.—Then come to sir John Fenwick's particular case; sir J. F. is indicted, issue is joined, and he hath notice of his trial; and one of the witnesses goes away, no man can tell upon what account he went; I may believe why, in my private opinion, but that is not our judicial knowledge: Then if that be so, was it ever known, that when any man was indicted, and issue joined, because his trial was deferred, therefore a bill of attainder must be brought against him? Here are plots against the government, and it may be forty may be taken up for it; and as to twenty, there may be two witnesses, and the others may have the good luck to have but a single witness against them; will you have acts of attainder against all the rest? If this had been an extraordinary case, wherein the government had been particularly concerned, it might have weighed with you; for no man can shew me any precedent of a bill of attainder, but where there was open act of hostility, or men of great relation and power were concerned to subvert the government. But what is sir J. F.'s case? He is in custody, and the plot is detected; if he was run away, you might still suppose he was plotting against the government, because he was fled from justice. Gentlemen say the government is concerned; so it is in every felony and particular treason; but must there therefore be a bill of attainder to punish it? When there is a bill of attainder, it must be from an immediate danger that threatens the government established, that such a man is attainted. But I do not see that sir J. F. hath any of these circumstances. All men agree, That this is an extraordinary way of proceeding: Then the question is, Whether sir J. F.'s case be extraordinary? or, Whether he be more than a common malefactor that is in a wicked conspiracy? I do not see that this case of sir J. F.'s is so extraordinary, that if he be not hanged, the government must fail.—And, under favour, a precedent, when it is once made, I know not what time may produce from it: It may be, after the death of his majesty, that came to restore our liberties, we may have wicked members, and members chosen as in Hen. 6th's time. It may be the condition of every subject in England. The power of parliament we must govern by reason and common justice; and if there be not so urgent necessity to use this extraordinary remedy, because it may be dangerous to posterity, therefore I am against this bill.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The worthy gentleman took notice, that the Lancashire Plot, and some words I used, were used only to inflame; I can't so well guess at his thoughts, but I have heard him several times bring his wife and children into his speeches, to no purpose at all.

Sir Er. Winnington. I have a wife and children, and that gentleman none; therefore I think I may make use of that expression.

Sir Tho. Seymour. Mr. Speaker, I have attended your debate with the best attention I can; and I have heard a great many arguments, and some very wild ones too. I hope, how frightful soever things have been opened, they will not lead your understanding out of the methods and rules of justice. I will not take upon me to tell you, what is nothing to the question, as, that treason is a very great crime, or, that the parliament hath an unbounded or unlimited power, and are not tied to the rules of Westminster hall; I think that is no part of the subject matter before you.—That nothing bounds or can limit the parliament, is what every body does admit; but it is the right application of that power which is now to be considered of: For you may judge the prisoner, and others will judge you. The world will judge you, if you do not apply that power aright.—For my part, I shall avoid as much as can be, the saying of any thing that hath been said; and therefore I hope you will believe that my discourse must be very short: But that which does move me in this question, is in short this, that I do not give my judgment to condemn any man otherwise than the law directs how, and upon what terms I must give it. If the law hath said, that treason is not to be treason, unless it be proved by two witnesses, I am never to give my judgment in that case, when there appears but one.—And this I take to be the state of the case, not to enter into matters of precedent of attainders; for those are only instances of so many facts that have been done. And in all those instances that have been urged and quoted, when times have been sedate and quiet, marks have been put upon them, as was hinted by a gentleman that spake very ingeniously upon this subject at the beginning of this debate; I say, marks have been put upon them for you to avoid, but not to imitate. I take it, that the law hath determined that there shall be two witnesses to the proof of treason, and there is no treason that hath not two witnesses to it.—There is but one attainer that we meet withal in sacred history and that is the attainer of Naboth; he was attainted, and we know what induced that attainer; he had nothing to object as to the formality of the proceedings there was set up against him: And though Jezebel's letter had disposed the rulers to deal by him as they did, yet there were two witnesses that did appear against him.—I take it, that two witnesses are requisite for the knowledge of the truth, that you may make a right judgment whether they swear right or no. I will give you but one small instance more: I must tell you, Susannah had been but in a bad condition, if one witness or circumstantial evidence would have made her guilty.—A gentleman here says, it is Apocrypha: but that which weighs with me is, that there may be inconveniences on one side, and there are no inconveniences on the other. I know not what may be the consequence of this precedent, nor where it may bring you: I know the consequence, if sir J. F. be not executed upon a bill of attainder; for nobody will believe there is a necessity for this extraordinary remedy to be applied for an offence, a year and a half after he hath been indicted and arraigned for it, and they might have proceeded to his trial; and I know not whether it is his fault that they did not; for it was not in his power to prevent it: and if you, upon every occasion, come to supply the defects of them that are remiss in the government, it will make them more so.—As to the matter of precedents; Why, it may fall out, that by this precedent an innocent man may be punished, and then we that make this precedent are guilty of his blood; and if he suffer never so remotely, it will be required of us, if they proceed from this precedent. Now, if sir J. F. be not executed, unless in a legal way, what is the consequence of that? Is it that sir J. F. shall go unpunished? Though they are deprived of one evidence that would make it treason, he may be punished for a misdemeanor, and imprisoned for his life; and I had much rather he did languish in that condition, and I am sure it is much safer for you, for no inconveniency can arise that way; and I take it that when those that are our guides dispute which is the way, we are to take that which is the safest.—The learned have disputed, whether this matter, as now it is charged upon sir J. F. be treason; I will not take upon me to determine it; they differ about it; and when they cannot determine it, will you by a question determine it absolutely?—Upon the whole, there hath been so much said by the counsel for the prisoner, and so little said by the counsel against him, and so few arguments urged against him, that I must still retain the opinion I had, that there is not evidence enough for you to proceed upon this bill of attainder.

Mr. Boscawen. Sir, I desire to give my reasons for my opinion in this matter. I have no personal disgust against sir J. F. The great argument for sir J. F. against this bill is, that this is an extraordinary proceeding, and therefore should be against an extraordinary person; and in the next place, that it is against the rules of law. The rule of the law is, that there must be two living witnesses: as to that matter, gentlemen generally agree, that it is within the law of parliament to attain people by bill of attainder; but they say they have been often misapplied; which I do easily believe, because some have been attainted, and have not been heard; and some have been in tumultuous times: but this gentleman hath had a fair trial, and a debate in this house; but I would fain know, though they confess bills of attainder may be, how it can possibly be, if the lawyers at the bar say true, that it must be upon oath, and you give no oath? To say it may begin in the house of lords; under favour, I take it, that a bill against a commoner cannot begin in the house of lords. And if you cannot have witnesses upon oath, you must have as much evidence as the nature of the thing will afford; that is, you must have witnesses to convince your consciences in the thing; for if all this great assembly are satisfied in their consciences, that he is guilty of inviting an army of French to come into England, I am astonished to think, that you should not pass this bill against him. I think, as to this witness, Porter, they have not endeavoured to blemish him; but their argument seems to run more upon Goodman's not being present. I would know, if there are two witnesses, and I do not believe them in my conscience, whether I can pass this bill? But I appeal in this case res ipsa loquitur; the thing is so plain. How many have been attainted and suffered for the same crime, that have acknowledged sir John Fenwick to have been present! There were several members of the house sent to examine sir John Freind and sir W. Parkyns in Newgate, and they were sent with this intention, that the house would intercede with the king for a pardon for them, if they discovered the full of the plot (it was not the death of sir W. Parkyns and sir John Freind that was aimed at, but the preservation of the public); and when they were examined, they did acknowledge, that they were privy to the calling in of the French, and that sir W. Parkyns was to have a troop of horse; there was to be 2,000 horse: but he would not redeem his own life with the blood of others. Now I do take it, that there is evidence against sir J. F. sufficient, in a parliamentary way, to attain him.—The gentleman says, the consequence of throwing out this bill would be nothing; and that sir J. F. is a little man: I agree he is, but it is the consequence of bringing in a French army that is to be considered. Would you pave the way for them to come over, and make their entrance easy? I hope the people of England are concerned in the case, as well as their wives and children. If you let him go, what will be said? I have not heard one say, that he believes he is not guilty; there is none but think him guilty; and yet will you let him escape? What encouragement will this be to your enemies? He hath not denied the matter himself: nay, he hath not brought one gentleman to vindicate him, that he is a man of a behaviour not to be believed to be guilty of such a thing, which was done in other trials. I desire you would consider what the French king said of his brother king James; how could he think to bring in popery with a protestant army? I am sure the bringing in of a French army must be for the destruction of the people of England, and the protestant religion, and will bring your people to go in wooden shoes. It is the example of this thing you are to consider. It was said at the destruction of Carthage, that the commonwealth was always to be minded. I think you ought always to be mindful for the preservation of England; and I believe he is guilty, and I am therefore for the bill.

Lord Digby. I shall trouble you but with a word or two. I suppose, as long as we act by the known rules of justice, and the laws of our land, we shall not need to fear any censure in our own kingdom, or any where else; but it is a very uncertain thing for gentlemen to be judges in the case of life and death, without any rule to walk by; a great many will not allow us any rule at all: I always took our rule to be the law of the land, and that even ourselves are bound by the laws our ancestors have made, until we think fit to repeal them; and I am confirmed in this case by one particular argument from the bill of treason that passed last sessions, in which there is a clause, that it should not extend to future parliaments. The only argument for exercising of this power, is the extraordinary case of this gentleman. When a gentleman speaks of the power of parliament, I take it to be the just power of parliament: I think a man may say, a parliament cannot do what they cannot justly do. But all gentlemen allow, that this power ought not to be exercised but in an extraordinary case where in the government is nearly concerned. I believe very few but think; that if it had not been for the vindication of some particular gentlemen we never had had this matter before us; and then I will leave it to gentlemen to consider, if the government can be in so much danger if sir John Fenwick does escape?

Mr. Brotherton. Mr. Speaker, I perceive the question, Whether this bill shall be committed, arises very much upon a supposition that seems to be granted, that there is no other law to try this person by; and it hath been hinted, that before the statute of Edw. 6, one witness was sufficient: Now, if I shew you that here is a law in being, and hath continued for several hundred years, whereby a man may be tried, and that by one witness, I think it is something that hath not been spoke to yet.—Sir, I ground my reason and opinion upon the authority of the law, and upon the historians of all times, who agree in the thing, and come down to my lord Coke, which is printed by authority; and he is express, that where there is but one witness (he treats of what witnesses are necessary, and he tells you two witnesses were required by the common law of treason, if the person was tried by a jury;) but, says he, if there be but one witness in case of treason, he shall be tried before the constable and marshal. And in treating of the statute of Hen. 8, which does appoint how treason beyond sea shall be tried; says he, that is only where there are only two witnesses; but if there is but one witness, he shall be tried before the constable and marshal; because, says he, the statute of Hen. 8, does not take away that trial before the constable and marshal; and for that, Sir, there are several precedents in this case, of persons that have been attained by a court-marshal; and if the accuser was vanquished, he was to suffer the same judgment the defendant was if he was found guilty. I am upon a gentleman's life, and never was so before, and desire to be never so again; there have been several precedents, I say, in this case, and my lord Coke is express in the point; and I desire any gentleman to shew me any law, that hath repealed this. In case of murder; suppose a man be wounded upon the land and die upon the sea, and I could shew several cases where the common law cannot try a man by jury, but he shall be tried by the custom of merchants before the statute of Edw. 6. If a man was wounded in one country, and died in another, he could not be tried. That which I aim at is to shew you, that though the common law should fail, yet they need not come with a bill in this case. If two Englishmen beyond sea fight, and one kill the other, it cannot be tried by the common law; how then shall it be tried? It must be tried by the court-marshal. It was sir John Amesley's case in Rich. 2d's time; and Wells's case, and lord Herbert's case in H. 6th's time, who, there being but one witness, was accused before the constable and marshal.—[Mr. Brotherton was here interrupted by the great noise the house made upon the novelty of the argument, and did not go on further with it.]

Mr. Raper. Sir, I attended to the debate of this day, and have not hitherto troubled you myself, because I did expect to be better informed by this debate. I think the substance of the debate of this day hath been, not so much to shew us by what rule we are to go, as to shew us that we have no rule to go by but our judgments. Sir, I never had the honour to sit in parliament before this time, and therefore cannot quote precedents of what hath been done in former parliaments; others have taken a great deal of pains to shew you, that it is in the discretion of gentlemen, and they are only to be satisfied in their consciences. I am not fond to hear myself speak, and therefore I hope I shall be favourably heard at this time; and I do think I have the more reason to speak at this time, from something that fell from a very honourable gentleman at the bar: If I do mis-repeat him, I hope he will excuse me, for I do not do it with an ill design: But I think his words were to this effect; that he did not know, but if it was known in the country, that gentlemen did give their judgment against passing of this bill, it might hinder the election in future parliaments. Sir, since there seems to be so great stress upon our determination in this matter, I hope I may at this time shew you my reasons why I cannot come up to agree in this bill; and I shall submit it to them, whether they will do me the honour to excuse me again? I must confess, I do think this is as nice a case as I can pretend to give my opinion in; and as it is so, I shall desire the best assurance of the truth of this matter, before I give my opinion for the passing of this bill.—Sir, you have had before you one evidence: I will admit him to be as much as a single evidence can be: as to the paper of Goodman's examination, I have heard that and other matters too, which I shall not repeat. But I do remember, that, in the debate of yesterday, it was not insisted on to be evidence: and if not so, I shall only take the matter as depending before you upon one evidence only.—Sir, it is true, I believe this house, as to its legislative proceeding, is not tied by the methods of inferior courts: but I hope I shall be excused, if in the methods of prosecution and conviction of offenders, after they have been prescribed by the wisdom of the parliament, I hope I shall be excused, if I believe this house cannot take away any person's life upon less evidence than inferior courts could do.—And, Sir, I shall not enter into any very long vindication of myself, and my zeal and willingness to serve the government; I never was employed in any other government; and I think my actions have been such that nobody can instance in any one thing that hath looked otherwise; and when I have said this, I shall trouble you no farther about that: but there hath been so much stress laid upon this bill, that whosoever speaks against it, seems to speak against the government; because it is said, the passing of it is so necessary for the support of the government. And I was the more willing to offer you my reasons, because, as the nature of this debate has been, I cannot satisfy myself where my judgment and opinion shall rest: for if it be so, that you are not tied to have as much evidence as inferior courts, and, as they say, one evidence is enough, and my judgment is to be guided by papers; then they, without any evidence, may be enough to satisfy: and if you take up with less evidence than inferior courts, I cannot come to declare how little evidence may take away a man's life.—As to the prisoner, I know him not; but I think this bill is for all that he hath to lose, and is for all the best Englishman can lose upon the like occasion.—Sir, I shall be very tender in giving my opinion for the bill, unless it was very clear to me that it was reasonable. Truly, I have heard very little of the whole plot, or of this matter that hath been examined, or for which others have been executed; my life has been generally in the country, and I have not had the curiosity to buy the trials; and as this is the first person that hath been called before me, to give my judgment on, I hope I may be excused for taking this liberty, upon such evidence as appears before us, to tell you, I cannot give my consent to this bill.

Sir W. Lowther. Sir, you have had a very long debate in this house, and long discourse from the bar; and though the counsel was directed that they should not dispute the privileges and authority of this house, yet, as far as my judgment carries me, their whole discourse was against it; and most of the gentlemen that have spoke against the bill, it hath been, because it hath not been adequate to the proceedings in Westminster-hall, because there hath been but one witness. Sir, if there had been two witnesses, this house had not been troubled with it: it is a case of a very extraordinary nature, and so required an extraordinary proceeding.—It hath been questioned by some gentlemen, Whether one witness be sufficient in this case or no? Which I wonder at, since a great many have been convicted upon his evidence, and every one of them has confessed; which shews it to be a notorious truth.—There is another inference they draw from the proceedings here: because a great many of those precedents of attainders have been reversed, and those with notes of ignominy. If they did consider the times they were made in, and the times they were reversed in, there might be a great deal of cause for it: we find that it was contrary factious that reversed them, and that makes it never the worse. And truly, Sir, I do not know but where circumstances are so notorious, but they are tantamount to a second witness, as I have heard in Westminster-hall, and in cases of life too. If a man be murdered, and two in a room, and one comes out with a bloody sword, the law does presume that man murdered him though there is no particular evidence.

murdered him, but only this circumstance; and yet the man's life is concerned in that case. So that upon the whole, it appears to me that he is guilty, and, I think, nothing can be plainer. — There is another circumstance, that he fled for it; and that is a presumption of a man's guilt: for a man loses his goods, if he flies for felony.

Mr. Harley. It would be very unreasonable and impertinent to trouble you long after such a debate: I shall avoid repetition of what hath been suggested to you much better from other persons than would have been from me. I own it is a case of great concern, and it is my misfortune that I should ever sit upon a thing of this nature; but I will discharge my conscience always, and give what arguments occur to me, why I am against this bill. Gentlemen have been pleased in their arguments to enter upon the debate of your power and authority, and have made that a part of their argument: but I think, with submission, we need not dispute that at all: it is admitted, that there have been bills of attainder passed formerly, and your authority is not under dispute; for the legislative in all nations have a power lodged in them, for the safety of the whole. — But your proper enquiry is, Whether this is such a case as you ought to exercise this extraordinary power; omne regnum sub graviore regno: Though you have this absolute authority, yet it is to be executed by the rules of reason, and by the rules (for such there are) of eternal justice; and I look upon this as one that is inviolable, that no man can forfeit his life, in such a case as this is, without two witnesses. I must adhere to that, because I have heard nothing in this debate that can make me quit that maxim: And it is such an ancient land-mark, that I will never draw a curse upon me, and my posterity, for removing of it. I beg leave that I speak with this earnestness to you. — Gentlemen have been pleased to make it part of their arguments, the great danger the government is in if this bill does not succeed. — I will not use many words, but I think that argument ought not to be taken in the gross, but to be examined. Whether this argument, of the hazard of the government, is of equal poize for you to break the eternal rules of justice? I won't quote the case before; every gentleman knows it, (though there was two witnesses in that case to put an innocent person to death) where it is urged, the Romans will come and take our state and nation: But with how much reason that was urged, every body knows; and how far the government is now in danger. Let us consider, Is this gentleman out of your power? Is the government in danger of a man that is your prisoner? Is he in open rebellion against you? If this law does not pass, if you have not your hands in his blood, is he not under the power of the law? Did not he tell you so himself? Every gentleman ought to have a zeal for the government, and I wish it was visible in every thing else; but if that be so, give us leave also to speak with zeal for our liberty, and against constitution. The argument is turned two ways: On one side you are told, that this probably may make him confess something; and by other, he is to be made an example of punishment. This is the first beginning of a bill of this nature: but the same reason that leads you to this, must lead you to all the rest: The same reason that is urged for this bill to make him confess, will lead you to bring in a bill to make him a good evidence: this every body must allow to be the consequence of it. — How does this bill come before you? It comes before you upon a villainous, scandalous aspersion of some great men; though I know them not all, yet I have a great value for them, and I would make their case my own: but if they were the nearest relations I had, I would be against this bill upon their account; and let any one examine the reason of it. — Sir, I will not run into precedents; but, only because it hath been told you, that the precedents were made in one reign by one faction, and then the attainders were reversed in another reign by another faction: There is one occurs to my mind, which hath been touched at, and is at least of instruction to me. There was a case in Ed. 3's time; there was the deposition of a king, a king barbarously murdered, and his son upon the throne; and there was the notoriety of the fact, for which a great man was attainted in his son's reign, and no different title; and four years after, a bill was brought in against the earl of March: And one of the articles against him was, that he had procured that attainder of that noble lord, under pretence of some letter, or paper, that was signed by him; which, if it was so, says the record, was no evidence. — I say this before gentlemen, to shew them how things have turned, and precedents that have been made very unanimously; but in bad times have been turned to shed the best blood in England. It grieves me to my soul to hear of Mr. Cornish, whose attainer you have reversed, to hear that quoted as a precedent in this house: It is not whether two witnesses be the rule of Westminster-hall, it is the rule of right reason; and it is a maxim in your law, make what law you will against the law of God, it is void: And this is the law of God, and right reason. — You must provide for the government; and when you cannot do it by course of law, then armies must do it, when the courts are shut. I hope gentlemen will not put a hard construction upon what I have said; I have done it to discharge a good conscience.

Mr. Chan. of the Esch. Sir, I am for the commitment of this bill, because is my conscience I think sir John Fenwick is guilty; and because I think the power of parliaments may interpose in this matter: And if they have such power, they exercise it in this case. Gentlemen say, they will not dispute the power of parliament; and yet in their arguments they tell us, we are not to proceed otherwise than according to the forms of inferior courts. And if the parliament is not to proceed without two witnesses in the case of attain-son, give me leave to say, there is no room left for a bill of attainder; unless you will take the business of inferior courts upon yourselves: And I am confident, several gentlemen, if there were two witnesses, would use it as an argument, what have you to do with it? Refer it to the ordinary courts of justice; and I am sure that would be very reasonable. But I do think that parliaments have that power, and they have always used it; and I believe it is for the advantage of your constitution. The inferior courts are to go by the letter of the law; and whoever can avoid that, is to escape punishment there; but the legislative is not to be dallied with: And if the offence be of that nature, that inferior courts cannot reach it, they can go beyond all forms to preserve the government. This they have done, and upon that principle you sit here. Was it by the forms of common justice below, that you declared the throne to be vacant, and king William to be lawful king? Is it upon the ordinary rules of Westminster-hall, that his title does depend? No, it depends upon this maxim, that the parliament of England are intrusted for the whole, and may constitute a government for the preservation of the whole. And upon the same right principle that I gave my vote to declare him rightful and lawful king, by the same principles I declare his enemies to be traitors.—You are told here, it is according to the law of God and nature, that there must be two witnesses in cases of treason: I do not pretend much skill in other parts of the world, I think it is our particular happiness to have this way of trial: I think in any other part of the world, if he had dealt thus with the government, he would have had another manner of proceeding against him, than to be condemned by king, lords, and commons: But that is your constitution, but it does not hold in other parts of the world.—Some gentlemen lay the stress of their argument upon the ill consequence it may have in another reign: I would avoid ill consequences in another reign as much as I could, but our immediate care is the preserving of the present constitution.—But if gentlemen are apprehensive, that by such an example, if king James should return, others may be punished; if we may judge what he would do, by what he hath done, he would go another way to work; if he came to London, he would proceed as his party did at Dublin, and attain all the protestants in one common bill; that is the precedent he hath set, and he will follow. And therefore in order to prevent that, and in order to punish our enemies, and to preserve our constitution and prerogative of parliament in all points; and because I am convinced in my conscience he is guilty, I shall give my concurrence for commitment of this bill.

Col. Granville. Sir, I would not presume to trouble you at this time of night, was the debate upon a less subject than it is; but since you are going to pronounce judgment in a case of life and death, and that this house is above any rules, and we have no precedent for it, but every gentleman is to find out private rules to walk by; the rule that I shall take to is, that I would deal with sir John Fenwick as I would have mankind to deal with me: if I was in sir John Fenwick's place, and were indicted of high-treason, and were not allowed any trial, nor the benefit of making my defence, according to the known laws of the land; I should think my blood unjustly spilt, let me be never so guilty.—The laws are what are set up for the defence of every man; and when once we break through them, whatever our end may be at that time, and though it may in some manner seem to justify us, because it is to come at an ill man; yet pray consider, the best of men may be come at as easily as the worst of men. And what makes me cautious is, that my hands are guiltless of blood yet, and I will take care how I begin to dip them in it. And that which will make me cautious in any case of this nature is, what I read in the story of the late time, that when once a set of people had begun to dip their hands in the blood of my lord Strafford, nothing would quiet them till they had stained their hands with royal blood. The laws are the common defence between the king and the people; but the king is safest when the laws are most strictly observed.—I shall not pretend to talk of your power, which hath no other bounds but your justice and discretion; and what you think so, will, I hope, meet with approbation abroad. And in this case I shall always be against what is called a trial to day: But I do not think it any: for I do think we are an unfit court to determine this matter. We sit in so many capacities, it is hard to distinguish in what capacity we are here: some are accused; it is hard to be accused, and to be a judge at the same time. I am sure I am as much concerned as if I was accused myself; and it is for my innocence and honour that I think myself bound to speak against this bill. For as no resentment shall make me do any thing that is unjust, so I fear nothing that he can say: and I will never go about to stop his evidence, by cramming a bill of attainder down his throat.—Besides, it is an unfit thing for any gentleman who is obliged to be of counsel for the king; it is hard for him to be so, and sit here as a judge: I think also to proceed in this manner, is a disrespectful thing to the king himself; for in this case you turn the throne of mercy into the seat of judgment. The king, who should have all the ways to ingratiate himself with his subjects; you make him, by this proceeding, to pronounce the sentence himself upon the life of a subject; and it is hard to offer a bill to the king in such a manner, by which you oblige him either to reject it (which was always looked upon as an hardship) or to pass sentence upon this gentleman, which perhaps his gracious temper and his mercy make him averse to.—Sir, it is too late to give you other arguments; you have heard a great many better than I can give: but I think this bill is unjust in itself, and dangerous in its consequence; and therefore I hope you will not commit it.

Sir Herbert Crofts. Sir, I did not think to trouble you in this debate, but only for the arguments that have been used by some that spake lately, who seem to lay a great load upon men, according as they give their vote in this matter, because it is in relation to the blood of a man. I have considered the point, I hope, with as much caution as any man within these walls, and hope to act with as strict a conscience as any man whatsoever; and shall be glad to be informed from those gentlemen, that have laid the stress so hard upon religion, how they can shew me, that I do not as strictly, as to all points of religion, give my vote for passing of this bill, as they would excuse themselves from it. I must agree with those gentlemen, that you are no ways bound or limited to the rules of Westminster-hall; and therefore what was said upon that, I did not think worth taking notice of; but when we are told, we are bound up by the laws of nature and religion, and the law of God, in this matter, this touches me so nearly, that I must desire those gentlemen to shew me in scripture the law they quote.—If it be the law of nature, and the law of God, that every man that dies must be convicted by two witnesses, as an honourable person observed, I wonder it is not observed by all Christian nations and governments, that they are not all governed by this law; if there be any direction from the law of God, that no man is to die for treason without two witnesses, but he may suffer for murder and felony with one witness. Now, I say, I must desire the gentleman that asserts it, that he would be pleased to shew me it in scripture, and I will be entirely of his opinion; but till I hear that very plainly proved, it is not within my reading or remembrance, and therefore I desire it may have no weight. And now I am up, I shall give my reasons, why I shall give my vote for this bill.—The reason that governs me, is the preservation of the government, and the commonwealth under which I live; and which I think I am in the station wherein I stand bound to preserve by all the rules of justice imaginable. Now if your law hath bounded inferior courts, but hath not bounded you in this matter, though you have said inferior courts shall not determine and give judgment in such a case; yet, I think, you are not bound up so here: but if the matter be proved to my satisfaction, I may give my judgment according to the evidence that comes before me, without that restriction.—But, sir, this ought not to be done, it is said, but upon extraordinary occasions. You were told some time since of the case of the duke of Monmouth; but it was said, that he was attainted because he was in arms, and could not be come at otherwise: but I think this is a parallel case to that, if not much stronger: for here is a person that hath been accused, and fully proved to have been in rebellion, and in treasonable practices with your enemies, to bring an invasion upon you, and to subvert your government; and though he hath not been proved to have been in that single act of the assassination, yet there is such a correspondency between one and the other, that I do look upon him as equally guilty of both. *Therefore this having been so fully proved, and the person that stands accused being out of the reach of the common course of the law; what remedy have you, but to fly to your legislative power, to attain him upon the grounds and allegations of your bill, that one witness is withdrawn? And I am very well satisfied, and I think we may presume it is by his own, or his friends encouragement and procurement. And I do take this to be as reasonable a ground for your bill, as any thing in the other case; and I know not what is an extraordinary case, if this be not one: is it not an extraordinary case, for a plot to be laid for the total subversion of this constitution, and our religion for ever, and we cannot come at it to punish it another way? But it hath been said, the safety of the government does not depend upon him: if we acquit him, we are to acquit every one alike: I hope the government does not depend upon him alone; but if you clear him, there is the same right to clear any criminal whatsoever. Sir, since I am brought up upon giving my judgment in this matter, (though I come as unwillingly as any body to it) I must go according to my conscience; and till I can see something of the law of God, that has been hinted at, made out, I must go according to the law of my reason; and that is, that I must be for the bill.

Lord Norreys. I will not pretend to tell you what the authority of this house is, it is what they please to make it; but I am sure they will ground it upon good reason; but I think the reason chiefly given for the commitment of this bill, leaves you a latitude to do what you please, and give no reason at all; for it is only to say, I am convinced in my conscience this man is guilty; no matter upon what proof, no matter whether any proof or not: you may believe it from his life and conversation, and the company he keeps, or from his interest; and that may be argument enough to find a man guilty. But till I know a reason better grounded than this, I cannot be for the commitment of this bill.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I am sure at this time of night I am unfit to speak in so great a matter: I must confess I should not have troubled you, if it had not been in the case of blood.—You have had a great debate before you of the power of parliaments, and that hath been sufficiently argued; and I have not learning enough to give you any precedents that have not been already quoted: but every body does agree in this, that what power you have of this kind, is not to be exercised but upon extraordinary occasions. Now I would be glad to know, what this extraordinary occasion is?—Every body allows, that treason is the greatest crime a man can be guilty of; and the charge of this gentleman is high-treason; but therefore, in this case, must you exercise this authority? Pray, wherein does this case differ from any other case of high treason, that any other person will be practising against the government? All the difference I can make of it, consists in two points; the one is, that he hath prevaricated with the government; and the other, that gentlemen say he hath been a means of procrastinating his trial, in which some evidence hath made his escape. I will allow you, that it is a very great crime for any one to asperse so great men as he hath done; but I would be glad to know, whether there being such an ingredient, it be sufficient to attain him upon high-treason upon that account.—Then as to that of a witness being gone, gentlemen have said, they are apt to believe, and there is great presumption that he hath been the occasion of this witness being gone. Is that an ingredient sufficient, though at present it hath not been proved to you? But if it had been proved, I should not however think that is treason. Then if this be the only difference between this gentleman and any other person that shall be practising to subvert the government, I would know, if there be but one witness against any man, for conspiring against the king, if they may not have recourse to this precedent, to proceed against him by a bill of attainder? For the argument is, Whoever is endeavouring to subvert the government, provided there be but one witness, you are obliged, by virtue of your legislative power, to bring a bill of attainder against him. And what then? Of what use is the great care and wisdom of your ancestors, and yourselves, that where a crime is so great, and the punishment so great, there should be two witnesses?—I was mightily surprized to hear gentlemen tell you, that two witnesses is a form in your law, and a form in inferior courts. I never could believe that was a form; for according to your law, no man shall be declared guilty of treason, unless there be two witnesses against him; so that it gives, in a manner, a determination to the crime; that I take to be the case.—A gentleman told you that he was fully satisfied by the proof, that this gentleman is guilty: But how can a man satisfy his own conscience, to condemn any man by a law, that is subsequent to the fact? For that is the case; and pray see the danger of precedents: It now will appear upon your journals, that you have caused to be read a deposition of a person that was absent, taken before a justice of peace, when the person accused had no opportunity to interrogate him; and likewise, that you have heard a witness as to what a man swore in the trial of another man: All this will appear upon your books.—And truly, I would be glad to know, if another age may not be apt to think, that you took these to make good the defect of another witness; and then I must appeal to you, if you have not admitted of a testimony, which according to no law is admitted.—They say you are not tied to the rules of Westminster-hall, nor their forms. Is there any law in being, that says, a judge may hear a witness as to what was sworn upon the trial of another person, to condemn him that was not party to that trial? If there be no such law, then the rule is founded upon justice and common right; that nothing shall be brought against a man when a man was not a party when the oath was made, and he had no opportunity to examine him.—I thought it my duty to tell you, that when you have made this precedent, if any person shall be accused of treason but by one witness, there will be the same reason to proceed thus against him.

Then (being a little before eleven a-clock at night) the question was put,

Whether the bill should be committed? and the house divided: Ayes, 182. Noes, 128. So it passed in the affirmative, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole house.

Nov. 25. The house resolved into a Committee of the whole house, upon the said bill, and several words being offered as an amendment to the said bill, to import sir John Fenwick's being guilty; at last the words that were agreed on, were these, 'Of which treason the said sir John Fenwick is guilty.' It was also proposed to the consideration of the said Committee, whether the lords spiritual should stand in the enacting part? But upon looking into the several acts of attainder, it appeared they were unconcerned in all those acts of attainder, in the enacting part; and so the Committee was satisfied in that point, and they were left to stand in the bill by general consent; and the bill was ordered to be reported to the house; and afterwards, upon the report, the house agreed with the Committee in the aforesaid amendment of the words, importing sir John Fenwick's being guilty.

Nov. 25. The said bill against sir John Fenwick was read the third time.

Mr. Methuen. Mr. Speaker, I have not troubled you in any of this long debate, and do it unwillingly now: but I do think it every man's duty, in a case of this great importance, freely to own his opinion, and give his reasons for it. The greatest part of the debate hath run upon two things; the inconveniency of bills of attainder, and the having them too frequent; that it is necessary to have them sometimes, that any person might not think they are not out of reach, if they could evade the laws that were made to protect the people.—I think, in general, that this bill, as every other, ought to have its fate upon the particular circumstances before you; and whoever gives his affirmative to this bill, ought to be convinced, that sir J. F. is guilty of high treason; and also, that there are extraordinary reasons why the nation does prosecute him in so extraordinary manner; and I do think one of these is not sufficient alone. If between the indictment and arraignment, or trial, Goodman should have died, and there had been no other reason for attainting sir J. F. only the defect of his evidence, I should not have thought it a sufficient reason; though we should have had an opportunity of being informed of his particular evidence, and believed him guilty; and if sir J. F. does not appear guilty, I do not think any reason of state, though he hath prevaricated, and behaved himself to the dissatisfaction of every body; therefore, I think, there must be both these.—You have heard the evidence; I shall not repeat it, but rather come to these things that distinguish sir J. F.'s case; only thus, you have received the evidence against sir J. F. and given him liberty to make his defence, and have fully heard him; which I think hath altered the reason of a great many precedents cited from my lord Coke, and other authors.—That which distinguishes this case is, the great danger the nation was in from this conspiracy, and the sense the nation hath had of it; and I find, by the general opinion of all persons, this danger is not at an end. There seems likewise to be an opinion as general, that sir J. F. could have contributed to your safety by a discovery.—The next circumstance, that sir J. F. knowing of this, and the expectation the nation had from him, for that he could have contributed to your safety, hath made use of that to put off his trial; and at last, has made such a paper, as does shew an inclination to do you all the prejudice he can, and tended to the creating of new dangers; and by this means sir J. F. against whom there was two witnesses when he was indicted, hath delayed his trial, so that now there is but one; and there is a violent presumption, that this person is withdrawn by the practice of sir J. F.'s friends.—There remains yet with me as great a consideration as any of these: the public resentment of the nation for such his behaviour, is the only means his practice has left you; and it seems necessary for your safety, to come the next best way to what he could have done. Against the evidence that hath been given, there have been great doubts raised; not so much whether it be such evidence as may incline us to believe him to be guilty; but whether it be such as you should hear in the capacity you are in; and whether, after it is found, such as it is, that is not such as would convict him upon another trial. Whether you ought to credit it, and that should influence you to give your vote for this bill of attainder; this is a doubt that I find weighs generally with them that differ from me in opinion about this bill; and therefore I desire leave to speak to that particular.—It is said, that you are trying of sir J. F. that you are judges, and that you are both judges and jury; and that you are obliged to proceed according to the same rule, though not the methods, of Westminster-hall; secundum allegata et probata.—But the state of the matter, as it appears to me, is, that you are here in your legislative power, making a new law for the attainting of sir J. F.; and for exempting his particular case, and trying of it, (if you will use that word, though improperly); in which case the methods differ from what the law requires in other cases; for this is never to be a law for any other afterwards. Methinks this being the state of the case, it quite puts us out of the method of trials, and all the laws that are for limiting rules for evidence at trials in Westminster-hall, and other judicatures; for it must be agreed, the same rule of evidence must be observed in other places as well as Westminster-hall, I mean in impeachments, and it has always been so taken.—This notion of two witnesses has so much gained upon some gentlemen, that we have had some gentlemen say, that this is required by the law of nature, the universal law of nature, nay, by the law of God. And I think, if it was so, there would be no doubt but it will oblige us.—But therefore I go to the bottom of the matter: that any man deserves to be punished, is because he is criminal: that this or that man deserves it, is because he is guilty of a crime, let his crime be made evident any way whatsoever; for whatsoever makes the truth evident, is and is accounted in all laws to be evidence.—Now as to the rules for examining any person, whether he is guilty or not, and the evidence that is allowed in all nations, no two nations agree in the same evidence for the trial of criminals, nor in the manner of giving the evidence against them. Your trials differ from all other nations; not only that you are tried by a jury, which is particular to you; but that the witnesses are to be produced face to face before the offender; and you have made laws, that there shall be two witnesses in cases of high treason; and herein you are the envy of all other nations.—Sir, the evidence that is to be given against criminals, differs in the same nation where the offences differ: there is a difference between the evidence that will convict a man of felony, and the evidence that is to convict a man of treason; and the evidence to convict a man of the same crime, hath been different in the same nation, according to the reason of the law. No doubt, by the common law of England, that evidence was sufficient, which was sufficient to incline the jury to believe the person guilty. This before the statute of Edward 6, though that was made upon great reason, and appears to be for the public good, by the general approbation it hath received; but I do not think in your proceedings here, you are bound by it.—But, sir, it is said, shall we that are the supreme authority (as we are part of it) go upon less evidence to satisfy ourselves of sir John Fenwick's guilt, than the other courts? and shall we resort to this extraordinary way in this case?—Truly, if it did shake the manner of trials below, I should be very unwilling to do it; but I do take it clearly, that it cannot: but on the contrary, I think there is no stronger argument for your resorting to this extraordinary way, like to that of the caution which your law hath provided for the innocency of all persons. For if we consider all those laws that have been made, it is plain it must be in the view of our ancestors, that criminals might not escape: and the laws are made for your ordinary trials, and for those things that happen usually; and your government hath this advantage; that they can keep to that which others cannot: for in a very wise government (as was observed by a person that sat in this House the last time this was debated) the ways of punishing crimes of this nature are extraordinary; when persons are condemned: they are not only unheard, but they are condemned before they are accused; and that is thought necessary there, which will not be endured here: and yet that government hath continued so long, and no endeavours have been to alter it, though so many noble families have suffered by it, because they are convinced, as to their constitution, it is necessary.—The next argument is from the precedent we are about to make; and whatever the other precedents have been, what you do now will be a precedent for you and your posterity; and whilst that is used to make you cautious, and tends to make you consider well, whether it is according to the duty to your country to pass this vote (which no doubt is the only question before you), it is a good argument.—Sir, if this precedent shall appear to posterity to be a precedent concerning an innocent man, or a person whose guilt was doubted of, or one whose guilt did not appear, and this bill should be carried by a prevailing party, I do agree it was a very ill precedent: but if the case be, that this precedent will appear to posterity, upon the truth of the thing, to be a precedent made of a man notoriously guilty; of a man that had deserved this extraordinary way of proceeding, this extraordinary resentment of the nation; and that nothing could have hindered this man from the common justice of the nation, but his having endeavoured to elude it in this matter; and if it appears that you would not be put off so, but made an example of this man, I shall not be sorry it should appear to posterity; but I believe posterity will (as I think they ought) thank you for it.—Sir, I do say for my own particular, while I am innocent, I should not think my life in danger to be judged by 400 English gentlemen, and the peerage of England, with the royal assent; and when I reflect, I cannot be of opinion, that the government could have procured a parliament to have passed a bill of attainder against my lord Russel, or Mr. Cornish, or Mr. Colledge, I do not think all the power of the government could have prevailed with the parliament to have done it: and here I see that a great many gentlemen have opposed every step of this bill, for fear of making an ill precedent; yet those gentlemen do believe in their own consciences, that he is guilty; and I cannot think that any person can be in danger by such a bill, when gentlemen oppose this bill only upon the prudential part, though they still confess him to be guilty.—All the conclusion I make to myself is, that I do believe, I am convinced in my conscience (which I think is sufficient, when I act in the capacity I now do) that sir J. F. is guilty: but there are reasons so extraordinary to support this bill of attainder, that I do not see how any person, that is so convinced, can refuse to give his affirmative to this bill.

Sir Godfrey Copley: Sir, I am very sensible a great deal hath been said upon this subject; but I think there is something in duty incumbent upon every man, especially upon me, who cannot concur with the general sense of the House, to give my reasons for my disagreement; and I will make no use of arguments but such as I cannot answer myself. A great deal hath been said upon this debate by gentlemen learned in the law: and many of these, though they have said they would not speak as to the power of parliaments, yet the greatest part of their arguments have touched upon your method of proceedings, and to shew you how they interfere with the rules of Westminster-hall; so great is the force of custom and education: but I acknowledge some have brought us arguments quite of another strain.—This is a matter of so extraordinary importance, that I think it proper to consider what rules we have to go by; but I take the punishment of offenders and criminals, to be the necessary support of all governments whatsoever, without which no government can continue; but all societies of men have supposed to themselves some rules, whereby it may be known, whether offenders are guilty or no.—It is the custom of our nation, to have two positive witnesses to prove treason. Now it may be imagined, that I make use of this as an argument, that we are tied up to these rules: No, I am not of that opinion, that we are bound by the rules of any society whatsoever. The parliament have power to abrogate all laws that they have passed, if they think good; and so certainly cannot be tied up by any rules now in being. But, sir, there are the eternal rules of equity, and justice, and right reason, and conscience; and these, I think, are unalterable, and never to be swerved from; and therefore I shall take the liberty to see how far agreeable our proceedings are to these rules.—Sir, I do look upon it, that it is a rule agreeable to what I speak of, that no man shall be accused by he knows not whom; and that no man shall be accused, but that the evidence against him, and he, should be confronted, and brought face to face.—I am one of those that believe sir J. F. to be guilty; and there is clear proof of it by one witness; and you have added to this an indictment that is found: but I must needs own, that I think that to be so far from giving any addition or strength to the evidence, that when that is brought in, I look upon the scales to be lighter than they were before: for if any record or writing that is sworn to behind a man's back, shall be brought here to supply another part of the evidence: (and if not so, why is it brought here?) and if that be to be interpreted to make up a part of the evidence, I do, by parallel reason, argue, that the like may make up the whole at one time or another; and may be so far made use of, that any profligate knave, that gives information before a justice of peace, or a secretary of state, this may rise against any man whatsoever when he is obnoxious to the government; or a person may be accused for his good service in this reign, and this may be set up against him, and he run the hazard of his life. —Then, sir, as to the necessity of this matter, I must confess, that those that brought this matter before us, are much wiser than I: and therefore I will not examine what reason they had to do it: but it is so little agreeable to me, I wish it had not come here. But is it to be supposed, that your government is in hazard of any man that is fast in Newgate? Can any man think, that sir John Fenwick can do any thing in his condition to hazard it? Can you expect that a man that hath been six months in prison, and nobody came at him, that he may make such a discovery as may be worth your while? but suppose you had a man of invention and practice, what a spur do you put to it? May not a man of parts, when he hath no other way to save himself, may not he frame such a plot, as may make the best subjects in England tremble?—Why then, sir, I do say, by this you are in a very dangerous way to suffer by the invention of any man: and suppose he should be so ignorant, as to know nothing; or so great a blockhead, to be able to invent nothing, would you hang him either for ignorance or insufficiency: I must confess. I dread the consequence of this for the nation in general, and for our posterity. It is not sir John Fenwick's life I argue for: I do not think it worth a debate in this house, nor the consideration of so great an assembly; but I do say, if this method of proceeding be warranted by an English parliament, there is an end to the defence of any man living, be he never so innocent.—Sir, I remember I heard it mentioned on the other side of the way, by an honourable person, who never lets any argument want its weight, that king James attainted a great number of persons in a catalogue, in a lump. Sir, I am not afraid of what arbitrary princes do, nor an Irish parliament; but I am afraid of what shall be done here: I am concerned for the honour of your proceedings, that it may not be a precedent to a future parliament in an ill-reign, which I am satisfied you would not do. I had some other thoughts, which I cannot recollect, &c.

Mr. Foley (the Speaker's son). Sir, the worthy gentleman that spake first upon this debate, calls me up: he said, that he thought in this matter, every one ought to give the reasons of his opinion: and in giving the reasons of my opinion, I do solemnly protest, I do it with the same sincerity as I would do, if I was upon my oath, and of a jury.—The worthy gentleman said, that if there could be any danger from this precedent, that an innocent man might lose his life, he would not be for it. I desire that he would consider, whether there be almost any instances of any innocent men that have lost their lives, but what has proceeded from precedents that have begun upon guilty men. The same gentleman told you, that if we did not believe sir J. F. to be guilty, no other consideration ought to move us to be for this bill.—Now the reason I am against this bill is, because it does not appear to me, from the evidence that hath been given at the bar, that sir J. F. is guilty. And I do think, that which is not legal evidence is no evidence; and I do think, that all the lawyers that have spoke in this matter, have allowed it to be no legal evidence. And I desire gentlemen will consider, if it has not been thought reasonable, that men should be convicted upon such evidence, why now it should be said to be necessary? I think the saying of my lord Strafford upon his trial was this: if the pilot was to direct a ship in a dangerous sea, and there was no buoy to direct his course, if he there split his ship, it was excusable; but if there was a buoy up, then he was accountable for it.—Now, comparing our government to the sea, there hath been many rocks and sands, and many men have lost their lives by them: but the treason bill seems to be set as a buoy to avoid that mischief for the future. Now if we split upon these rocks, I shall think we are but ill pilots.—Upon a former debate we were told, we are not tied up to the rules of Westminster-hall, and it was sufficient to justify a man in giving his vote for this bill, that he was satisfied that sir J. F. was guilty: see the consequence of that, in things that I have as much believed as I do this, I have found myself mistaken.—When a jury acts according to legal evidence, that they have no reason to mistrust: when a jury finds according to legal evidence, they are in no manner of blame: and if this man be innocent, when you have taken away his life, and his estate, and ruined his family, all that you have to say for it is, that you have acted according to the best of your own understandings, guided by your own private opinion.—Were this the case of sir J. F. only; and I not to give my vote, I reckon him so despicable, and because I believe him to be a traitor, and I think the worse of him for the part he hath acted since he was in custody, I should not concern myself about it. But when I speak against this bill, I speak on the behalf of all those that may hereafter suffer by such a precedent as this. Those precedents that have been urged, do not come near this point. And though the power of the parliament is above that of other courts, yet there hath been no precedent that comes up to this, that we should pass a bill to attain sir J. F. because he will not give evidence, or there is no evidence against him. If sir J. F. be to be hanged, because there is but one evidence against him, any man in the world may; and then I think every man's life depends upon it, whether this house do like him or not. Consider what a reverse of opinion this will be, to what former parliaments have given in cases of the like nature. I think if this bill does pass, every man's life will be as precarious as his election.—We have been told, how much danger the government will be in, if this bill does not pass. I have as much zeal for this government as any man; but all the government is concerned, is, that a man that you think a traitor should live. And I do think the government is no more concerned in this life, than in the living of any Jacobite in England. But on the other hand, I think the lives and liberties of the subjects of England are concerned; and, by this bill, you will make all their lives and liberties precarious.—I am not for bringing the blood of sir J. F. upon me, or my posterity; nor can I consent for to make a precedent, that a man may be hanged without evidence.

Lord Cutts. The worthy member that spake last but one, told you, that he thought the life of sir J. F. was not worth the consideration of this assembly: I do differ from him in that. If the Scripture tells us, that the most insignificant creature does not fall without God Almighty's consideration, I think the life of a gentleman may be thought worth ours. The worthy gentleman that spake last, told us, that he did believe in his conscience sir J. F. to be guilty: but because he hath found himself mistaken formerly, when he believed things with the same appearing certainty, therefore he may be mistaken now. I hope gentlemen will not press an argument upon our judgments, from precedents that are only mistakes: I do agree, that any man may be mistaken in a thing which at that time he thinks himself most certain of: but till that mistake appears, I say, it ought not to make him doubt of any thing that he does clearly and distinctly perceive: if otherwise, there is an end of all religion and law; and it shakes the foundation of the most certain belief a man can entertain.—As it appears to me, some gentlemen seem to lay a greater stress on some things than they deserve, and are not pleased to answer some arguments: and therefore I desire leave to speak to two or three points in short. I shall not say any thing of the authority of parliaments, it speaks itself; nor of the different consideration of our proceedings, and that of inferior courts; that seems to be agreed: but I shall apply myself particularly to mention some things upon sir J. F.'s case, and in that take care, as near as I can, not to trouble you with any thing I have said upon this subject.—I cannot but observe, that every gentleman that speaks against this bill, begins with an introduction, that he believes him criminal; which does somewhat astonish me: I hope they will explain themselves a little. But to the point: as to sir J. F.'s case, I did take the liberty in a former debate to observe, that it was not only a conspiracy against the lawful king of England, and had such parts in it, but also in bringing in a tyrannical and foreign power upon you. But there is one consideration I did not mention then, because I thought what I said carried so great weight, it needed it not: I do say, not only as a Christian, as an Englishman, and as a subject of this government, against which he hath committed a crime of the highest nature; but I will say, as a man of honour, that he hath acted contrary to the rules of honour. I think sir J. F. had made a much better figure, if he had appeared in arms, in Flanders, where he might have charged this prince at the head of his troops, than basely have contrived his death in this manner.—Sir, I have only one thing more that I desire to speak to; for what I say is more for my own information than to desire any man's opinion further than he agrees with it. I say, most gentlemen have likewise owned, that if they thought this an extraordinary case, they would be for this bill. I do say, as it appears to me, I do think, if ever there was an extraordinary case, this is one; and if ever any government was in danger, this is, or may be, upon your resolution to day. A great deal of stress hath been laid upon this argument, that sir J. F. is in hold: I take that to be nothing, for they keep a combination together still. It is by rewards and punishments that all governments are supported. Robberies, that were so common in France, that you could not walk after it was dark, by punishments they have been brought to that, that you may ride from one end of it to another with a purse of gold in your hand. And if you think it a trifling matter, that wicked men that have such inclinations should escape, I do not doubt but you may have plots every day.—I do not doubt but this gentleman knows a great deal that he hath never laid before you. I would not be thought to press it as an argument that he should be condemned, because he would not confess; but I will be bold to say, if he does know of a great many persons that have been concerned in this business; if he knows of a rising that was designed, when this conspiracy was to be executed (and it may be executed still, if things shall be ripe for it); I say, though you keep him in hold, it will be an encouragement to them to go in the cabals, in buying of arms, &c. I think the matter before you is no less than the fate of England, and the fate of Europe, and of all your posterity; I am sure it is: and give me leave to say to you one thing that is matter of fact, there are those stories insinuated abroad, and those matters of facts asserted, with relation to a conspiracy, and reviling this house, that are not fit for me to repeat. But your enemies last year, before the breaking out of this conspiracy, had the same sort of meetings, and the same sort of discourse, as they have now. I will end with protesting to you, that I deal with sir J. F. with the same candour and honour, as I shall always desire to be dealt with myself.

Sir Godfrey Copley. That noble lord misunderstood what I said, as to the small value I put upon sir J. F.; I did say, that sir J. F. considered in his single capacity, I did not think it was worth the while of this House to act in their legislative capacity upon him.

Sir Ch. Cartwright. I think this bill is of very great moment, and ought well to be considered before it passes; for when it is passed it will be too late to retrieve the ill consequence which may attend it; there is so much roguery in the world, I think it hard matter to arrive at the truth. 'It is not long ago there was a plot contrived by one Young, and others, against the bishop of Rochester; and so cunningly contrived, that if a bill of attainder had been brought in against the bishop of Rochester, before the truth had been discovered, I do not know what might have been the consequence of it. I suppose nobody questions the truth of this plot; but God forbid that every body that hath been named for it should be guilty. It may be true, that there was such a meeting that sir J. F. is accused of being at, and yet sir J. F. might not be there; and I do not think it sufficiently proved, and therefore I cannot give my consent to this bill.

Mr. Mauley. Sir, I have, as well as I could, attended to this debate in this matter; and I did not trouble you in the last debate, because I was willing to take all the opportunities I could to inform myself. It is to me an extraordinary thing, not only for the matter, but manner of your proceedings; which, considering all circumstances, appears to me to be not only not common, but unprecedented; and as we are all in this matter judges, so I hope we shall apply ourselves to consider of it with that temper, as may lead us to give a right judgment. And if I had never so great obligations upon me, and dependencies, though from the crown, I would lay them by, at least they should not influence my judgment in this matter. We are to pass judgment in a matter of life and death upon this person; and it is urged we should do it, because the common course of justice will not reach him for the crime objected against him, which is high-treason; and the species of that treason, as it is laid in the indictment, is, &c.—Sir, the evidence that hath been given to support it, hath been the affirmation of a single witness at the bar; indeed other things have been alleged in the bill; but, as hath been said in Westminster-hall upon another occasion, they look like pepper and salt to me; for in themselves they are not crimes (I speak with submission to your judgments), at least to bear company with an accusation of high-treason.—As to the evidence; first, capt. Porter tells you, That sir J. F. was at a meeting at the King's-head, and at Mrs. Mountjoy's afterwards, when there were treasonable discourses amongst them, and Charnock was directed to go into France; but the end of that is not proved; for the witness that told you of those meetings, did not tell you, as I observed, that Charnock did go to France; and what he said upon other occasions, is no evidence to me. And though we are not tied up to the rules of Westminster-hall, I am so young a member, I know not what methods are observed in parliament, that I may in some measure make them a rule to me.—The law of England requires two witnesses upon the greatest reason; and it is not only the policy of England, but the general consent (in this case) of the whole world, and it is grounded upon the law of God. It was objected by an honourable gentleman the other day, to a gentleman, that he said the law of God required two witnesses. A gentleman who is very near allied to one, from whom he might have early informed himself, made us a challenge, to shew him where it was to be found: if he will look into Numbers and Deuteronomy, there are three particular texts very plain in it. The reason of this is illustrated in the story of Susannah; her safety depended upon it: and the Jews, when they prosecuted our Saviour, though they wanted no malice, nor nothing to animate them to put him to death, yet St. Matthew tells us, at last there was two witnesses found against him: and this being the law of the land, and the law of God, must be my rule; I must have this matter proved against sir J. F. as full as the law of the land, and the law of God requires. The other evidence brought to maintain this bill, is what is sworn by Goodman before a justice of peace, and the account of the evidence given by Goodman to the Grand-Jury, which, I must confess, I declare I am very far from being convinced ought to have weight with us: but, I think, they must lay a great weight upon it, who give their vote for this bill; or otherwise they must give their vote upon the testimony of one witness.—The reason for this extraordinary proceeding is, it is urged, there is a necessity for it; the plot will be lost else, say some; sir J. F. says others, will escape else. As for the plot, I wish to God there was no such thing; but it is probable the best way of ending this plot would be, if his majesty in his wisdom thought fit to interpose with his mercy and grace at this time; and better than for the legislative power, in an extraordinary manner, to take off a person against whom there is not a legal evidence. Gentlemen say, they are convinced in their consciences; but I will appeal to their consciences, whether there be legal proof against him; and shall we then interpose, in an extraordinary manner, to take away his life?—No man pretends to answer, but that this proceeding may be dangerous to posterity: if he had any security this might be done without that danger, it might be some encouragement to gentlemen to come into it, but since it may be dangerous, are not we, who are entrusted by the people, to have an equal care for the liberty of the people? We are to take care of his majesty's life and government; and the reason is, because upon him, and his government, the public safety does depend. It is salus populi, is the great reason that the law takes such care of the king; and as we are to do nothing to the detriment of the king, so we are to do nothing for the king that may be of detriment to the people.—An honourable lord hath been pleased to say, we are not yet out of danger: I am sorry to hear it, and could not think it, when so noble a lord is so near the king, and hath so great a share in taking care of the public safety. But sure, nothing can happen from this person; there hath been care taken he should have no conversation with any body: If I thought there was a hazard to the government, or to the king, and no way to secure us, but taking away this gentleman's life; such a reason as that would make me go counter to my own reason and judgment. But I cannot be of opinion, that a man of sir John Fenwick's size, who in his best circumstances, indeed, is a gentleman by birth, and hath a gentleman's fortune, but is now in a great measure without his estate; so his fortune cannot do any hurt, and his alliance, I suppose, is not considerable enough to do any neither.—Then as his circumstances do not make him so considerable as to do us any hurt; let us take care, that we do not in any case, by his blood, wound ourselves. Gentlemen lay but little stress upon the dangerousness of the precedent: I do lay more; and it is chiefly upon that reason I cannot come up to be for this bill. I would not that so good a parliament should lay the foundation of any, by which, in after-ages, the best men in England may suffer. It is said, an ill parliament will not want a precedent, but will make use of their power; but they will fall sooner into, if led by a good parliament.—Sir, this is a matter I would not have presumed to have troubled you in: for I cannot think any thing I can say, will have any weight with any one that is not of my opinion: but as an Englishman, as I have the honour to be of this House, when a thing of this nature comes before us, and I am to give my opinion as a judge in it, I was willing to give my reasons for my opinion. I think this bill is unprecedented; and you will give me leave to say, it appears to me to be unreasonable; I think it contrary to the fundamental rules of reason and justice; I doubt it may be dangerous to our constitution; and I fear future ages may have reason to repent what we do; and therefore I am against this bill, and hope it will not pass.

Sir Wm. Strickland. Sir, I do assure you, I shall not in any thing of this bill, or any thing else, run counter to my conscience or judgment; but I do think, and I think few deny it, I do think in my conscience that sir J. F. is guilty; and thinking so, I ought to condemn him. I do think, if we should spare this gentleman for want of form, as they call it, now we are in our legislative capacity, and there should be any ill effects of it; and other people, by thinking they might avoid punishment by the forms of Westminster-hall, should have the like imagination against his majesty, and they should take effect; I should think myself in a great measure guilty of that misfortune. I think the kingdom is concerned, and the king's preservation, in this bill; and I hope you will pass it.

Mr. Dolben. I am against passing of this bill; and I shall, with as much brevity as I can, lay before you my reasons why I am against it; and probably I should not have troubled the house with them, but that I think it necessary to justify my opinion in a case of this importance. I do admit that the fact that is charged upon sir J. F. is an overt-act of high-treason, within the 25th of Edw. 3, though I must take leave to say that a judgment upon a case, at least as strong as this, has lately been very much arraigned and controverted: but, it is not my intent to dispute the nature of this fact; for I am persuaded, that to consult how to procure an invasion of this kingdom with foreign forces, is an overt-act of compassing the death of the king; and I do think this charge does amount to such an overt-act. But I beg leave to reflect, how far overt-acts of this nature, which fall directly within any species of treason mentioned in the 25th of Edw. 3, how far such treasons are cognizable in parliament, and within the intention of that statute; indeed, that they are cognizable by the absolute power of parliament, there is no doubt. Sir, that the statute doth first enumerate several species or branches of facts, which it says shall be adjudged treason, that is, in the courts of judicature; and then afterwards it goes on, and says, 'If any other case supposed treason, not specified in that act, doth happen before any justice, the justices shall tarry without any going to judgment of the treason till the cause be shewed and declared before the king and his parliament, whether it ought to be judged treason or felony.' Now, Sir, with submission, this is a great argument, that the intention of those that made this law was, that these treasons, which were directly under any of these particulars enumerated by the statute, that they should be left, and be appropriated to the decision of the inferior courts; but that facts of another nature, which did not come under the particulars enumerated in the act, as extraordinary offences, and misbehaviour of magistrates and great men, and the like; these indeed should be reserved for the consideration and judgment of the parliament, who are only a match for powerful offenders, whom the common justice of the kingdom cannot grapple with. And as this seems to be the intention of the makers of the act, so I think the instances generally have been pursuant to that institution; for I know of but one single instance of any one that ever was attainted by bill for any treason that is contained under any species enumerated in the 25th Edw. 3. It is true, where persons have been out of the reach of the law, in open rebellion, or fled from justice; in these cases the parliament have thought fit to attain them; as in the case of sir John Mortimer, and others who made an escape out of the Tower; and the case of the regicides, and likewise the case of the duke of Monmouth, who was in open rebellion: but I say, that I have not found in my reading, upon the best search I could make, where any that were in custody were attainted by bill for any treason within 25 Edw. 3, and that was the case of Ferham; but I think there is no precedent of any man, who is not only in custody, but hath been indicted, arraigned, and issue joined, and he hath put himself upon his country for his trial: and the person accused was to be convicted, or acquitted, by the verdict of twelve men; I never heard of any instance, when after all this proceeding a person was taken off from his trial, and debarred the benefit of the judgment of his peers, and the benefit of his challengers, and destroyed; and cut off extrajudicially by an act made on purpose, ex post facto: I never met with any instance like it, unless it be that of my lord Strafford; and I believe nobody will cite that, if they reflect upon the preamble of the act for reversing his attainder: for in the preamble it is said, that the turbulent party did attempt the procuring of that act, on purpose to condemn him. This shews the opinion of our predecessors in relation to proceedings of this sort; they esteem it contrary to the fundamental rules of justice and right, which parliaments, as well as other courts, must be governed by. Roger Mortimer was attainted, and afterwards his attainder was reversed; and the reason declared, because he was attainted against the good laws and customs of the kingdom. Ferhain's, that I mentioned before; and declared for the future, that it should be, &c.—Another attainder there was of sir Thomas Haxey; but that was reversed, and declared to be against all law. Then there are the attainders of H. 3's time; I shall not particularize them; but besides that, all the history of those times, and law-books, condemned them, as proceedings against all law and justice. There is the statute of 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, seems directly levelled against those attainders in the preceding reign; for it says, that the proceedings in king H. 8's time, were grounded upon laws that were extreme and terrible; and therefore that there might be no proceedings of that kind for the future, it reduces all treasons to the ancient standard of 25 Edw. 3, and goes on, and enacts that no man shall be convicted or condemned for treason, but upon the testimony of two lawful witnesses.—Now, I take that to be a general law, and to extend to all convictions and condemnations for treason; and cannot but declare my opinion of it, that it must extend to bills of attainder, since these are the principal and most powerful convictions and condemnations; and if that statute does extend to bills of attainder, then pray consider, whether this bill of attainder now be supported by such evidence as the statute requires? There was indeed one lawful witness produced: but instead of the other, they have only produced a record between parties not concerned in this bill, and the depositions of a person, whether living or dead, non constat; and I believe nobody will say these depositions will be equivalent to a second witness.—I do believe a great many gentlemen are of opinion, that those rules of evidence are not to guide you here: But I beg pardon that I cannot possibly be of that opinion; I rather incline to my L. C. J. Vaughan's notion, that though we are not bound by the forms of law, yet we are bound by the rules of law: every body allows we are bound as to the nature of the fact: every body will take himself bound by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, to form his judgment as to the fact: Why are not we then bound by these acts? Likewise as to the evidence, and the proof of the fact: if 25 Edw. 3 be binding to us, so as to prescribe us a rule to judge the fact by, why are not the statutes of Edw. 6 binding to us as to the evidence of that fact?—But say some gentlemen, if there be not two witnesses, that is from sir J. F. or his agents. Sir, no gentleman will say, that there hath been any proof of that: the very bill does not charge him with it; But taking it for granted, what shall follow upon that? Shall it therefore follow, that sir J. F. shall immediately be put to death? No, God forbid! I think there is no parity between the crime of seducing away a witness, and the judgment of death: But I think this a more reasonable and natural inference to be made, that because sir J. F. hath seduced away a witness, therefore it is just to make a law, that the depositions of that witness should be of as good force and effect as if Goodman was here to give it viva voce; for then you will not take from him the benefit of his trial, nor the benefit of his challenges, which is the birthright of every Englishman.—And one thing I will say further: These bills of attainder are like Sisiphus's stone, they have rolled back upon those that have been the promoters of them. It is known, that my lord Cromwell was the first man that promoted them in H. 8's time: and the advice that he gave his master for the ruin of others, proved fatal to himself.—Sir, this is the last time we shall have the opportunity of considering this matter. I must take leave to declare, that my opinion is, that if I consent to the passing of this bill against sir John Fenwick's life, upon any other grounds than such as are entirely agreeable, and justifiable by the laws of God and man, I am guilty of the death of sir John Fenwick. I am not satisfied that I can give my consent to this bill upon those grounds, and therefore I beg leave to be against it.

Sir Edw. Seymour. You all know I have borne my testimony against this bill, being not persuaded that it is just: Now we are come to the finishing part of it: and I shall lay before you these reasons that prevail with me, and submit them to the judgment of the house; and if I am more tedious than I used to be, I hope the occasion is such, that you will pardon me: for I will endeavour to contract myself into as near a compass as I can.—I shall not trouble you with any arguments that have been laid before you already; nor shall I enter into the examination of precedents; a great many have been laid before you, and a great many of them have been reversed, most of them; and the reasons why they have been reversed, because the persons condemned have not had the due benefit of the law: And if that be a good reason for reversing of such an attainder, it is a good reason why you should not do it. I cannot but take notice, that the beginning of this bill in the house of commons, is the first step of this kind that hath been made in parliament, except that of the duke of Monmouth: and the reason of it I take to be this, because you hear not upon oath; you condemn not upon oath: You, nor the party under accusation have that advantage against a forsworn evidence, as there is in the other house; the method has been to pass such bills in the house of lords, and transmit them hither, upon which you then judge. I think, in this case you have no evidence; and instead of two witnesses, you have no witnesses at all; for as to Goodman, 'De non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio.' As to Porter, he hath been examined: But when you consider that he was a person engaged in this conspiracy, and that he had no repentance of his crime till he was discovered, and then he comes to be an evidence; how far that shall sway, every man must allow; that I must submit to you: But thus much I may say, every man must allow me, that in far less cases no man that does swear for himself, or upon his own account, is to be admitted as an evidence. If a robbery be committed in an hundred, though a man be but to pay a groat towards it, he shall not be an evidence; how much more then in a case, when a man comes to swear to take away another's life to save his own? For he is not in the condition of a freeman: who gives his evidence without check or controul, but he is drudging on for his pardon, as the counsel told you, which depends according to the evidence he does give or not give.—For my part, I cannot go so far as some gentlemen have done, to say sir J. F. is guilty: For where there is no law, there is no transgression; a man that is guilty, must be guilty according to the law: and the law hath required and said, that there shall be no treason but what is proved by two witnesses; and here it appears that you have not one. The same law that calls it treason, says it shall be so proved: Then if you pass this bill, you make that treason which before was not treason.—Sir, the law does require two witnesses, and there is divine authority for it too: It hath been hinted at, the place in Numbers, 'No man is to die upon single evidence;' and it says, 'These are the statutes you shall observe throughout your generations and dwellings.' But I will go a little further, because a worthy gentleman declared, there was no such law of God. He will find, in the 19th of Deuteronomy, a case just as it is here; for the case of high-treason was idolatry at that time; and the law says, 'Whosoever shall set up idols shall be stoned to death; but it says, 'No man shall be condemned to die by the mouth of one witness, but by two or three witnesses he shall suffer.' I think this is positive enough. I shall not trouble you with more instances, though I could repeat several. Sir, the law enjoins forms strictly, even to the least circumstance: If a man be condemned to die, and after he is condemned to die, another take away the life of that man, it is murder. I will go further: If the officer that is to do execution, if a man be condemned to be hanged, drawn and quartered; if the officer shot him, it is murder in him; so that men are not left to a discretionary power to act according to their consciences. I take the reason by which this bill is supported, to be destructive to all human society; for if that be
